It seems scarcely necessary to point out the broad distinction between those cases and one in which the grantor shows by his own testimony that his grantee took the deed into his possession, and kept it long enough to impose upon an innocent mortgagee by his tacit, if not his express, consent. All the authorities are clear to the effect that, if Adams had asked and obtained express permission of the appellant to take the deed away, the estoppel would have been complete; and if an express consent will raise the estoppel I cannot see why a tacit consent does not work the same result. If my deed is lying on a table before me, and my grantee tells me by word and act that he is going to take it away with him, if I make no effort to prevent him, if I utter no word of protest, I consent as truly as if I did so by express words. This is precisely what the appellant did. He knew, apparently, that he was running a risk,—he did not like it, but he permitted it,—and, having enabled his grantee to perpetrate a fraud, he is allowed to saddle its consequences upon an innocent party. More than this, he is allowed to subject an innocent party to a serious hardship, in order that he may reap an advantage from his own wrong. The case shows that the same $1,000 advanced by the respondent on her mortgage was paid over to the appellant as the second installment of the purchase price of the land, and this by the decree of the court he is allowed to keep, together with the first payment, and his land. In other words, he comes out of the transaction with the land that he sold, with the $500 paid at the date of the sale, and with the $1,000 of which the respondent has been defrauded by his assistance. If Adams had not been enabled to perpetrate this fraud by the opportunity the appellant gave him, it is to be presumed he never would have made a second payment on his purchase, and the most the appellant could have got would have been the first payment and the land. By contributing to entrap the respondent he adds to his gains the precise sum, and the identical money which the respondent was induced to advance. He is not content to be restored to the position he would have occupied if the fraud had not been committed, but must make all the profit of it. There is, in my opinion, no rule of equity or law that lends itself to such a conclusion.

WILHOIT et al. v. LYONS. (No. 18,074.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1893.)

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—RECORDING—POWERS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. Civil Code, § 3459, which declares that, unless an assignment for the benefit of creditors shall be properly recorded, it shall be void against every creditor of the assignor not assenting thereto, applies only to creditors of the assignor at the time the assignment is made.

2. Where land in possession of the assignee in an assignment for benefit of creditors, which has not been recorded as required by law, is sold under a judgment against the assignor, the purchaser will be presumed, in an action against him by the assignee to quiet title to the land, to have purchased with notice of the assignment, where he does not aver in his answer, or offer any evidence, that he did not have such notice.

3. Failure of the assignee in an assignment for the benefit of creditors to give a bond as required by Civil Code, § 3467, does not affect the validity of the assignment, or authorize an action by the assignor, or one claiming under him, to set it aside.

4. An assignment for the benefit of creditors, which provides that the assignee shall sell the property assigned, "using a reasonable discretion as to the times and modes of selling and disposing of said estate as it respects making sales for cash or on credit, at public auction or by private contract or sale," is not void under Civil Code, § 3457, subd. 5, which provides that an assignment for the benefit of creditors shall be void if it confers on the assignee any power which, if exercised, might prevent or delay the immediate conversion of the assigned property to the purposes of the trust, as the discretion given in the assignment will be treated to mean such discretion as the assignee is authorized by law to exercise.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by R. E. Wilhoit and others, assignees of M. E. Bryant, an insolvent debtor, against A. I. Lyons, to quiet title to lands. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, and from the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Budd, James H. Budd, and J. B. Hall, for appellant. Baldwin & Campbell, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs brought this action to quiet their title to certain real property in San Joaquin county, and they claimed title to the property under a deed of assignment made to them by M. E. Bryant, an insolvent debtor, for the benefit of his creditors, on February 16, 1886. The defendant denied the plaintiffs' ownership or right to the possession of the property, and set up title to it in himself under and by virtue of a sheriff's deed conveying the property to him under date of September 15, 1890. The court below gave judgment for the plaintiffs, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The facts of the case, as shown by the findings and evidence, are as follows: On January 30, 1886, M. E. Bryant was the owner of the property in dispute, but was insolvent, and unable to pay his debts. On that day, under the provisions of the Civil Code relating to "assignments for the benefit of creditors," he signed, acknowledged, and delivered to the plaintiffs, for the benefit of his creditors, a deed of assignment of all his property not exempt from execution. The grantees accepted the trust, and filed the deed for record in the recorder's office of the county; and on the same day the judge of the superior court of the county fixed the amount of the bond to be given by such assignees, as required by section 3467 of the Civil Code, at the sum of $25,000. On February 16, 1886, a mistake was discovered in the deed of January 30th, in this: that in the habendum clause thereof the name of R. E. Wilhoit, one of the grantees, had been omitted, and the name of H. S. Sargent inserted in its place. The mistake was made by the draughtsman of the deed, and was not discovered by any one until the day named. Thereupon the said deed was taken from the recorder's office, and the name of Sargent was erased from the habendum clause, and the name of Wilhoit was written in place thereof, and its date was changed to February 16, 1886. Bryant then again duly acknowledged the deed, and delivered it to the grantees, and they again accepted the trust and filed it for record; and, as shown by the certificate of the county recorder, it was recorded "in Book G, vol. 6, page 540, of Miscellaneous San Joaquin County Records." The judge of the superior court also made a new order on February 16th, requiring the assignees to execute a bond, conditioned as required by section 3467 of the Civil Code, in the sum of $25,000. Under the order first made fixing the amount of the bond to be given, a bond was drawn and signed by the principals and five sureties. It referred to the assignment of January 30th, and the order of that date, and proper certificates were attached to it, showing that four of the sureties justified thereon on February 12th, and one on February 17th. The bond was approved by the judge of the court who made the orders on February 18, 1886. On August 2, 1888, the defendant recovered a judgment against Bryant for the sum of $3,728.29, and on February 12, 1890, an execution was issued on this judgment, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of San Joaquin county for service. The sheriff levied the execution on the real property in dispute, and under it sold the property to the defendant in part satisfaction of his judgment on March 8, 1890. No redemption from the sale was had, and on September 15, 1890, the sheriff executed to the defendant a deed of the property, which was duly acknowledged and recorded on the same day.

1. Appellant contends that the deed of assignment was never recorded in the proper book, and hence that it was void as against him. The law authorizes an insolvent debtor to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and the provisions relating to such assignments are found in sections 3449-3473, Civil Code. Some of these sections were amended in 1889. The following, as they stood before the amendments, need only be referred to: "Sec. 3453. An assignment for the benefit of creditors must be in writing, subscribed by the assignor or by his agent thereto, authorized by writing. It must be acknowledged or proved and certified in the mode prescribed by the chapter on recording transfers of real property, and recorded as required by sections 3463 and 3464," etc. "Sec. 3459. Unless the provisions of the last section are complied with, an assignment for the benefit of creditors is void as against every creditor of the assignor not assenting thereto." "Sec. 3463. An assignment for the benefit of creditors must be recorded, and the inventory required by section 3461 filed with the county recorder of the county in which the assignor resided at the date of the assignment," etc. "Sec. 3465. An assignment for the benefit of creditors is void against creditors of the assignor and against purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith and for value, unless it is recorded," etc. "Sec. 3466. Where an assignment for the benefit of creditors embraces real property, it is subject to the provisions of article 4 of the chapter on recording transfers, as well as to those of this title." "Sec. 3473. An assignment for the benefit of creditors, which has been executed and recorded so as to transfer the property to the assignee, cannot afterwards be canceled or modified by the parties thereto without the consent of every creditor affected thereby." It is argued that section 4235 of the Political Code provides how and in what books the different kinds of papers are to be recorded by county recorders, and that, when the deed in question was recorded in a volume of "miscellaneous" records, it was not in compliance with the requirements of that section, and did not constitute a recordation under the sections of the Civil Code above cited. Conceding, without deciding, this to be so, still the deed was undoubtedly valid as against the assignor and all creditors assenting to it, and it served to vest the assignor's title to the property in the assignees. Bryant v. Langford, 80 Cal. 543, 22 Pac. Rep. 219; Wilhoit v. Cunningham, 87 Cal. 453, 25 Pac. Rep. 675. It was at most void only against creditors not assenting thereto, and against purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith and for value.

The question, then, is, does the appellant come within either of these classes? He obtained his judgment on August 2, 1888,—nearly two years and a half after the deed was executed,—and the record entirely fails to show by averment or proof that he had any claim whatever against Bryant on February 16, 1886. But the statute evidently makes a deed of assignment void against nonconsenting creditors only when they were such at the time it was executed, and not against those who might subsequently become such. In Kane v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 464, there was a verbal gift of a piano by a husband to his wife. The piano was subsequently seized by the sheriff under an execution issued against the husband, and the wife brought an action to recover its possession or value. This court said the "transfer by gift was valid and effectual between herself and her husband and all the world, excepting existing creditors and bona fide subsequent purchasers without notice. There was no proof that Day—the execution creditor—was a creditor of the husband at the time of the gift, and there is no presumption that the gift was void as to him as a subsequent creditor." And see Hussey v. Castle, 41 Cal. 239. This being so, the contention of appellant that the deed was void as to him because he was a creditor cannot be sustained.

The only remaining question, then, under this head is, was appellant a purchaser in good faith and for value? There can be no pretense that he was such purchaser if he had notice, actual or constructive, of the prior deed at the time of his purchase, and the rule is well settled that the burden was cast upon him to show that he had not such notice. Long v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 218. In Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 167, 3 Pac. Rep. 641, it is said: "To entitle a party to protection as such a purchaser he must aver and prove the possession of his grantor, the purchase of the premises, the payment of the purchase money in good faith and without notice, actual or constructive, prior to and down to the time of its payment; for if he had notice, actual or constructive, at any moment of time before the payment of the money, he is not a bona fide purchaser;" citing numerous cases. Here there was no averment in the answer of defendant that he did not have notice of the deed of assignment to plaintiffs, nor was any proof offered by him tending to show a want of such notice; and the court found that ever since the date of their deed "plaintiffs have been, and now are, in possession of all the real estate and premises in the complaint mentioned, and each and every part thereof." It must be presumed, therefore, that appellant had notice of the deed to respondents at the time of his purchase, and hence that he was not a purchaser in good faith.

2. Appellant also contends that the assignment was void, because no bond was given by the assignees as required by section 3467, Civil Code. A bond was given and approved, as above stated, but it is objected that it was insufficient, because it referred to, and purported to be made in pursuance of, the deed of January 30th. Bryant v. Langford, 80 Cal. 542, 22 Pac. Rep. 219, was an action to set aside this same deed of assignment upon the ground that the assignees had failed to give the bond required by section 3467 of the Civil Code. It was held that the failure of the assignees to give the bond required did not affect the validity of the deed, or authorize an action by the assignor to set it aside. But appellant, by his purchase at the sheriff's sale, acquired the rights and interests of Bryant in the property, and can have no better standing before the court than Bryant had. If, therefore, Bryant could not have the deed set aside upon the ground stated, it must be clear that appellant cannot.

3. Appellant further contends that the deed of assignment was void as against him because it conferred upon the grantees the power to sell the property therein described on credit. This contention is rested upon the provisions of section 3457, subd. 5, of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "An assignment for the benefit of creditors is void against any creditor of the assignor not assenting thereto, in the following cases: * * * (5) If it confer upon the assignee any power which, if exercised, might prevent or delay the immediate conversion of the assigned property to the purposes of the trust." The language objected to as making the whole deed void is found in the habendum clause, and is as follows: "To have and to hold the said real estate, * * * in trust and confidence, however, to sell and dispose of the said real estate, * * * using a reasonable discretion as to the times and modes of selling and disposing of said estate, as it respects making sales for cash or on credit, at public auction or by private contract or sale." It is argued that the giving to the assignees a reasonable discretion as to making sales of the property for cash or on credit was in violation of the section of the Code above quoted, because, if exercised, it might delay the immediate conversion of the property to the purposes of the trust. There are two sufficient answers to this contention. In the first place, as before stated, it does not appear that appellant was a creditor when the deed was executed, and, if not, he cannot be heard to complain of it. And, in the second place, the deed conveyed to the grantees all of the grantor's property "for the benefit of all his creditors, without any preference or priority other than that provided by law." The "reasonable discretion" conferred upon the grantees as to selling the property must therefore be treated as a lawful discretion, or, in other words, such discretion as they were authorized by law to exercise.

4. It is objected that there has been unusual and unwarranted delay on the part of the trustees in the execution of their trust. The delay has certainly been unusual, but it is probably accounted for by the large number of suits which have been instituted to determine the rights of different claimants to the property. The records show that six of the cases besides this have been brought to this court on appeal. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

DESCALSO v. DUANE. (No. 14,794.)

NEW TRIAL—DISMISSAL.

1. An order both denying and dismissing a motion for new trial, though somewhat inconsistent, must be considered as a dismissal, and proper, where, through inexcusable neglect of the moving party, the motion has not been brought into condition for hearing.

2. The fact that such a motion can be brought to hearing, under Code Civil Proc. § 660, either by the moving or opposite party, after notice or affidavits, etc., does not prevent the opposite party applying for dismissal, where, through inexcusable neglect, the motion has not been brought into condition for hearing.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by P. C. Descalso against John Duane. Order denying and dismissing motion for new trial. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Moses G. Cobb, for appellant. Stanly, Stoney & Hayes, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from an order somewhat inconsistent in its terms, denying and dismissing a motion for a new trial. To deny a motion is to entertain and act upon it, and at the same time to end it, when, of course, it cannot be dismissed. A dismissal is a refusal to entertain it. The two forms were adopted because the decisions of this court have caused some doubt as to what is the proper remedy in case the moving party fails to prosecute his motion with reasonable diligence. In Quivey v. Gambert, 32 Cal. 305, it was held that an order dismissing a motion for a new trial, or striking out the statement, was not appealable, because, though after final judgment in point of time, they did not follow it in legal sequence, or in the same line of procedure, and did not depend upon it. The court therefore recommended that the trial court let the motion proceed to the final hearing, and then deny it for failure to prosecute with reasonable diligence. In Calderwood v. Peyser, 42 Cal. 110, this rule is criticised, and the rule declared to be that any special order made after final judgment is appealable, the only test being the point of time. But the court still held that it was error to dismiss the motion for a failure to prosecute, but that the proper practice was to deny the motion. The legitimate penalty for failure to prosecute an action or proceeding would seem to be a dismissal, and if it be allowed to be regularly submitted for decision it is difficult to see why it should not be decided on its merits. This practice has sometimes been insisted upon since Calderwood v. Peyser, as in McDonald v. Conkey, 57 Cal. 325, and sometimes it has not been, as in Chase v. Evoy, 58 Cal. 348, in which it was said it makes no difference. In the present case the motion was not in a condition to be submitted, and the order must be considered as a dismissal. I think the practice was proper.

Appellant contends that such a motion cannot now be dismissed for failure to prosecute, because either party may bring the motion on to be heard. Section 660, Code Civil Proc. This section provides that the motion shall be heard at the earliest practicable period after notice of the motion, when made on the minutes of the court, or after the affidavits, bill of exceptions, or statement, as the case may be, are filed, and may be brought to a hearing by either party. But before either party can bring it on to be heard it must be in a condition in which it can be submitted; and if it is not, simply because of the inexcusable neglect of the moving party, the opposite party may apply for a dismissal. Here, after the statement had been agreed upon, the moving party was ordered by the court to have it engrossed. More than five months elapsed before the respondent made his motion for a dismissal, during which nothing was done. The statement was a short one, and could have been engrossed in two or three days. At the time no showing was made, explaining or excusing the delay, except that a few orders were procured, extending defendant's time to engross the statement. It does not appear why these were required, or what right the court had to make them, but they do not cover the last two or three months of the period. I do not think we can say that the order dismissing the motion was an abuse of discretion.

Having reached this conclusion, it is not necessary to determine whether the papers used on the hearing were properly identified. There can be no doubt, however, that a bill of exceptions is a safe mode. Herrlich v. McDonald, 80 Cal. 472, 22 Pac. Rep. 299. It is required by rule 29 of this court. I think the order must be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

McCALLION et al. v. HIBERNIA SAV. & LOAN SOC. et al. (No. 14,970.)

STAY BOND—JUDGMENT AGAINST SURETIES.

In an action to determine who is entitled to receive certain money which is paid into court, a judgment for plaintiff is not one "directing the payment of money" within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 942, requiring a stay bond on appeal therefrom; and where a bond in addition to the ordinary appeal bond is given, to stay such judgment, it is void, and no judgment can be entered thereon against the sureties.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by J. J. McCallion and others against the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society and others. From a judgment against the sureties on a stay bond, defendants appeal. Reversed.

M. C. Hassett and Jas. F. Tevlin, for appellants. D. L. Smoot, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Division No. 1 of a society known as the Ancient Order of Hibernians had several thousand dollars deposited in the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society. Dissensions arose in the organization, and an action was brought against the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society by certain individuals, claiming to compose the only true and genuine division No. 1, to recover this money. Certain other parties, making the same claims, intervened, and asked that the money be awarded to them. The loan society paid the money into court, and the interveners were substituted as parties defendant. The city and county treasurer became the custodian of the fund, under an order of the court, during the pendency of the action. Judgment was rendered that plaintiffs were entitled to the money; that the city and county treasurer pay the same over to them, and that the defendants pay the costs of the action, amounting to $312. Defendants appealed, and gave a stay bond in the sum of $7,500, being double the amount of the judgment and costs. Upon appeal the judgment was affirmed. 12 Pac. Rep. 114. Subsequently, upon a return of the remittitur to the trial court, plaintiffs moved for judgment against the sureties upon the stay bond, as provided in section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and judgment was thereupon rendered against them in the sum of about $600. 23 Pac. Rep. 798. This appeal is prosecuted from that judgment.

The case disclosed by the record is not such a one as requires a bond to stay execution, and that fact is fatal to a recovery upon the bond, and demands a reversal of the judgment. It was said in Powers v. Crane, 67 Cal. 66, 7 Pac. Rep. 135: "On behalf of the sureties, who are the real parties in interest here, it is claimed that the undertaking, except in so far as the $300 is concerned, about which no question arises, was without consideration, and void. The pretended consideration therefor was a stay of execution of the decree appealed from, and, if the law itself operated a stay upon the giving of a $300 bond, it would seem that the point is well taken. That the statute did so operate was held by this court in the case of Snow v. Holmes, 64 Cal. 232, 30 Pac. Rep. 806. As the statute itself wrought the stay, there was no consideration for the sureties' promise. The benefit which the plaintiff in the case of Johnson v. Powers secured from the appeal came from the statute, and not from the promise of the sureties." See, also, Powers v. Chabot, 93 Cal. 266, 28 Pac. Rep. 1070. It is only upon a statutory bond that judgment can be ordered against the sureties on motion, and if the judgment from which appellants take this appeal is not such as calls for the giving of a bond to stay execution, aside from the ordinary $300 appeal bond, the filing of a bond for that purpose is unnecessary and useless labor, and, if so filed, is void as a statutory bond. Section 949, Code Civil Proc., provides that the ordinary appeal bond of $300 stays execution in all cases except those mentioned in sections 942, 943, 944, and 945. We then proceed to an examination of this judgment in the light of those sections, to determine where it shall be properly placed. Section 942 relates to appeals from judgments or orders directing the payment of money, and it is under the provisions of this section that respondent bases his claims for an affirmation of the judgment in this case. It was held in Estate of Schedel, 69 Cal. 242, 10 Pac. Rep. 334, that section 942 applied only to appellants who were required to perform the directions of the judgment or order appealed from, and this construction of the section has since been approved in Born v. Horstmann, 80 Cal. 453, 22 Pac. Rep. 169, 338, and Pennie v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. 32, 26 Pac. Rep. 617. In the present case the fund over which this litigation arose was not in the possession of appellants, either at the time the judgment was rendered, or when the appeal was taken, and never had been in their possession; and, that being the fact, they were not required,

"to perform the directions of the judgment." Upon the reasoning of the foregoing cases, it is very clear that appellants were not required to give a stay bond covering the fund which was in the possession of the court, and any judgment rendered by motion against the sureties upon the bond for any portion of the fund found to be lost or misappropriated is void. This money constituted a special fund in the hands of the court, and the litigation between these parties was conducted for the purpose of securing a judgment of the court, adjudicating as to where the title to this fund was located. When the money came into the possession of the court the litigation resolved itself, essentially, into an action to try the title to personal property; and if the judgment rendered in this case was such as to bring itself within the provisions of any of the sections of the Code from 942 to 945, inclusive, it came within section 943, as a judgment directing the delivery of personal property. While it is intimated in the Schedel Case, supra, that the term "personal property," as used in section 943, does not include money, we have no doubt that where the money is a special fund, and capable of identification, it would answer to the term "personal property," as used in that section. But, conceding that the judgment here rendered is such as was contemplated by that section, still no stay bond was required, for the fund was in the possession of the court, and such fact, by the terms of the section itself, does away with the requirement; and the principle declared in the authorities previously quoted would also defeat any claims by respondent respecting the necessity for a stay bond, even in the absence of such provision in the section. As to that portion of the judgment awarding costs against appellants, a stay bond was not required to restrain the issuance of an execution to recover such costs. The appeal bond effected that object. The real judgment in the case is that plaintiffs are the owners of the money, and, no stay bond being required by the statute as to such a judgment, no stay bond is demanded as to the costs. The costs taxed against defendants were incidental to the judgment, and, as to a stay of execution, inseparably connected therewith. A judgment for costs is not the judgment directing the payment of money contemplated by section 942. If such were the fact, a stay bond would be required in almost every conceivable case, when, to the contrary, it is only required in the four cases covered by sections 942 to 945 of the Code. The judgment referred to in the foregoing sections is the decree passing upon the matter directly involved in the litigation, and in all other cases the proceedings are held in abeyance by virtue of the statute itself. For the foregoing reasons we conclude that no bond to stay execution was required in the case, and it follows therefrom that no judgment could be rendered against the sureties upon the bond given. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

WEBER et al. v. GILL. (No. 14,746.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—WATER COURSE WITHIN CITY LIMITS—REMOVAL OF EARTH FROM CHANNEL—HOW AUTHORIZED.

1. Act March 2, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 577, being the charter of the city of Stockton,) § 30, subd. 9, provides that the council shall have power "to regulate, under the superintendence of a board of public works, the moving and anchoring of vessels within the waters of the city, and to prevent the obstruction of the free navigation of the same." Section 147 provides that the department of streets and wharves shall embrace the control of the water front and wharves, the public thoroughfares, "the water courses and channels within the city, * * * and of everything of a public nature pertaining to said subjects." Held, that an ordinance was not necessary to authorize a person under a permit from the council and board of public works to remove sedimentary deposits from the channel of a natural water course within such city in order to protect city property and improvements against overflow.

2. A resolution of the city council, and a permit from the board of public works of such city, authorizing a person to remove such sedimentary deposits at a point where a street crosses such water course, are not invalid.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph Budd, Judge.

Action by Weber and others against Gill to enjoin defendant from removing earth from the channel of Mormon slough, a natural water course within the corporate limits of the city of Stockton. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Louttit, Woods & Levinsky, for appellants. James H. Budd and John E. Budd, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to enjoin the defendant from removing earth from the channel of Mormon slough, a natural water course within the corporate limits of the city of Stockton. The earth referred to is sedimentary deposits brought down by the waters of the channel. The facts agreed upon show that, "for the protection from overflow and destruction of the property of and in said city, and the public streets and bridges and navigable waters of said Mormon channel, it was at all times mentioned in the complaint, and now is, necessary to remove, or cause to be removed, said sedimentary deposits aforesaid in said Mormon channel." The quantity of earth deposited has been increased by the construction, under the direction of the United States government, for the purpose of protecting the navigable waters of the San Joaquin river, Stockton channel, and that portion of Mormon channel lying west of Center street, of restraining dams across Mormon channel below the point where defendant has been excavating and east of Center street. The effect of these dams has been to make a restraining basin of Mormon slough above the points where they were erected. The street from which the earth was removed crosses the slough, but has not been used as a highway for the reason that it has never been bridged. The blocks of land described in the complaint, in front of which the digging was done, are owned by the plaintiffs. The defendant claims the right to remove the earth under a resolution of the city council and a permit from the board of public works.

It is claimed by the appellants that the resolution of the city council and the permit given by the board of public works are void; that the work should have been done in accordance with the act of March 23, 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 540;) but that, if the council or board of public works is clothed with the right to authorize the removal of earth from the streets, such authority can be granted only by ordinance. We do not think the contentions of the appellants are sound. The charter of the city of Stockton, approved by the legislature March 2, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 577,) provides: "Sec. 30. The council shall have power to pass ordinances * * * (9) to regulate, under the superintendence of a board of public works, the moving and anchoring of vessels within the waters of the city, and to prevent obstruction to the free navigation of the same." Section 147 provides that "the department of streets and wharves shall embrace the control of the water front and wharves; of the streets, sidewalks, bridges, and public thoroughfares; * * * of the water courses and channels within the city; * * * and of everything of a public nature pertaining to said subjects." The mayor, the city surveyor, and the superintendent of streets constitute the board of public works, and are designated as the "department of streets and wharves," and it is their duty to see that the water courses and channels are not obstructed by anything which will cause the waters thereof to overflow and injure or destroy the public streets or property of the city. The fact that the filling of the streets in front of plaintiff's land is a benefit to the land is immaterial. The city has the right to have the waters flow through the channel without interruption or obstruction, and to as full an extent as when Capt. Weber, who owned the entire site of the city by grant from the Mexican government, transferred the streets and squares to the city, (in 1851.) The streets were conveyed by him to the city authorities without any reservation, and with reference to a map made by him in 1850, in which Mormon channel was delineated from the western to the eastern limits of the city. Those who framed the charter doubtless saw that, if the board of public works were required, in the exercise of their authority, to proceed under an ordinance of the city council, great damage to the property of the city and its residents might be caused by obstructions in the water courses within the city. Authority was expressly conferred upon the board, therefore, to act in respect to the control and protection of water courses and channels directly, and no ordinance was necessary in the case at bar. The act of March 23, 1872, was intended to provide against overflow by authorizing the city authorities to widen and deepen the channel of Mormon slough from Hunter street, a distance of five miles easterly. The act provides for condemnation proceedings, but it is not contended in this case that the respondent has removed, or attempted to remove, any portion of the land belonging to plaintiffs, or has attempted to widen or deepen the channel. All defendant proposes to do is to remove a deposit of earth which has partially filled up the channel, and which, if allowed to remain, will tend to cause an overflow of the waters, and an injury to property of the city. The fact that the deposit is due in whole or in part to the acts of the United States government in improving the navigable portion of the stream below is immaterial. The city has the right to remove obstructions from a natural water course, so as to preserve it in its natural form, without regard to the cause of such obstruction.

The judgment is affirmed.

HAMLIN v. PHILIPS. (No. 15,040.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1893.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Where, in an action to establish a trust, the findings controvert plaintiff's claims at all points, and there is evidence to support the findings, a decree for defendant will not be set aside except on the most satisfactory and convincing grounds.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Catherine Hamlin against Nancy M. Philips, and Nancy M. Philips as administratrix of the estate of P. J. Philips, deceased, to establish a trust in certain real estate. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. P. Clement, A. G. Burnett, and T. J. Geary, for appellant. J. W. Rose and Barham & Bolton, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action was brought to obtain a judgment and decree that the land described in the complaint, the title to which stood in the name of P. J. Philips at the time of his death, and also certain personal property, was the property of the plaintiff, and that P. J. Philips, deceased, was her trustee, and that his estate had no right or interest in said property, or any part thereof. Judgment went for defendant, and this appeal is taken from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. The findings are full and complete. They controvert the claims of the plaintiff at all points, and warrant the judgment rendered. It is now insisted that the evidence does not support the findings. We have examined with great care the record containing a detailed statement of the evidence given at the trial, and find ample there to justify the findings of the court. The plaintiff is a sister of Philips, deceased. She was about 77 years of age at the date of the trial, and was the principal witness in the case. She was a woman of means, and advanced money to her brother for various purposes. The property involved in this litigation was purchased with this money, and the title taken in the name of Philips. The administratrix of the estate now insists that the money was a loan, and plaintiff claims that it was invested for her benefit, and that the title to the property purchased was held by Philips in trust for her. Plaintiff's testimony is self-contradictory in many respects, apparently attributable to weakness of memory, but sufficient is found therein to support defendant's theory of the case, that the money was advanced to plaintiff's brother as a loan.

It is not necessary to enter into a review of the evidence in detail for the purpose of indicating in this opinion wherein it supports the findings. Upon a careful examination of the record, the fair import of all the evidence, taken together, is in line with the findings and judgment of the court. The arguments of the learned counsel for appellant as to the improbability of these advances being made by her as loans, and as to the inferences of fact that may be drawn from the rather peculiar circumstances of the case, might well have been addressed to the trial court before final judgment rendered, and also upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial. Such arguments necessarily possess much greater force and weight when addressed to the court of original jurisdiction than when directed to the appellate tribunal. The case is essentially one wherein it devolved upon the trial court to carefully sift and weigh the evidence, and where this court would not be justified in setting aside a decree made in the exercise of that power and that duty, unless upon the most satisfactory and convincing grounds. For these reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

CITY OF STOCKTON v. WEBER et al.
(No. 14,775.)

CETERMINES—ABANDONMENT—RECONVEYANCE FOR OTHER PURPOSES—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

1. Pol. Code, § 3105, vests title in the inhabitants of a city or town to lands "used" as a "public" cemetery. Section 3106 declares a place where six or more bodies are buried "a cemetery." Section 3 declares no part of the Code retroactive, unless so expressed. Held, that title to land which had ceased to be used as a public cemetery before enactment of said sections was not affected thereby, but remained in the original owner; and that upon abandonment for cemetery purposes, and removal of bodies, the title would be discharged from such use.

2. The owner whose land had been used for some years for cemetery purposes conveyed same to a city for nominal consideration, provided the city obtain authority from the legislature, and remove the dead therefrom within certain time; said city to preserve the land as an ornamental public square, or use it for erection of public buildings, with reverter to the grantor in case of sale or otherwise to private uses. Held, that abandonment of the land for cemetery purposes and removal of the bodies was a condition precedent to the vesting of title.

3. Such a condition was not void as in contravention of Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 7, forbidding special legislation, since, if other and general legislation could not be obtained, it made the condition simply impossible, not unlawful.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action of the city of Stockton against Helen Weber, Charles M. Weber, Jr., Thomas J. Weber, and Julia H. Weber. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Swinerton & Rutherford, for appellants. James H. Budd, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action is brought by the city of Stockton to quiet title to "block 237, east of Center street," in said city, which, prior to 1872, was outside the city limits. The complaint alleges that prior to 1860 Charles M. Weber was the owner of the block in question, and dedicated it to the public as a cemetery, and that such dedication was accepted by the public prior to that year. The fourth paragraph of the complaint is as follows: "That on the 12th day of May, 1880, said Charles M. Weber, by a deed signed, sealed, and acknowledged by him, and by him delivered to plaintiff, sold, granted, bargained, and conveyed to plaintiff said block No. 237, to be preserved and kept as an ornamental square, and for the erection of public buildings thereon; and ever since the said delivery of said deed plaintiff has been, and now is, the owner in fee of said block No. 237, subject to the use thereof as a public cemetery, and to be kept by plaintiff as an ornamental square, and for the erection of public buildings thereon." Charles M. Weber died in 1881, and respondents, his widow and heirs, claim title in fee. The answer sets out the deed mentioned in the complaint. It is a bargain and sale deed for the expressed consideration of one dollar. Following the granting part and description of the property, down to the in testimonium clause, the deed is as follows: "Provided, the city, by its legal representatives, obtains authority from the legislature of this state and makes the necessary removals of the dead from the said block within twelve months from the first day of January, A. D. 1881. Said city to preserve the same as an ornamental public square, or use it for the erection of public buildings, without any right to sell or dispose of the same for private uses, and to revert back to and become the property of said Weber, his heirs or legal representatives, in the event of sale or otherwise for private uses, and the title to the same to be as valid in such event as if this deed had never been made. To have and to hold all and singular the above mentioned and described premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part and to its assigns, forever, subject to the foregoing conditions." The answer denied the dedication of the block as a public cemetery, or that any dedication for such purpose was accepted by the public; admitted that prior to 1860 Weber permitted a large number of bodies to be buried there, and gave verbal license therefor, but that no time was fixed during which the bodies should remain, or when they should be removed; alleged that the city accepted the delivery of the deed upon the conditions expressed therein, and under an agreement to carry out said conditions before title should vest thereunder, and that the city had never procured such act of the legislature, nor removed the bodies of the dead, nor improved the block. Findings and judgment passed for defendants, and plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The court found that for about 10 years prior to 1860 Charles M. Weber was the owner of a tract of land adjacent to the city of Stockton. That he surveyed and platted the same into lots and blocks and public streets, a part of which is the block in question; and that said Weber until his death, and since that time the defendants, his heirs, owned said tract so laid out continuously from the year 1860 to the time of the trial of this action, and are in the exclusive possession thereof. That prior to 1860 said C. M. Weber permitted a number of dead bodies to be buried in said block under a verbal license. That no time was fixed or agreed upon during which they should remain, nor when they should be removed. That said C. M. Weber, deceased, and his heirs, always reserved his and their rights as the absolute owners of said block in fee simple. That no burials were ever permitted by C. M. Weber without a reservation of all his rights in and to said block, and the whole thereof, and he never consented to its use by the public as a burial ground. That no part of it was ever used by the public for a burial ground for five years, nor was there ever an uninterrupted use thereof by the public for any purpose; and that it never was dedicated to nor accepted by the public as a cemetery. The testimony shows that the first interment in that block was in or about 1852, and the last in the spring of 1862; that about 1861 the Rural Cemetery was established; and that prior to the execution of said deed nearly all the bodies had been removed from that block. The number remaining is not definitely shown, but said to be "six or more."

Appellant contends that the finding that there was no dedication to nor acceptance by the public of the block in question as a public burial ground is not sustained by the evidence, and cites the act of 1854, which declared that, "where the bodies of six or more persons are buried, such place is a public graveyard." But whether it was or was not a public graveyard is immaterial, unless that fact divested the legal title of Weber. Upon this point counsel for appellant cite section 3105 of the Political Code, which is as follows: "The title to lands used as a public cemetery or graveyard, situated in or near to any city, town, or village, and used by the inhabitants thereof continuously, without interruption, as a burial ground for five years, is vested in the inhabitants of such city, town, or village, and the lands must not be used for any other purpose than a public cemetery." Section 3106 of the Political Code re-enacts the above-mentioned provision of the act of 1854, omitting the word "public," so that it now reads: "Six or more human bodies being buried at one place constitutes the place a cemetery." These provisions of the Political Code took effect January 1, 1873, and by section 3 of the same Code it is declared that "no part of it is retroactive, unless expressly so declared." Section 3105 vests title in the inhabitants of, etc., only to lands "used as a public cemetery or graveyard," while under the following section the place where six or more bodies are buried is a cemetery, though not used as a public cemetery or graveyard. The block in question ceased to be used for the burial of the dead more than 10 years before this section of the Code was enacted, and, not being then used as a public cemetery, Weber's title was unaffected by its enactment. Whether that section operates in any case to divest the title absolutely, or further than is necessary to the use, leaving it to revert to the original owner when the ground is abandoned and all the bodies removed, is not considered or decided. That the title to the block in controversy remained in Weber notwithstanding the use of the ground for burial purposes, subject to such use, and that the abandonment of the ground for such use, and the removal of all the bodies, would leave the absolute title discharged from such use in the respondents, is fully sustained by Schlessinger v. Mallard, 70 Cal. 326, 11 Pac. Rep. 728. There the city of Los Angeles conveyed certain public lands in 1857 to three trustees, of whom Mallard was the survivor, in trust for the purpose of a city cemetery. A portion of the land was so used until 1861, when the city by ordinance discontinued its use, and provided for the removal of the bodies, and all except a few were removed. In 1870 the city conveyed to plaintiff, who brought an action against the surviving trustee to compel a conveyance, and the action was sustained. The circumstance that the legislature confirmed the conveyance by the city to the plaintiff did not, we think, affect plaintiff's title.

Appellant further contends that the deed made by Weber in May, 1880, conveyed the title to the city, to be preserved and kept as an ornamental square, and for the erection of public buildings thereon, "subject to the use thereof as a public cemetery." Respondents contend that the deed contained a condition precedent, which was never performed by the city, and that, therefore, no title ever vested in appellant. It is expressly conceded that no act of the legislature was procured under which the bodies might lawfully be removed, and that none were removed by the city; and, if the clause relating thereto is a condition precedent, it is plain no title under the deed has vested in appellant. Appellant's construction of this deed cannot be sustained. The use of the block as an ornamental public square and the erection of public buildings is inconsistent with "the use thereof as a public cemetery." The deed, however, required the use as a cemetery to be absolutely ended by the removal of all bodies then remaining therein within 12 months from January 1, 1881. These uses, being inconsistent, could not coexist, and it was plainly the intention that they should not. "The first step in the construction of a deed is to ascertain the understanding and intention of the parties at the time of contracting. * * * To arrive at this intention, the situation of the parties and the subject-matter at the time of contracting should be considered. * * * The whole of the context must be considered to collect the intention of the parties, although the immediate object of inquiry be the meaning of an isolated clause." Brannan v. Mesick, 10 Cal. 95, 106. Weber then owned, and respondents still own, a large amount of property in the vicinity of this block. It was obviously to his interest, in view of the remainder of his property, that this block should be devoted to other purposes. So long as any of the bodies buried there remained, it tended to depreciate the value of the remainder of his property; while its improvement as an ornamental square, or by the erection of city buildings, would enhance the value of his other property. The deed clearly shows an intention on the part of the grantor to terminate its use as a cemetery, and that, such termination being first accomplished, it should then be devoted to the other use. If its use as a cemetery was to continue, there was no reason why the conveyance should be made, and none for the requirement that the bodies should be removed. The consideration named in the deed was merely nominal. The true consideration was the removal of the dead from the vicinity of his other property, and the future improvement and use of the block for the other purposes named; nor was there any necessity that the title should pass until the bodies were removed. It would therefore seem clear that the intention of the parties was that the removal of the dead then remaining should be a condition precedent to the vesting of title in appellant. The real intention, it is true, would not avail unless the language used is capable of a reasonable construction which would effectuate that intention. Here, however, the language used was apt and appropriate to express that intention. The grant is immediately followed by the proviso: "Provided, the city, by its legal representatives, obtains authority from the legislature of this state, and makes the necessary removals of the dead from said block within twelve months from the first day of January, 1881." "A proviso in deeds and laws is a limitation or exception to a grant made or authority conferred, the effect of which is to declare that the one shall not operate, or the other be exercised, unless in the case provided." Voorhees v. Bank, 10 Pet. 471. "It always implies a condition, unless subsequent words change it to a covenant." Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Proviso." "A condition precedent is one which is to be performed before some right dependent thereon accrues, or some act dependent thereon is performed." Civil Code, § 1436.

Counsel for appellant argue that, if this were a condition, the grantor would have stated in the deed that the title would not vest until the condition was performed, or, on failure to perform, that the title would revert; and that this is clear because the deed does state on what condition a reverter will take place, viz. if the grantee sells or disposes of the ground to private uses. But the use of words expressly stating that the title shall only vest upon performance of a condition precedent is not necessary. The word "provided" expresses as much, and is one of the apt words commonly used to create a condition. Raley v. Umatilla Co., 15 Or. 172, 13 Pac. Rep. 890; Gibert v. Peteler, 38 N. Y. at page 168. The first condition prevented the estate from vesting, if not performed, and in such case there could be no reverter; but a condition subsequent does not prevent the estate from vesting, and therefore upon a breach the grantor cannot again have the title except by a reverter, based upon the breach and a re-entry therefor.

But it is further contended that the condition under consideration requires an unlawful act, and is therefore void. Counsel base this contention upon article 4, § 25, subd. 7, of the constitution, prohibiting special legislation authorizing, among other things, "vacating cemeteries." But this provision of the constitution does not prohibit the enactment of a general law under which the removals might have been lawfully made. The condition was not that the removal of the bodies be made without authority of law, but that the grantee would procure the enactment of a law permitting it, and making the removal lawful. If the necessary legislation could not be obtained, it simply made the condition impossible of performance, not unlawful. A condition subsequent, which is impossible of performance, is void, but not so with a condition precedent. "If a condition precedent is impossible from the beginning, or for any reason incapable of performance, the estate will not vest." Devl. Deeds, § 964, and cases there cited. If it were possible to construe this proviso as a condition subsequent, appellant would be in no better situation. The time limited for the performance of the act has passed. The condition has not only not been performed, but no effort has been made to perform it. For several years the city has assessed this block to respondents, who have paid the city taxes thereon. Under these facts, it is not perceived upon what ground appellant could maintain an action to quiet title against respondents. These views render a consideration of the other findings unnecessary. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PORTER v. BUCHER et al. (No. 18,032.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1893.)

SALE BY HUSBAND TO WIFE—DELIVERY AND CONTINUED CHANGE OF POSSESSION—QUESTION FOR JURY—ACTION FOR CONVERSION—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by a married woman against her husband's assignee in insolvency and others for the conversion of hay, it appeared that plaintiff owned about 150 head of cattle and horses on a farm on which her husband had filed a declaration of homestead, and on which they lived; that before the assignment about 130 tons of hay raised on the farm were stacked in corrals which had been used for several years for that purpose, and from which it was fed to stock; that plaintiff and her husband went to the stacks, estimated the quantity, and agreed on the price; that the latter, by words, delivered the hay to plaintiff, who then closed the gates, and made a payment; and that she afterwards paid the agreed price. Thereafter, on going away for several weeks, she told witnesses that the hay was hers; that she feared the boy would let the cattle in, and destroy it, and requested them to look after it. Plaintiff bought her husband's hay the previous year, and fed it from the same corrals. There was evidence that it was the custom for stock owners, when they bought hay in the stack, to take their stock to it, and feed it without removing it. Held, that the question whether or not there was an immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession, was for the jury, and it was error to direct a verdict for defendants.

2. An arrangement between plaintiff and her husband, whereby he fed two cows and two horses from the same hay in consideration of his services in assisting to feed her stock, was not necessarily inconsistent with her ownership and possession, though evidence of it was competent as tending to show his possession and control of the hay.

3. Evidence of the official character of some of defendants, and that the hay was taken from plaintiff under a writ of replevin in an action against her husband, was competent, though the complaint in the replevin case was defective.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action by Phear E. Porter against John Bucher, Joseph Mark, A. L. Smith, and A. D. Martin for the conversion of certain hay. From a judgment entered on the verdict of a jury, directed by the court, in favor of defendants, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Spencer & Raker, J. D. Goodwin, and Clarence A. Raker, for appellant. Jenks & Clafin, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action is in trover for the conversion of hay. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment against her, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial. Appellant is the wife of Howard B. Porter, with whom she lived upon a farm upon which her husband had duly filed a declaration of homestead, and which farm was principally used for raising hay. The wife was the owner of about 130 head of cattle and 20 or 30 horses, which were her separate property, and were kept on the homestead. The crop of hay for 1888, estimated at about 120 tons, was stacked in corrals which had been used for several years for that purpose, and from which the hay was fed to the stock. After the hay was stacked, plaintiff and her husband went to the stacks, estimated the quantity of hay, agreed upon the price, and the husband, by words, delivered the hay to appellant, who thereupon closed and fastened the gates of the corrals, made a payment of $10 thereon, and a few days later made another payment, of $30, and, in accordance with the agreement of sale, assumed the payment of certain specified debts of the husband, amounting, with the cash payments, to about $870, and which debts she afterwards paid. In October, 1888, the husband filed a petition in insolvency, was thereafter adjudged an insolvent debtor, and defendant Martin became assignee. Shortly thereafter the assignee served a written demand upon the insolvent for the delivery of the hay and other property upon the farm, and was then informed by appellant of her purchase, and that the hay belonged to her. The assignee brought an action of replevin against the husband, and took the hay. The taking under the writ was resisted by the appellant, under her claim of ownership, and after the taking a demand for the hay was duly made, and this action was brought to recover the value of the hay, and special damages. The cause was tried before the court and a jury, and upon the conclusion of the evidence the court instructed the jury as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury: The court instructs you, first, that there is no evidence which will contradict this finding: That the plaintiff entered into a contract,—a purchase of certain stacks of hay; that said property was stacked in the corral usually used by H. B. Porter to stack his hay in; that said property remained there after the sale to the plaintiff in this action by the said H. B. Porter, and never was removed from the said corral until removed by the officer in this action; that the said premises were the homestead of both parties; that under that state of facts they used the property apparently as they had before the sale, each assisting the one and the other in feeding the stock of both parties from the corral; and that, therefore, there was not a sufficient change of possession, as intended and directed by the law, to transfer the title, as against a creditor. In view of this statement, I feel called upon, and it is my duty, to instruct you, and give you the following instructions: Gentlemen of the jury: Under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case, a sale of personal property is absolutely void, unless accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and a continued change of possession. The evidence is not sufficient to warrant you in finding that there was such delivery and change of possession of the property in controversy in this action, and it is therefore your duty to find for the defendants, and you are instructed so to do."

The principal question arises upon this instruction. No question was made as to the bona fides of the sale of the hay to appellant, nor as to the fact that she had there, upon the ranch, said cattle and horses, which were her separate property. Some additional facts appeared in evidence, which should be noticed. Appellant had bought her husband's hay the preceding year, and fed it from the same "stack corrals," and in other years had bought hay from others for her stock. Mr. Rodkey, a witness for plaintiff, testified that he was employed and paid by Mrs. Porter, the winter before, to feed her stock, and fed out most of the hay from the same corrals. That in the fall, (1888,) after haying, she went to Oroville, and was gone a month or six weeks. That she then told witness that the hay (the same here in question) belonged to her; that she was afraid the boy would let the cattle get in, and destroy it; that she wanted it to feed her cattle, and desired the witness to look after it. Another witness, Mr. Pepperdine, testified that she also informed him of her ownership of the hay, and also requested him to look after it in her absence; that he stayed there a month after the return of plaintiff and her husband, and did not see Porter do anything about the hay. Evidence was also given tending to show that it was the custom in that vicinity for cattle owners, when they bought hay in the stack, to take their cattle to the hay, and feed it there, without removing it, and that plaintiff had fed a part of this hay before it was taken by the sheriff under the writ.

The instruction given to the jury, to find for the defendants, was erroneous. Section 3440 of the Civil Code lays down no new rule as to what shall constitute a delivery. Any delivery that is sufficient to pass the title as between the parties is still sufficient, the statute only adding that it shall be "immediate." The expression, "an actual and continued change of possession," was construed in Stevens v. Irwin, 15 Cal. 503. It was there said: "The word 'actual' was designed to exclude the idea of a mere formal change of possession, and the word 'continued' to exclude the idea of a mere temporary change. But it never was the design of the statute to give such extension of meaning to this phrase, 'continued change of possession,' as to require, upon a penalty of the forfeiture of the goods, that the vendor should never have any control over or use of them. This construction, if made without exception, would lead to very unjust and very absurd results." The supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "In determining the kind of possession necessary to be given, regard must be had, not only to the character of the property, but also to the nature of the transaction, the position of the parties, and the intended use of the property." Crawford v. Davis, 99 Pa. St. 578. In Byrnes v. Moore, 93 Cal. 394, 29 Pac. Rep. 70; Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. 503, 26 Pac. Rep. 1077; and numerous other cases,—it is held that what constitutes an immediate delivery, and an actual and continued change of possession, is a fact to be determined upon the evidence in each particular case. We think there was sufficient evidence tending to show such delivery and change of possession as to require a submission of those questions to the jury, and such as would have sustained a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The cattle and horses were her separate property, returned by her for taxation, and had for years been kept by her upon the homestead. She had before purchased hay from her husband, and fed it to her stock from the same stack corrals; had employed and paid Rodkey to feed her stock the preceding winter; and when she was leaving for a visit to Oroville, in October, had requested Rodkey and Pepperdine to look after the hay, and see that the cattle did not get into the corrals and destroy it. The stock being hers, and kept upon the ranch where she had the right to keep them, the presumption was that the hay which was fed to them was hers also. If the ruling of the court below correctly stated the law, it would logically follow that, in order to make a valid purchase of hay from her husband, she must immediately remove the hay from the homestead, or buy it from day to day as she fed it to her cattle. If a neighbor had bought this same hay, and, according to the custom of that portion of the country, had brought his cattle to the hay, and was there feeding it, no one would contend that it was not sufficient, as a delivery, and actual and continued change of possession, to satisfy the statute. "Either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried. * * *" Civil Code, § 158. The Code provides no different rule as to the formality of such transaction between husband and wife from that required between strangers, yet the law, giving a reasonable construction to all such statutes, takes into consideration, not only the character of the property, but the relations of the parties, and the use of the property intended, and only requires that which would naturally be done in an honest and business-like transaction, where there was no thought of fraud or concealment. Indeed, any other course, while it might unquestionably fulfill the strictest requirements of the statute touching an actual and continued change of possession, would at once suggest, as the reason for such departure, an intention to defraud. She was not bound to remove the hay to other land, nor to own the land upon which the stack stood. It was a benefit to the land, in which she, as well as her husband, was interested, to feed the hay upon it. The hay could not be branded, as cattle are, and any unusual notice of her ownership would at once have invited an attack upon the ground of actual fraud. But the possession of the land was not solely in the husband, and therefore the possession of the hay could not, from the bare fact that it was on the land, be wholly in the husband. At the most, that fact, taken alone, would have made the possession joint. "The effect of declaring the homestead was to convert the separate title of the husband into a joint title in himself and wife, to the extent of the homestead." Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 312, 20 Pac. Rep. 715. In Barber v. Babel, 36 Cal. 17, after discussing the question whether the declaration of homestead created a joint tenancy, the court said: "But, however this may be, there is a joint interest in the homestead,—a joint holding, if not a technical joint tenancy."

The husband had two cows and two horses which were fed from the same hay. Plaintiff testified that, by agreement between herself and husband, his cows and horses were to be fed, in consideration of his services in assisting to feed her stock. This arrangement was not necessarily inconsistent with her ownership and possession, though it was competent evidence tending to show the husband's possession and control.

Some exceptions were taken to rulings receiving and excluding oral evidence, but these are not of a character requiring special notice.

Evidence of the official character of defendants Bucher and Mark, and that the taking was under a writ of replevin in the case of Martin v. Howard B. Porter, was competent, notwithstanding the defect in the complaint in that case. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

Ex parte HAYES. (No. 21,025.)

LIQUOR LICENSE—EMPLOYMENT—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ORDINANCE.

1. The enactment of an ordinance making it unlawful to sell intoxicating liquors without a license, and prohibiting the sale of such liquors in dance houses or other places where musical and theatrical entertainments are given, and where females attend as waitresses, is a valid exercise of the power conferred by Const. art. 11, § 11, on counties, cities, and towns, to make all such local police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws.

2. Nor does such ordinance make such a discrimination against women in the matter of employment as will bring it in conflict with Const. art. 20, § 18, providing that no persons shall on account of sex be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business, vocation, or profession.

In bank. Application on habeas corpus by Hayes for a discharge from imprisonment. Denied, and petitioner remanded.

Davis Louderbaek, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding upon habeas corpus, and the question involved is whether it is competent for the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to provide by ordinance that it shall be unlawful to engage in the business of selling spirituous, malt, or fermented liquors without a license, and at the same time to provide that no license shall be issued to any person for the purpose of engaging in the business of selling such liquors or wines in any dance cellar or dance hall, or in any place where females are permitted to wait or attend in any manner on any person, and wherein there is also any musical, theatrical, or other public exhibition; thus, in effect, prohibiting the sale of liquors or wines in such dance cellars or other places where musical and theatrical entertainments are given, and where females attend as waitresses. The fundamental principles which underlie and support legislation of this character were announced by this court in Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 208, 24 Pac. Rep. 747, and also received an exhaustive discussion by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13; and upon the authority of those cases we hold that the ordinance under consideration here is a valid exercise of the power conferred by section 11 of article 11 of the constitution of this state upon counties, cities, and towns to make "all such local police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

It is claimed, however, by the counsel for the petitioner that the ordinance makes a discrimination against women in the matter of employment, and is therefore in conflict with section 18, art. 20, of the constitution of this state, which is in these words: "No person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business, vocation, or profession." This section does not, in our opinion, operate as a limitation upon the power of the state or its municipalities to prescribe the conditions upon which the business of retailing intoxicating liquors shall be permitted to be carried on, or in regulating the manner in which such business shall be conducted. Petitioner remanded.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment. Upon the facts shown by the petition and the return the petitioner is lawfully detained, irrespective of the validity of the amended ordinance. If it is valid, the complaint clearly charges him with its infraction; if it is invalid, the facts alleged constitute an infraction of the unamended ordinance. In either case an offense is charged; and, the imprisonment being lawful in any event, the question as to the validity of the ordinance cannot be decided in this proceeding without going outside of the case presented, which I do not care to do.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the order remanding the petitioner, because I do not think that the points sought to be made by him can be raised on habeas corpus. A proceeding under the writ of habeas corpus cannot be turned into either a writ of error or a nisi prius trial. As to whether parts of the ordinance in question are constitutional, I express no opinion, except to say that, in my judgment, they are not covered by the Christensen Case, 85 Cal. 208, 24 Pac. Rep. 747. The facts in that case are entirely different, and the dictum of the opinion therein delivered must be taken in connection with the facts then before the court. If taken in its broadest sense, then it can be maintained only by assuming that there is no constitutional right of property in wines or any kind of spirituous or malt liquors, and that by statute or ordinance they can be confiscated wherever found, like smuggled goods.

BURY v. YOUNG et al. (No. 14,910.)

DEED—DELIVERY IN ESCROW—POWER TO RECALL—EVIDENCE.

1. Where the grantor executes a deed of his land, and delivers it to another, with instructions only to hold without recording until his death, and then to deliver it to the grantee, the grantor cannot recall the deed, nor alter its provisions, and he has no interest in the land, except a life estate. McFarland, J., dissenting.

2. On the question whether a grantor had power to recall a deed delivered in escrow, evidence of subsequent acts of the grantor, tending to show his intentions at the time he made the deed, is inadmissible.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Action for partition by Eliza J. Bury against Elizabeth C. Young and others. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. A. Coldwell and L. J. Maddux, for appellants. C. C. Wright and John W. Armstrong, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action of partition. Plaintiff and defendant Young are sisters, and also daughters of one M. A. Hinkson. For title to support their respective claims, Mrs. Bury relies upon a deed from her father, and Mrs. Young claims as a devisee under her father's will. While suffering from a paralytic stroke, Hinkson called to his bedside, for legal advice as to the disposition of his property, one Hazen, an attorney at law, and, acting upon his advice, he signed and acknowledged a grant deed of his real estate, wherein his aforesaid daughters were named as grantees. This deed he gave to Hazen, with instructions not to record it, but to deliver it to the grantees upon his death. He appears to have recovered from his sickness, and subsequently endeavored to secure possession of the deed from said Hazen, but was unsuccessful in this regard. At a later date he made a will devising all his real estate to appellant Young. Subsequently he died, and Hazen delivered the aforesaid deed to plaintiff, Bury.

The sole question in this litigation is, did the title pass to the grantees under the deed? In other words, was there a delivery of the deed by the grantor? The findings of the court as to the matter of delivery are fully supported by the evidence of the witness Hazen, and it is as to the sufficiency of those findings of fact to support a delivery of the deed that our attention will be directed. The findings are as follows: "(1) That on the day last named the said M. A. Hinkson delivered the said deed to P. J. Hazen, Esq., of Modesto, Cal., for the said plaintiff and defendant last named, and instructed the said Hazen to hold the same for said plaintiff and defendant without recording it until his, the said M. A. Hinkson's death, and thereupon to deliver the same to the said plaintiff and defendant. (2) That the said M. A. Hinkson then and there parted with all dominion over said deed, and reserved no right to recall it, or to alter its provisions, or to have or enjoy any other or further interest in said premises than to hold the use thereof until his death."

If the question here presented were a new one, or if the decisions of the courts of our sister states might be fairly said to divide as to what was the true rule of law applicable to such case, speaking for myself alone, I am not prepared to say but that the judgment in this case should be reversed, for the reason that the aforesaid findings indicate upon the part of the grantor an intention to make a post mortem disposition of his property, and such a thing cannot be done by deed. But the decisions of the courts of many states, promulgated by the most learned judges of those states, hold that the facts stated in the findings quoted constitute a valid delivery of the deed, and that the fee title forever passed from the grantor, and we deem the law settled in that regard. It may be conceded that the roads traveled by courts in arriving at this conclusion have not always been the same, but, whatever may have been the various lines of reasoning pursued, the same result has always been reached, and a valid delivery declared. We shall not enter into a discussion of the elementary principles of law supporting the proposition here involved, but content ourselves with a reference to the views of various courts as to the law applicable to the state of facts here presented. In the well-considered case of Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 460, the decision of the court upon this question concludes as follows: "If the owner of land desires to convey the same, but not to have his deed take effect until his decease, he can make a reservation of a life estate in the deed, or it may be done by the absolute delivery of the deed to a third person, to be passed to the grantee upon the decease of the grantor, the holder in such case being a trustee for the grantee." In Pruitsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 650, Chief Justice Dixon, speaking for the court, approved the doctrine cited from Cook v. Brown, supra, and declared the same rule in the following language: "As to the grantor, delivery is absolute and final, and so is his conveyance of the land, the title to which passes at once to the grantee, qualified only by the right of the grantor to use and occupy, or take and receive the rents and profits during his life, or until the event shall have happened upon which second delivery be made. The grantor in such case converts his estate into a life tenancy, and makes himself the tenant of the grantee. These conclusions result unavoidably from the certainty of the event upon which the second delivery is made to depend, and from the impossibility, under the circumstances, that the grantor will ever be able to recall or repossess himself of the deed. He delivers the writing, therefore, as his deed, always so to remain, and never to return to him, and it becomes presently operative, and the title vests immediately in the grantee." In Wheelwright v. Wheelwright, 2 Mass. 446, Chief Justice Parsons, in speaking to the question of delivery of a deed by the depository to the grantee after the death of the grantor, said: "If a grantor deliver any writing, as his deed, to a third person, to be delivered over by him to the grantee on some future event, it is the grantor's deed presently, and the third person is a trustee of it for the grantee; and if the grantee obtain the writing from the trustee before the event happen, it is the deed of the grantor, and he cannot avoid it by a plea of non est factum, whether generally or specially pleaded." In O'Kelly v. O'Kelly, 8 Metc. (Mass.) 439, Chief Justice Shaw said: "That a deed was made, executed, and acknowledged by the ancestor, was proved. The question was whether it was delivered so as to take effect, and pass the estate. If it was delivered by the grantor to any person in his lifetime, to be delivered to the grantee after his decease, it was a good delivery upon the happening of the contingency, and related back so as to divest the title of the grantor by relation, from the first delivery." In Taft v. Taft, 59 Mich. 185, 26 N. W. Rep. 426, Chief Justice Campbell, speaking for the court, said: "The other deed held by Mallory depends upon other considerations. If the deed had been delivered to him irrevocably on the simple consideration that he should transfer it to the defendant on the death of Aden Taft, it would come within several of our own decisions, and might therefore be valid upon their authority. Latham v. Udell, 38 Mich. 238; Wallace v. Harris, 32 Mich. 380. There is much authority elsewhere in favor of the same doctrine." The foregoing principles are also approved in Stephens v. Rinehart, 72 Pa. St. 434; Hathaway v. Payne, 34 N. Y. 92; Stone v. Duvall, 77 Ill. 475, and many cases from other states, not necessary to mention.

Upon a careful examination of the authorities cited by appellant, and other cases, bearing upon this question, not cited, we have failed to find a case supporting a contrary doctrine to that announced in the foregoing citations. In every case where the deed has been declared invalid by reason of failure of delivery, it will be found that the grantor reserved some rights over the instrument; that he failed to part with all control and dominion over it; that, upon the happening of some event or contingency or condition, he had the right, if so disposed, to reach out, and take it from the possession of the depository. Such is not the case under consideration, for here the court finds as a fact that "the grantor parted with all dominion over said deed." There are well-considered cases holding that, even though the grantor delivers the deed to the depository, reserving the right to recall it, yet if he dies without recalling it, and the deed is then delivered, such delivery is complete and entire, and carries title. We are not disposed to indorse that doctrine, and think the principle recognized in this case goes far enough for all proper purposes. The essential requisite to the validity of a deed transferred under circumstances as indicated in this case is that, when it is placed in the hands of the third party, it has passed beyond the control of the grantor for all time. That question is determined by the grantor's intention in the matter, and his intention in making the delivery is a question of fact, to be solved by the light of all the circumstances surrounding the transaction. As before intimated, the views of courts are not uniform as to how and when the deed takes effect. Prutsman v. Baker, supra, says the title passes, full and complete, upon the first delivery, and that the depository becomes the trustee of the grantee, and that the grantor holds a life estate in the property. Stone v. Duvall, supra, holds the first delivery to be an inchoate delivery. Many of the cases declare that the deed becomes operative upon the delivery by the depository after the death of the grantor, and that such delivery relates back to the first delivery for the purpose of carrying title. Section 767 of the Civil Code provides that a freehold may commence in futuro, and for that reason we are inclined to recognize the views of Chief Justice Dixon in Prutsman v. Baker, supra, as the true rule applicable to this class of cases in this state. We know of nothing in the Codes forbidding the doctrine announced in that case, to wit, that the grantor, upon the irrevocable delivery of the deed to the depository, thereupon constitutes such depository the trustee of the grantee, and creates in himself a tenancy for life.

Appellant offered in evidence a deed from M. A. Hinkson to A. C. Hinkson, and a deed back to M. A., of the realty here involved. These deeds were made subsequent to the deed which we have had under consideration, and were offered as tending to show the grantor's intentions at the time he made the original deed. The proposed evidence was rejected, and rightly so. The consideration in both deeds was nominal. They were executed about the same time, and were recorded upon the same day. It was a very poor attempt upon the part of the grantor to create evidence in his own favor. Neither was the grantor's order upon the depository to redeliver the deed to him proper evidence. If offered as tending to show a revocation of agency, it was immaterial, as the fact of revocation was not involved in the case. The question involved was the power of the grantor to revoke or recall the deed.

Appellant also offered in evidence a trust deed to the Sacramento bank, made some months subsequent to the delivery of the deed to Hazen, as tending to show the grantor's intentions in making the original deed; and it is now claimed that such an act upon the part of the grantor would be so inconsistent with an intention on his part to part with the title when he made the original deed that it should be admitted as throwing light upon that transaction. It was not even shown that the deed to the bank was a bona fide one, but, aside from that, a grantor cannot be allowed to undermine his deed either by words or acts. His declarations and acts made and done, in his own interest, months after the deed was delivered, are not admissible as indicating his intentions in delivering the deed. We think this principle elementary, and there is nothing in Dean v. Parker, 88 Cal. 283, 26 Pac. Rep. 91, trespassing upon that doctrine. For the foregoing reasons, let the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; FITZGERALD, J.; PATERSON, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. In the first place, I think the evidence fails to show that when Hinkson handed the deed to Hazen he parted with all control over it, etc., and also that the court erred in ruling out certain evidence offered for the purpose of showing what Hinkson's intention was. Furthermore, there was no delivery of the deed to the grantees named therein while the grantor was alive, and there could have been none after he was dead. It is contended that giving the deed to Hazen was a present delivery to the grantees; but the express instruction was that he was to keep it until after Hazen's death, and then to deliver it to the grantees, so that the delivery to the grantees was not to take place during Hinkson's lifetime. Hazen was not a grantee, and had no interest in the grant. He was a mere agent of Hinkson, and upon the death of the latter the agency ceased. The deed was a mere attempt at testamentary disposition of property, and, not being in the form prescribed for the execution of a will, was void. He ordered his agent to return the deed to him, and the agent should have obeyed, for, if it was of any value, he had as much right to revoke it as he would have had to revoke a will. But it was of no value, for it provided for an impossible thing,—the delivery of a deed by an agent after the death of his principal. If one desires to avoid the administration of his estate in probate, he may grant his property to a trustee, to whom a present delivery of the deed must be made, or he may grant his property, reserving a life estate, but there must be a present delivery of the deed to the grantees. The method of doing so, claimed to be effective in the case at bar, would not only lead to innumerable frauds, but is inconsistent with the fundamental principle that a dead man can do no act, and can have no agent to act for him. There are authorities, no doubt, holding differently from the views above expressed, but in my opinion they do not correctly declare the law, and should not be followed.

I think the judgment should be reversed.

WEINBURG v. SOMPS. (No. 14,748.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF APPLICATION—MISCONDUCT OF JURY—HOW SHOWN.

1. The mere failure to instruct the jury on a point cannot be assigned as a refusal so to do where there was no request for such instruction.

2. Where a witness is called in rebuttal, and then fully cross-examined as to a matter to which an objection was sustained when witness was first called, the error, if any, in sustaining the objection, is cured.

3. The application for a new trial because of the newly-discovered evidence of three witnesses showed that the materiality of their testimony appeared from the testimony of plaintiff, who testified in the morning of the first day of the trial, and that the trial closed at 1:30 on the second day; that a messenger was sent for one of the witnesses on the morning of the second day, but witness was away from home. No subpoena was issued for any of these witnesses, and no application was made for time to procure their attendance. Held, that the application failed to show reasonable diligence.

4. Where the jury agree that each shall write out the sum he thinks plaintiff is entitled to recover, and then divide the aggregate of such sums by 12, and that the quotient shall be the amount of the verdict, such verdict is determined by chance, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 657, subd. 2, providing that such misconduct of the jury may be shown by the affidavit of any of the jurors. Dixon v. Plums, (Cal.) 33 Pac. Rep. 268, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action for malicious prosecution by Moritz Weinburg against P. G. Somps. Plaintiff had judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gordon & Young, for appellant. J. G. Maguire and H. K. McJunkin, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for malicious prosecution of the plaintiff on a charge of having bought and received stolen property, for which he was tried in the police court and discharged. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, assessing his damages at $3,333, for which sum judgment was rendered. The defendant brings this appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. Counsel for appellant contend that the court erred in its instruction to the jury as to what constitutes probable cause for the criminal prosecution complained of. The exception upon which this point rests was taken at the close of the instructions given, and was in the following language: "I desire to except * * * to your instruction to the jury as to what constitutes probable cause, and your refusal to instruct the jury that it is for the court to determine what probable cause is, and not for the jury." Waiving the indefiniteness of the exception, it is a sufficient answer to this point that the court did instruct the jury as to what would constitute probable cause substantially as requested by defendant's counsel, and very nearly in the same language. Besides, the court was not requested to instruct that it was for the court, and not the jury, to determine what is probable cause; and consequently did not refuse so to instruct.

2. It is claimed that the evidence does not justify the finding of malice on the part of the defendant in causing plaintiff to be arrested, for the reason that the defendant acted on the advice of a police officer. But the evidence tends to prove that defendant did not state to that officer all the material facts within his knowledge bearing upon the question of malice, and that the officer did not know all such facts. It is, therefore, unnecessary to decide whether the advice of the police officer would have shielded the defendant from the charge of malice under any circumstances.

3. It is claimed that the court erred in sustaining an objection to a question asked plaintiff by defendant's counsel on cross-examination. But afterwards, when the plaintiff was called in rebuttal, he was fully examined by defendant's counsel as to the same matter in relation to which the objection had been sustained. This cured the alleged error, if it was error.

4. One of the grounds for a new trial was that of newly-discovered evidence, viz. the testimony of three witnesses, all residents of the city of San Francisco, (the place of trial,) whose testimony, as appears by their affidavits, will contradict a part of the testimony of the plaintiff on his own behalf as to special damages to his business. The proposed new testimony contradicts very little of the material testimony of the plaintiff, and probably would not have effected a change of the verdict. But, however this may be, I think it is not made to appear that defendant could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the trial the alleged new evidence. It appears that the trial was commenced on the morning of March 24th, and closed the next day about 1:30 p. m.; that plaintiff was the first witness examined, and that he gave the testimony sought to be contradicted before noon of the first day of the trial; that such testimony of the plaintiff related solely to his relations, dealings, and conversations with the newly-discovered witnesses,—Hartzman, Lachman, and Kuhn,—who must have known, and very probably remembered, whether plaintiff's testimony as to his relations, dealings, and conversations with them was true or false; that, after the adjournment of the court on March 24th, defendant was advised by his attorney to find out from Hartzman whether plaintiff's statements were true or false. Thereupon defendant instructed one of his employees, Morris Lewin, to find Hartzman, and make inquiries as to the truth of plaintiff's testimony. The affidavit of Lewin states that he was instructed to find Hartzman in the afternoon of March 24th; that about 8 o'clock next morning he found the residence of Hartzman, and then learned that he had gone to Alameda on business, and was not expected to return before evening of that day; that he waited around Hartzman's house several hours, hoping that he might return sooner than expected, but he did not; that he then returned to the court room about noon, when he learned that the evidence in the case was closed. He does not state that he had any difficulty in finding Hartzman's house, or that he tried to find it before the morning of March 25th. It does not appear that any effort was made to find either of the other two witnesses Lachman and Kuhn until some four or five days after the trial. No subpoena was issued for any of these witnesses, and no application was made to the court for time to procure their attendance. Do the affidavits of defendant and Lewin show that the new evidence could not, with reasonable diligence, have been discovered before the close of the trial? I think they do not since they fail to prove due diligence. That defendant did not know what the new witness would testify is no excuse. He had been notified by plaintiff's testimony that these witnesses knew the truth of the matters as to which plaintiff had testified, and would contradict him if his testimony was false. People v. Sutton, 73 Cal. 248, 15 Pac. Rep. 86; Klockenbaum v. Pierson, 22 Cal. 160; Stoakes v. Monroe, 36 Cal. 384. The case of Kenezleber v. Wahl, 92 Cal. 202, 28 Pac. Rep. 225, cited by respondent's counsel, does not answer their purpose, as that was an appeal from an order granting a new trial. In that case, as in this, the necessity for the newly-discovered evidence was first discovered at the trial, but the new witnesses resided 100 miles from the place of trial. And as to the means of discovering the new evidence the court said: "It is therefore evident that the plaintiff possessed no means by which he could discover the evidence which is alleged to be newly discovered, and that he had no knowledge of the evidence or of the witnesses by whom it could be established until after the trial." Besides, the usual deference was expressly paid to the discretion exercised by the judge who tried the case in granting the new trial.

5. Another ground upon which a new trial is asked is that of misconduct of the jury, in that 11 of the jurors were induced to assent to the verdict by a resort to the determination of chance. This point is supported by the following affidavit of a juror, to which there is no counter affidavit:

"[Title of court and cause.] State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.: J. P. Larsen, being first duly sworn, says on oath: I am one of the jurors who were impealed to try the above-entitled action. Said cause came on for trial on the 24th day of March, A. D. 1890, and was submitted to the jury for their verdict on the 25th day of March, A. D. 1890. Eleven of said jurors rendered their verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $3,333 on the said last-mentioned day. When the jury retired under the charge of the sheriff to consider their verdict in said case, some of the jurors considered the propriety of giving the sum of $10,000 damages, and one was in favor of rendering a verdict of $1 in favor of plaintiff. Being unable to agree as to the amount of their verdict, it was then agreed by and between said jurors that their verdict should be arrived at in the following manner, and that they should be bound by the result, to wit: That each juror should write on a slip of paper the amount to which he thought plaintiff was entitled, and, after doing so, their amounts should be added together and divided by twelve, and the quotient resulting therefrom, whatever the same should be, should be the verdict of said jury. That thereupon each of said jurors other than H. McCabe wrote down on a slip of paper the amount which he thought plaintiff was entitled. Some amounts of which were in excess of $5,000, the amount demanded by plaintiff. Said amounts were then added together and divided by twelve, the result of said division being the sum of $3,333, the amount of verdict by said jury. That when the division aforesaid resulted in a quotient of $3,333, such was taken as their verdict, in pursuance of said prior arrangement to be bound by said result, without further consultation or assent among them. J. P. Larsen."

"Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 10th day of May, A. D. 1890. H. P. Tricou, Notary Public."

On the authority of the late case of Dixon v. Pluns, decided by the court in bank, and filed May 31, 1893, 33 Pac. Rep. 268, I think this affidavit shows that the verdict was determined by chance, in the sense of the second subdivision of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, therefore, that the affidavit of the juror was admissible as evidence of the fact. But, inasmuch as the case of Dixon v. Plums, supra, overrules the case of Turner v. Water Co., 25 Cal. 397, on the authority of which respondent's counsel appear to have confidently relied, I think respondent should have an opportunity to file counter affidavits to that of the juror Larsen, and that the motion for new trial should be reheard and decided solely upon the alleged ground of misconduct of the jury, and upon such additional affidavits as may be offered by either party. To this end I think the order refusing a new trial should be reversed, the cause remanded, and the lower court instructed to rehear and decide the motion for new trial on the alleged ground of misconduct of the jury alone; and, upon such rehearing, to admit and consider such additional pertinent affidavits as may be filed by either party within 20 days after the filing of the remittitur.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order refusing a new trial is reversed, the cause remanded, and the lower court instructed to rehear and decide the motion for new trial on the alleged ground of misconduct of the jury alone, and upon such rehearing to admit and consider such additional pertinent affidavits as may be filed by either party within 20 days after the filing of the remittitur.

VALLEY LUMBER CO. v. WOOD. (No. 18,056.)

COUNTERCLAIM—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEA—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for goods sold and delivered, the allegation of a counterclaim of $1,700 for 171,000 bricks sold and delivered by defendant to plaintiff, no part of which has been paid, states sufficient facts to support a judgment for defendant.

2. In an action to which defendant pleaded a counterclaim for brick alleged to have been delivered to plaintiff corporation, the evidence was undisputed that the bricks mentioned in the answer were to be used in a certain building in which plaintiff had no interest. The contractor for the erection of the building testified that he ordered the bricks from defendant, while defendant testified that they were ordered by a member of an agency who were managing agents for plaintiff corporation, but there was no evidence to connect plaintiff with this transaction through the agency. Held, that the evidence did not justify a verdict for defendant on the counterclaim.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Valley Lumber Company, a corporation, against R. G. Wood. Defendant had judgment on a counterclaim, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. L. Cory, for appellant. Hinds & Merriam and F. H. Short, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover $586.39 for goods sold and delivered. The complaint is in two counts,—the first for $503.19 for goods sold and delivered by plaintiff; and the second for $83.20 on account of goods sold and delivered to defendant by Prescott & Pierce, copartners, assigned to plaintiff. The defendant made no denial of the first count, but denied that he was indebted to Prescott & Pierce in any sum exceeding $81.20; and further denied the alleged assignment by Prescott & Pierce to plaintiff. In addition to these denials, the defendant alleged, in substance, the following affirmative matters: (1) A counterclaim of $1,710 to the first count, for 171,000 bricks alleged to have been sold and delivered by defendant to the plaintiff in May, 1889, no part of which has been paid. (2) A counterclaim to the second count for 171,000 bricks, of the value of $1,710, alleged to have been sold and delivered by defendant to Prescott & Pierce in May, 1889, no part of which has been paid. (3) "And for a third and separate answer and defense to both alleged causes of action, and by way of counterclaim and cross complaint, defendant alleges" that in May, 1889, he sold and delivered to Prescott & Pierce 171,000 bricks, of the value of $1,710; and that in making the purchase of said bricks Prescott & Pierce were acting as agents of plaintiff, and made the purchase for the benefit of plaintiff, as defendant has since been informed and believes, though he had no knowledge of such agency at the time of the transaction. He therefore avers that Prescott & Pierce are necessary parties to the action, and prays for judgment against the plaintiff for $1,710 and such further relief, etc. (4) "For a further and separate answer and defense, and by way of counterclaim and for a cross complaint herein, defendant alleges" that in May, 1889, he sold, delivered, and furnished to Prescott & Pierce 171,000 bricks, of the value of $1,710, at their instance and request; and further avers that he is informed and believes the plaintiff was jointly interested in the transaction by which said bricks were sold as aforesaid, and interested in the profits of such transaction, if any there were; but at the time of the transaction defendant did not know that plaintiff was interested with Prescott & Pierce in the purchase; "wherefore defendant prays that said Prescott & Pierce be made parties hereto, and be duly cited to appear and to answer the cross complaint herein;" and further prays for a joint judgment against Prescott & Pierce and the plaintiff for the sum of $1,710 and costs, and such further relief, etc. There was no demurrer to any of these answers, and no motion to strike out, nor to require defendant to elect upon which of the inconsistent answers he would rely at the trial.

The plaintiff answered the so-called "cross complaints" by denying all the allegations thereof. All the pleadings were verified. The cause was tried by a jury, whose verdict was in favor of the defendant for the sum of $1,123.61, upon which judgment was rendered against the plaintiff. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

1. Appellant contends that none of the affirmative answers of the defendant states facts sufficient to constitute either a counterclaim or cross complaint, and that the judgment should be reversed for this reason. While it is clear that the facts stated do not constitute a cross complaint, I think the first plea states the substance of a valid counterclaim to the first count of the complaint, which, if proved, would have supported the verdict, since it exceeds the amount of both counts of the complaint by $1,123.61, which is just equal to the verdict. The record shows no ground upon which the apparent inconsistencies of the defenses can be considered here. Buhne v. Corbett, 43 Cal. 264; Uridias v. Morrell, 25 Cal. 31.

It is further contended that the evidence does not justify the verdict, in that it does not tend to prove that defendant ever sold or delivered any bricks to the plaintiff through the agency of Prescott & Pierce or otherwise; and it seems clear that this point should be sustained. It appears without controversy that all the bricks mentioned in the answers were to be used in the erection of a building known as the "Chamber of Commerce Building," owned by a stock company, in which the plaintiff was not interested; that one Joe Smith was the contractor for the erection of the building; that the bricks were delivered by defendant at the site of that building, and were used by the contractor in the erection of the building; that the company owning the building (the Chamber of Commerce Association) failed before the building was completed, having mortgaged the building for more than its value; that the work on the building was abandoned by the contractor; and that the building has not been completed. There is also undisputed testimony that the filing of liens by the contractor and material men would have been useless, because of the prior mortgage for more than the value of the property. It appears that Prescott & Pierce were copartners, principally engaged in dealing in grain, and that they were also managing agents for the plaintiff corporation, which had furnished lumber and lime used in the construction of the building of the value of $1,500 to $1,600, for which it had not been paid. It also appears that the 171,000 bricks mentioned in the different answers were the same that were used in the Chamber of Commerce Building, and that defendant delivered no other bricks. The contractor, Joe Smith, testified that he ordered the bricks from defendant; but the defendant flatly contradicted this, and testified that Prescott alone ordered the bricks. Prescott testified positively that he neither individually nor as agent for the plaintiff ever ordered the bricks, or promised to pay for them; and there is no testimony or circumstance to connect the plaintiff with the transaction through any agency. The testimony of the defendant tended to prove only that he sold the bricks to Prescott, or to Prescott & Pierce. I think the order and judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

WHELAN v. BRICKELL et al. (No. 15,074.)(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1893.)
HUSBAND AND WIFE — OCCUPATION OF GOVERNMENT LAND — BONA FIDE POSSESSOR — TRUST — ESTOPPEL.

1. In 1860 a married man went into possession of part of the government land known as the "outside lands" of San Francisco. In 1863 he died, and his wife, with their children, continued in possession, and was in possession at the passage of Act Cong. March 8, 1866, (14 Stat. 4,) relinquishing and granting the right and title of the United States in said lands to the city of San Francisco, in trust to be "disposed of and conveyed by said city, to parties in the bona fide actual possession thereof by themselves or tenants on the passage of this act," on such terms as the legislature should prescribe. While the husband and wife were in possession, they executed a declaration of homestead on the land under the California homestead act of 1862, by which the homestead estate, on the death of either, vested absolutely in the survivor. Thereafter the city ceded the land to the widow, she having complied with the various ordinances and legislative acts relative thereto. Held, that as she had bona fide actual possession at the passage of the act, no trust arose under the conveyance to her in favor of said children. Baker v. Brickell, 25 Pac. Rep. 489, 1067, 87 Cal. 329, followed.

2. Where land belongs to a wife, the fact that she, as administratrix of her husband, returned said land as assets of his estate, is immaterial, and does not estop her to claim it as her own. Baker v. Brickell, 25 Pac. Rep. 489, 1067, 87 Cal. 329, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Fairfax H. Whelan, administrator, against John Brickell and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. R. King, for appellant. A. N. Drown, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This case has been here in various forms several times. Brickell v. Batchelder, 62 Cal. 623; Batchelder v. Brickell, 75 Cal. 373, 17 Pac. Rep. 441; Batchelder v. Baker, 79 Cal. 266, 21 Pac. Rep. 754; and Baker v. Brickell, 87 Cal. 329, 25 Pac. Rep. 489, 1067. The case at bar must be affirmed upon the authority of the case last above mentioned,—87 Cal. 329, 25 Pac. Rep. 489, 1067. That case, it is true, was decided upon its merits, after a full trial, while in the case at bar judgment was rendered for defendants upon the sustaining of a demurrer to the complaint. There is an effort here to give the case a somewhat different phase, but it readily appears upon the face of the complaint that the material facts stated are the same as those passed upon in Baker v. Brickell. After a careful consideration of the briefs of counsel for appellants, we are satisfied that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and we do not think that further discussion of the case is necessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

McFAUL v. PFANKUCH et al. (No. 15,038.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1893.)

SCHOOL LANDS — RIGHTS TO PURCHASE CERTIFICATE — PLEADING — GENERAL DEMURRER.

1. A certificate for purchase of school lands is not conclusive of title in the holder, and is no bar to an action to contest the right of the holder to purchase such lands. Jacobs v. Walker, 18 Pac. Rep. 129, 76 Cal. 175, followed.

2. Though Pol. Code, § 3514, provides that a certificate of purchase of land by the register shall be prima facie evidence of title, such statute does not conclude the state, nor any one authorized by statute, from contesting it.

3. A person contesting the right to purchase of a holder of such certificate need not refund to him the money he has paid.

4. A complaint in an action to contest a certificate of purchase, which alleges that plaintiff's application to purchase, filed in the office of the surveyor general, contained the statement that plaintiff desired to purchase the land held by the person whose certificate of purchase he is contesting, and that he had made no contract to sell the same, and which further alleges that at the time such application was made the matters therein stated were true, sufficiently alleges that plaintiff desires to purchase the land, and that he has made no contract to sell the same.

5. Even though the complaint did not sufficiently allege such facts, an objection thereto should have been taken on the ground of uncertainty or indebtedness, and is not reached by general demurrer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; Robert McGarvey, Judge.

Action by W. E. McFaul against Frederic Pfankuch and others to contest Pfankuch's right to purchase certain school lands for which he held a certificate of purchase. There was judgment for defendants on demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff and Thomas P. Woodward, one of the defendants, appeal. Reversed.

T. L. Carothers and Carl T. Graef, for appellants.

J. A. Cooper, for respondents, on behalf of the proposition that when school land is purchased and paid for it is no longer the property of the state, cited Carroll v. Safford, 3 How. 461; Witherspoon v. Duncan, 4 Wall. 218.

HAYNES, C. Respondent Pfankuch, on January 6, 1882, applied to purchase certain school lands from the state. His application was approved March 15, 1883, and on August 28, 1883, a certificate of purchase was issued to him. On August 7, 1891, appellant Woodward applied to purchase the same lands, and on October 5, 1891, appellant McFaul also applied to purchase said lands. Protests were filed by McFaul and Woodward, respectively, against the right of Pfankuch to purchase, and the surveyor general referred the contests to the superior court of Mendocino county, and McFaul, in proper time, filed his complaint to determine the rights of the several parties to purchase. Woodward answered, and filed a cross complaint against all the other parties. Reid and wife and Pfankuch demurred to McFaul's complaint and Woodward's cross complaint. The demurrers were sustained, and judgment entered dismissing the said complaint and cross complaint. The Reids are alleged to have or claim some interest as assignees or purchasers from Pfankuch. The demurrers allege insufficiency of facts and the several statutes of limitation.

It is contended by respondents that McFaul and Woodward are not in privity with the paramount source of title, and are, therefore, barred by the statute. Section 3414 of the Political Code expressly recognizes contests "concerning a certificate of purchase or other evidence of title." That contests of this character may be maintained after such certificate is issued has been repeatedly decided. Gilson v. Robinson, 68 Cal. 539, 10 Pac. Rep. 193; Gould v. Lanterman, 70 Cal. 247, 11 Pac. Rep. 709; Jacobs v. Walker, 76 Cal. 175, 18 Pac. Rep. 129. It has been held that a contest cannot be made before the surveyor general in respect to the right to purchase land for which a patent has issued to one of the parties. Somo v. Oliver, 52 Cal. 378. Whether there is any other limitation than that arising from the issuance of the patent does not appear to have been decided.

Whether the state could be barred by lapse of time, where the patent has not been issued, it is not necessary to determine, as the statutory period for barring actions brought by the state had not expired. Code Civil Proc. § 315. The state was, therefore, not barred from maintaining an action to cancel the certificate of purchase issued to Pfankuch, if sufficient grounds existed therefor. It is obvious that, if the state is not barred, it is at liberty to grant the lands to any one who has a right to purchase, and conforms to the requirements of the statute in that behalf, if it shall be found that the prior applicant was not entitled to purchase under his application; nor is the state a necessary party to an action to determine that question. Cunningham v. Crowley, 51 Cal. 132, 133. The statute provides how that question shall be determined. It is not a question that the plaintiff may litigate of his own mere volition. A preliminary step must be taken by invoking the action of the surveyor general, and the order of that officer, referring the rights of the parties to the determination of the superior court, is not only necessary to enable the plaintiff to invoke the action of the court, but without such order the court has no jurisdiction to hear or determine the rights of the parties. Pol. Code, § 3415; Allen v. Dake, 50 Cal. 80; Keema v. Doherty, 51 Cal. 3; Vance v. Evans, 52 Cal. 93; Danielwitz v. Temple, 55 Cal. 42. The order made by the surveyor general is in the nature of a bill of interpleader, and binds the state by the result of the action, in which each of the applicants to purchase becomes an actor, and must establish his right to purchase to entitle him to judgment; and the surveyor general or register, as the case may be, must issue the certificate of purchase or other evidence of title, in accordance with the judgment. Pol. Code, § 3416. If by lapse of time the first applicant has acquired a right to the land, which, although invalid in its inception, the state could not resist, he must prevail; but if the state is not barred from asserting the invalidity of his application and the certificate based thereon, it does not lie in his mouth to say that the state shall not grant it to a subsequent applicant. Respondent's contention would, therefore, result in applying the statute of limitations prescribed for the individual in matters in which the state has no concern, and bar the state in a shorter period than that which it has prescribed for itself.

But it is further contended that appellants are not in privity with the state, which is the paramount source of title. That is, however, an immaterial question; for though they have no common-law right of action based upon their relation to the state or to the land, they have a statutory right, the statute itself being based upon a sound public policy, making the self-interest of the citizen the most effectual guard against fraud the state could devise.

Again, it is argued, in effect, that the certificate given to Pfankuch vested the title in him; that when the land is purchased and paid for it is no longer the property of the state; and to the last part of this proposition cases from the supreme court of the United States are cited. But these decisions are based upon a different statute. There a certificate of purchase is not given until proof is made that the law has been complied with, and the full amount of the purchase paid. Here the certificate is based upon the application to purchase and the payment of the first installment of the purchase money. Pol. Code, § 3514. This section, it is true, makes the certificate prima facie evidence of title; a title sufficient to protect the purchaser against a mere intruder, but which does not conclude the state, nor any one authorized by the statute, to contest it. Appellants, if they have brought themselves within the statute, cannot be obnoxious to respondent's charge that they are "mere intruders." To hold that they are concluded by the issuance of the certificate to Pfankuch would be to nullify the statute; while to make it prima facie evidence of title in a collateral proceeding, as in ejectment against an intruder, or in an action of trespass, is consistent with and sustains the statute. People v. Shearer, 30 Cal. 648, cited by respondents, involved the question of the right of the state to tax the lands of a pre-emptioner under the United States prior to the purchase, and has no application here. Churchill v. Anderson, 56 Cal. 56, also cited by respondents, is not in point. There a patent had issued to the plaintiff, and defendants' application to purchase had been denied. The action, therefore, could not be under this statute, and the court held that he did not, by his application to purchase, filed and rejected after the patent had issued, acquire such status as authorized him to claim that the legal title which had passed to plaintiff by the patent should be held in trust for him.

Again, it is contended that the fraud of Pfankuch did not injure appellants, and therefore furnishes no ground of relief. As an abstract proposition of law, it is true that fraud without injury furnishes no ground of relief. But it is quite sufficient to say in reply that the statute gives the right of action; nor is it quite clear that a citizen of the state, who has the right under the statute to purchase a certain parcel of land, and desires to purchase it, is not injured if he is prevented from doing so by a prior fraudulent attempt of another to purchase the same land.

Again, it is urged that neither the complaint nor the cross complaint contains any offer to return the purchase money paid by Pfankuch. The statute does not make it the duty of the contestant to refund to him the money he has paid, nor offer to credit appellants with such payment, and therefore, if appellants reimbursed him, they would, in effect, be required to pay a greater price for the land than that fixed by the state, and at which they were entitled to purchase. Neither of the appellants received any money from Pfankuch or the Reids, nor any credit or right of credit from the state upon their proposed purchase, and therefore the cases cited by respondents (U. S. v. White, 9 Sawy. 131, 17 Fed. Rep. 561, and People v. Bryan, 73 Cal. 377, 14 Pac. Rep. 893) have no application. Those were actions to annul patents brought by the United States and this state, respectively, who had issued them, and who had received, and then had, the money paid by the defendants.

Respondents further insist that there are other defects in said complaint and cross complaint which are fatal to their sufficiency. As to the complaint, it is said that there is no allegation that plaintiff desires to purchase the land for his own use and benefit, nor that he has made no contract or agreement to sell the same, etc. All these matters, it is conceded, are alleged in paragraph 3 of the complaint to have been stated in plaintiff's affidavit, made October 6, 1891, and filed in the office of the surveyor general, and which constituted his application to purchase; and in paragraph 4 of the complaint it is alleged "that at the time of making said affidavit and application all the matters and things therein stated were, ever since have been, and now are, true." This, it is said, does not show that on December 9th, the day the complaint was filed, he was an actual settler upon said land, or that he then desired to purchase for his own use and benefit, etc. We think the complaint is not justly subject to the criticism made. But, even if it were, such objection should have been taken upon the ground of uncertainty or indefiniteness, and is not reached by a general demurrer. It is required by the Code that special objections of this character shall be directly called to the attention of the court and the pleader, so that, if deemed defective in point of form or of certainty, an amendment may be made. The objections to the cross complaint are entirely similar. The affidavit and application of purchase were attached as exhibits, and in the body of the cross complaint were properly referred to and averred to be true at the dates of making and filing and ever since.

The judgments appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to overrule both demurrers, with leave to answer.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. The judgments appealed from are reversed, and the court below is directed to overrule both demurrers, with leave to answer.

WHITE v. WHITE. (No. 14,848.)

DIVORCE—ALIMONY AND COSTS.

1. Under a judgment in a divorce proceeding, requiring "all costs, expenses, and disbursements provided for and contemplated in this decree or judgment" to be paid by the plaintiff exclusively out of his separate property, defendant has no right to include in her cost bills items not taxable as costs.

2. Motions in a divorce proceeding for the payment to defendant of her costs and disbursements, and for permission to plaintiff to mortgage his property in order to pay alimony, counsel fees, and other expenses of the litigation, are addressed to the discretion of the court.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene Garber, Judge.

Action by George E. White against Frankie White for a divorce. From certain orders in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry E. Highton, H. C. McPike, and J. A. Cooper, for appellant. Barclay Henly and E. D. Wheeler, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The transcript in this case presents three appeals, based upon three separate bills of exceptions; the first from an order striking out certain items in two of defendant's bills of costs, the second from an order denying defendant's application for a further allowance for costs and expenses, and the third from an order allowing the plaintiff to mortgage his property. Each of the orders appealed from was made on the 24th day of June, 1891. In order that there may be a proper understanding of the questions involved in these appeals, a brief history of the case should be stated. The plaintiff commenced the action in December, 1885, to obtain a divorce from the defendant. The defendant answered, denying the charges made against her, and also filed a cross complaint, in which she stated facts entitling her to a divorce, and prayed that she be granted a divorce from the plaintiff. While the case was pending in the trial court, on application of defendant, an order was made requiring the plaintiff to pay to her sums of money aggregating $3,850, for costs and expenses, alimony and counsel fees; the item for costs and expenses being $250. From this order an appeal was taken by the plaintiff to this court, and the order was affirmed in July, 1887. 73 Cal. 105, 14 Pac. Rep. 393. In October and November, 1887, two other orders were made, requiring the plaintiff to pay to defendant the further sums of $250 and $518, for costs and expenses. The case was tried in April, 1888, and after it was submitted for decision the court made another order, requiring the plaintiff to pay to defendant the sum of $1,263.65 for additional costs and expenses. On May 15, 1889, judgment was entered denying a divorce to the plaintiff and granting one to the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed to this court, and the judgment was affirmed in October, 1890. 86 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. Rep. 996. The plaintiff also appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial of the case, and that appeal was subsequently dismissed. There were two other appeals from orders relating to attorneys' fees, and the decisions are reported in 86 Cal., at pages 212 and 216, 24 Pac. Rep., at pages 1030 and 1031. Afterwards, in December, 1890, an order was made requiring the plaintiff to pay to defendant the sum of $7,500 for attorneys' fees. The plaintiff appealed from this order, and his appeal was dismissed on March 24, 1891. 88 Cal. 429, 26 Pac. Rep. 236.

The facts leading up to the present appeals are as follows:

1. Upon the dismissal of plaintiff's appeal from the order denying his motion for a new trial, and within the time allowed by law, defendant served and filed her bill of costs on the appeal, which contained the following item: "Printing respondent's points and authorities, filed February 23, 1891, $125.00." And again, upon the dismissal of the appeal from the order of December, 1890, and in proper time, defendant served and filed another bill of costs, containing this item: "Printing of defendant's brief on her motion to dismiss, March 5, 1891." Subsequently the plaintiff moved that each of these items be stricken out of the cost bills upon the ground that it "is not a proper item of the same, and that the amount is unreasonable, and excessive." The court granted the motion, and hence the first appeal.

It is admitted by appellant that the items stricken out were not properly taxable costs, but it is claimed that they were necessary expenses in the case, which the plaintiff, by the express provisions of the judgment, was required to pay, and hence that it was error to strike them out of the cost bills. The clause of the judgment referred to is, "that all costs, expenses, and disbursements provided for and contemplated in this decree or judgment be borne and paid by the plaintiff exclusively out of his separate property." There was no error in the rulings complained of. Under the clause of the judgment quoted, the appellant had no right to include in her cost bills items not taxable as costs. If they were necessary expenses, and not already sufficiently provided for, application should have been made to the court for a further or additional allowance for that purpose.

2. On May 2, 1891, counsel for defendant served notice on the plaintiff that they would move the court for an order requiring the plaintiff to pay to defendant an additional sum of $2,510, to reimburse and enable her to pay her costs and disbursements from April 20, 1888, (the date of her last allowance for costs,) to date; and also for an order requiring the plaintiff to pay her the sum of $500, to enable her to prosecute the action. The notice stated that the motion would be made upon the ground that the defendant had no means whatever to prosecute the action; that by the terms of the decree entered in the case plaintiff was required to pay all costs and disbursements out of his separate property; and that the sums asked for were reasonable and necessary to bring the litigation to a close. The motion was submitted, and, after consideration, denied by the court, and hence the second appeal.

It is claimed for appellant that this ruling was erroneous because it clearly appeared from the affidavits made by her and read on the hearing that all the items forming the larger sum asked for had been expended by her in connection with the case, and not before allowed, and that they were necessary expenses and disbursements; and also that the smaller sum asked for was necessary to enable her to protect her rights, and have the litigation brought to an end. On the other hand, it is claimed for respondent that the affidavit made by him and read on the hearing effectually controverted all the material facts stated in appellant's affidavits, and fully justified the ruling. We think respondent's claim in this regard must be sustained. The motion was addressed to the discretion of the court, and such an order will not be reversed on appeal, unless it clearly appears that that discretion was abused. After carefully reading the affidavits and other proofs brought up in the record, we are unable to see any such abuse of discretion as would justify a reversal here.

3. In May, 1891, a motion was made that plaintiff be permitted to mortgage his property to the extent of $8,000, "to enable him to pay alimony and counsel fees and other expenses necessary to the carrying on of the litigation between plaintiff and defendant." The motion was made and contested upon affidavits of the respective parties, and, after consideration, an order was entered permitting the plaintiff to mortgage his property to the extent of $6,000; and hence the third appeal here presented.

It is claimed that this order was erroneous, because (1) by the decree of divorce all of the community property of the parties was awarded to the defendant; (2) at the date of the making of the order no segregation of the property had taken place, and presumptively all property acquired by the plaintiff subsequent to the date of his marriage was community property; and (3) the mortgage was desired by the plaintiff solely for the purpose of incumbering property involved in the action, and hindering and delaying the defendant from recovering any and all property which, under the decree, she was or might be justly entitled to. The motion was also, in our opinion, addressed to the discretion of the court, and upon the showing made the order cannot be reversed. It is unnecessary to state the facts. See White v. White, (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 600, where a similar order was affirmed.

It follows that each of the orders appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the orders appealed from are affirmed.

William Darby and Oscar A. Trippett, for appellants. Collier & Haines, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce the lien of an assessment on the lot of defendants in the city of San Diego for street work alleged to have been done by plaintiff under a contract awarded to him by the city council, and executed on the part of the city by the superintendent of streets. The complaint is in the usual form. The answer, after denying the alleged contract, averred, and the court found, "that at all the times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint the city of San Diego was a municipal corporation of the fourth class, organized and existing under an act of the legislature of the state of California entitled 'An act to provide for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations,' approved March 13, 1883; that, at all times mentioned in the plaintiff's complaint herein, said plaintiff, John G. Capron, was a school trustee of the said city of San Diego, duly elected, qualified, and acting as such school trustee for the Third ward of the city of San Diego." The court also found, generally, that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and gave judgment for plaintiff. The defendants have appealed from the judgment, and also from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

On the appeal from the judgment, appellants contend that on the findings of fact the judgment should have been in their favor, "or the reason that the alleged contract was prohibited and made void by section 628 of the said act of the legislature of March 13, 1883, which provides that no officer of a city of the fourth class, organized under said act, "shall be interested in any contract to which the city is a party, and any contract contrary to the provisions hereof shall be void." Substantially the same point is made on the appeal from the order denying a new trial, by exception to the finding of the alleged contract; the evidence, without conflict, showing that the plaintiff was an officer of the city, namely, school trustee, at all the times mentioned in the complaint, as specially found by the court. But since this special finding of the official character of the plaintiff, so far as it affects the validity of the contract, is a controlling qualification of the general finding "that each and all the allegations of the complaint are true," the ground upon which the point is made sufficiently appears upon the judgment roll. I think the point is well taken on the appeal from the judgment and should be sustained. The alleged contract of the city with plaintiff was plainly prohibited and declared void by section 628 of the municipal corporation act of March 13, 1883. Therefore, there was no contract to support the subsequent proceedings, and consequently no valid assessment upon the lot of the defendants. Manning v. Den, 90 Cal. 610, 27 Pac. Rep. 435; Burke v. Turney, 54 Cal. 486; Daly v. San Francisco, 72 Cal. 154, 13 Pac. Rep. 321; Dougherty v. Hitchcock, 35 Cal. 512. The city council being prohibited from awarding the contract, the award of it to the plaintiff was a nullity, and did not authorize its execution by the superintendent of streets, whose power to that end must come from a valid award of the contract by the city council.

Counsel for respondent contend, however, that the award of the contract was not a nullity, since the "qualifications and eligibility of bidders are matters to be passed upon and determined by the council, with the single limitation that they must reject all bids other than the lowest regular bid of any responsible bidder." The ready answer to all this is that the "limitation" mentioned is not the only limitation upon the power of the council. They are also required to reject all bids of city officers, and the express statutory penalty of transgressing this limitation is that the contract "shall be void."

It is further contended by respondent that the exclusive remedy for the error of the city council in awarding the contract to an officer of the city was by petition of remonstrance provided for in section 3 of the act of March 18, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147,) as follows: "At any time before issuance of the assessment roll, all owners of lots or lands liable to assessment therein, who, after the first publication of said resolution of intention, [to do the work,] may feel aggrieved, or who may have objections to any of the subsequent proceedings of the said council in relation to the performance of the work mentioned in said notice of intention, shall file with the clerk a petition of remonstrance, wherein they shall state in what respect they feel aggrieved, or the proceedings to which they object. Such petition or remonstrance shall be passed upon by the said city council, and its decisions therein shall be final and conclusive." In Manning v. Den, supra, it was said, in relation to the effect of a failure to appeal to the council under section 11 of said act, "that which was void does not become valid by reason of a failure to appeal." By parity of reason it would seem that neither a void award of a street contract, nor a void contract upon such award, would become valid by failure to file a petition of remonstrance under section 3 of the act, and, if not, that all subsequent proceedings dependent upon a valid contract must also be invalid. Besides, the construction of the provision for petition of remonstrance contended for by counsel for respondent would necessarily result in nullifying all limitations of the power of the council in regard to contracts for street work. If, in cases of this kind, the lot owners have no other remedy than by petition of remonstrance, and the decision of the council upon such petition is final and conclusive, it surely follows that the council have power to award all street contracts to its own members, and then, upon this coram nobis process, to conclusively affirm its own award. The possibility of such a result could not have been contemplated or intended by the legislature. Nor would it follow from a proper application of the provision of the Code. The provision authorizing a petition of remonstrance against the acts and proceedings of the city council was intended to be applicable only to acts and proceedings within the power of the council. Thus limited in its application, the provision has ample scope for operation and effect, without the possibility of any absurd consequence. The case of Manning v. Den, supra, fully answers the contention that the defendants had an adequate remedy by appeal from the subsequent acts and proceedings of the superintendent of streets.

It is further contended that the act of March 18, 1885, provides a complete system of street improvement, and was therefore intended to supersede and repeal all such parts of the municipal corporation act of 1883 as pertain to contracts for street improvements. While the act of 1883 embraces many more topics than that of 1885, both are general acts, and the latter does not expressly repeal any part of the former. Nor is it pretended that the giving of full effect to section 628 of the former act in this case would be inconsistent with any provision of the act of 1885. But it is claimed that section 628 of the former act is inconsistent with that part of section 5 of the act of 1885 which provides that under the circumstances therein specified a street contract shall be awarded to the owners of a majority of the frontage upon the street to be improved, since it would prevent such award of the contract in case any one of the owners of a majority of the frontage happened to be an officer of the city. The question whether this alleged inconsistency exists is not involved in this case, and need not be decided, for, conceding the alleged inconsistency, it could effect a repeal of the former act by implication only to the extent of the conflict. An implied repeal to that extent would only make an exception to the rule that no officer of a city shall be interested in a contract to which the city is a party, which exception might have been expressly incorporated in section 628 of the act of 1883. This case would still remain within the rule, and not within the exception. Ex parte Smith, 40 Cal. 419; People v. Fair, 43 Cal. 154. The repeal of statutes by implication is not favored. "In order for a subsequent act to repeal a former it should appear from the last act that it was intended to take the place of, or repeal, the former, or that the two acts are so inconsistent that force and effect cannot be given to both." In re Yick Wo, 68 Cal. 304, 9 Pac. Rep. 139; Christy v. Board, 39 Cal. 10. Full force and effect can be given to section 628 of the act of 1883 in this case without the slightest conflict or interference with any part of the act of 1885; and it does not appear that it was the intention of the legislature that any part of section 628 of the former should be superseded by the latter. While the latter act regulates the manner in which contracts for street improvements shall be awarded, and the work shall be done, it does not purport to define or treat of the eligibility or disqualifications of contractors. Evidently, these were supposed to have been sufficiently provided for by former acts, viz. Pol. Code, §§ 920, 922, and the act of March 13, 1883, which are perfectly consistent with each other, although the latter contains provisions in addition to those found in the former. If the eligibility of contractors is at all affected by the latter act, as contended by counsel, it is so only by implication from an incidental contingency, which has not happened in this case, and probably was not contemplated by the legislature as liable to happen in any case. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the court below directed to render judgment on the findings for defendants.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the court below is directed to render judgment on the findings for defendants.

RANDAL v. TATUM et al. (No. 14,391.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1893.)
LANDLORD AND TENANT—CONDITION OF LEASE—BREACH—SURETIES—TENDER.

1. A lease provided that the same should not be assigned without the lessor's consent, and that, if default be made, the lessor might declare the lease forfeited. Held that, where the lessor accepted rent of the tenant under an assignment of the lease to which he did not consent, he could not afterwards declare the assignment void, and hold the lessee's sureties liable as for a breach of the lease.

2. Where the landlord refuses to accept rent from the tenant, though the offer to pay is not continued by a deposit of the amount, and notice thereof to the landlord, pursuant to Civil Code, § 1500, providing for the extinguishment of an obligation by a tender of performance, the offer of the tenant is a sufficient tender of performance under section 2839 to release the tenant's sureties.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by James B. Randal against H. L. Tatum and J. J. Bowen to recover rent of certain premises as sureties for the lessee. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pringle, Hayne & Boyd, for appellant. Langhorne & Miller, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals from an order granting defendants a new trial. The action is against sureties upon a bond given by the lessee, to recover rent for the period of nine months, in the payment of which it is alleged default has been made. Defendants claim that the rent has been duly tendered, month by month, as it fell due, and therefore there has been no default. There was a covenant in the lease to the effect that the lessee would not assign without the written consent of the lessor; also a condition that, if default were made, the landlord might re-enter and take possession without previous notice or demand. The bond was conditioned that the lessee "shall in all things stand to and abide by and well and truly keep and perform the covenants, conditions, and agreements in the written lease contained on his or their part to be kept and performed at the time and in the manner and form therein specified," etc. The lease bore date July 17, 1882, and was for the term of 10 years. March 4, 1885, the lessor gave the tenants, George A. Davis & Co., written permission to assign to H. L. Tatum, who was one of the sureties, and is a defendant herein; and the lease was assigned in accordance with the permission on the same day. Tatum did not take possession of the demised premises, and it was evidently not expected that he would; for plaintiff testified that he understood that Davis was financially embarrassed, and that Tatum, as surety, desired the assignment, so that he might have no trouble with the creditors of Davis. June 9, 1885, Tatum assigned to H. G. Billings, who entered under the lease and took possession of the premises, and on the 18th of the same month assigned to his wife, E. A. Billings. The last two assignments were made without the consent of the lessor in writing or otherwise. E. A. Billings carried on the business of selling agricultural implements, which were stored on the demised premises which was a warehouse. The Gloster & Davis Implement Company was a copartnership composed of D. M. Gloster and M. F. Lauden. They acted as the agents of E. A. Billings in the sale of the goods kept by her at the warehouse. Davis had no interest in the business, but his name was retained to secure the good will of the business formerly conducted by George A. Davis & Co., and Davis was employed for a few months as clerk. The agents were not let into possession of the warehouse, but were furnished with duplicate keys, so that they could have access to it when necessary. It was understood that E. A. Billings retained possession, and H. E. Billings attended to her part of the business as her agent. Rents were paid by E. A. Billings regularly as they fell due until April 15, 1887, either by H. E. Billings, as her agent, or by the Gloster & Davis Implement Company, and by them charged to her. Receipts were given in the name of George A. Davis & Co., until February 15, 1886, and thereafter, until December, 1886, in the name of the Gloster & Davis Implement Company, and thereafter, until April, 1887, in the name of H. G. Billings, agent, and thereafter until September, 1887, in the name of D. M. Gloster.

The plaintiff claims, and the court found, that plaintiff supposed that Davis was a member of the firm of the Gloster & Davis Implement Company until April, 1887, when he admits that he was informed of the assignments and the claim of E. A. Billings. The rents sued for accrued after that time. H. E. Billings testified that he informed plaintiff of the facts as early as December, 1886, and the finding of the court that plaintiff did not know that Davis was not a member of the firm is not attacked on the motion for a new trial as unsupported by the evidence. The partnership styled the Gloster & Davis Implement Company was dissolved about March, 1887, and Gloster, in the nighttime, forcibly entered and took possession of the warehouse, ousting E. A. Billings, and kept possession until June, 1888, when E. A. Billings recovered possession through legal proceedings, in which she claimed under the lease from plaintiff. The rent due in April, 1887, was paid by D. M. Gloster, and also by E. A. Billings through H. G. Billings, agent. The first payment was by Gloster, and then Billings tendered the rent to Randal, showed him the lease and the various assignments, and was told by Randal, in ignorance that the rent had already been paid, to pay it to his clerk, which was done. Upon discovering the fact of the double payment, plaintiff offered to return to Billings the rent he had paid, and, when Billings refused to receive it, deposited the amount in a bank, and notified Billings of the fact in writing, stating that he had never recognized Billings except as the messenger of the Gloster & Davis Implement Company, or of D. M. Gloster, and did not wish to deal with him in the future in any capacity, adding: "The Gloster & Davis Implement Co., and D. M. Gloster, as the successor of said company, are the only ones whom I have and do now recognize as my tenants," etc. As a matter of fact, neither the company nor Gloster had any interest under the lease, or any color of right, but Billings was the real owner of the term, and had paid the rent up to that month, when Gloster forcibly took possession. He claimed, however, that the partnership had been in possession, and had paid the rent, and that he had succeeded to the rights of the partnership. Plaintiff claims that in accepting rents prior to April, 1886, he did so in ignorance of the fact that there had been a second assignment; but there is no question but that he was fully advised at that time. He nevertheless continued to receive rents from Gloster, and to refuse them from E. A. Billings, until August, 1888, when Gloster, having been sued by Billings to recover possession, ceased to pay. E. A. Billings, however, notwithstanding the refusal and the notice that plaintiff would not recognize her or receive rents from her, continued month by month to tender the rent to plaintiff at the time it fell due under the terms of the lease, during the entire period in which the rent sued for accrued. Plaintiff invariably refused to accept it from her, saying that he would receive rents only from Gloster, because he was in possession. E. A. Billings did not, when plaintiff refused to receive her money in payment of rents, deposit the same or any of it in a bank or elsewhere, in compliance with the provisions of section 1500, Civil Code.

Motion for a new trial was made by defendants upon several grounds, including the claim that the findings are not sustained by the evidence, under which head many specifications are made. Also upon the ground that the judgment upon the findings should have been for defendants. One specification in respect to the insufficiency of the evidence was the finding to the effect that plaintiff, when he received rents from Billings as agent, and from the Gloster & Davis Implement Company, believed that Davis was a member of that company, and that Billings was agent of the company or of Gloster. It cannot be denied that the evidence on this point is conflicting. Upon the theory adopted by counsel on both sides, and by the court, it was most material, for it tended to show that the plaintiff had not recognized the lease as continuing after knowledge of the second assignment. Indeed, the findings consist solely of probative facts, except as to finding No. 1, to the effect that all the allegations of the complaint are true. This, therefore, stands in the place of a finding that E. A. Billings, when she tendered the rent, was not the owner of the term. Upon the theory adopted by all parties, this was the turning point in the case. Appellant's counsel say it is but a probative fact, tending to establish the ultimate fact, that plaintiff did not intend by the receipt of rent to release the sureties; but there was no issue in the case as to whether plaintiff intended to release the sureties. It was not claimed that he did, nor did it matter. It seems to me that, if he accepted rent from any one eo nomine, as he admits he did after knowledge of the second assignment, it was enough; but that was not the view adopted below. As we must presume, therefore, that the court below concluded that one of the findings upon which judgment was based was unsupported by the evidence, and has granted a new trial, the order ought not to be reversed here, at least unless we are convinced that the other findings will support the judgment.

As the plaintiff did not attempt to forfeit the lease, but, on the contrary, affirmed its continuance by bringing this suit to recover rents which accrued under it, he could not claim that the second assignee acquired nothing by the assignment. The lessor did not have the option of declaring the assignment void, but it was his privilege, if he desired to avail himself of it, to forfeit the lease, and end the term; that is, if the condition continued after the first assignment. Whether it was renewed by the first assignment, made with the consent of the landlord, we do not, therefore, inquire. The lease, as we have seen, contained both a condition that the term might be forfeited if assigned without consent and a covenant not to assign. But an assignment in violation of the covenant was not absolutely void. If so, it would not be also a condition, for that would be the creation of an estate conditioned upon an impossible event. But, if authority is needed on such a proposition, it can be had. The point was expressly adjudged in Paul v. Nurse, 8 Barn. & C. 486. The effect of this decision is thus set out in Smith, Landl. & Ten. 117: "The landlord sued the assignee of the lessee for nonpayment of rent. The defendant pleaded that before the rent became due he had assigned to a third person, and to this the plaintiff replied that there was a covenant in the lease by which the lessee had covenanted for himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, not to assign without the consent of the lessor, and that no consent had been given. It was held that this replication was bad on demurrer, since the covenant by the lessee did not render the assignment by the assignee void, and the liability of the defendant as assignee was at an end when he parted with the estate. The court intimated that the landlord's remedy might be on the covenant not to assign, meaning apparently that the lessee might be sued on it in respect of the assignment by the assignee, if this assignment could be brought within the terms of the covenant, by which the lessee only covenanted for himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he, his executors or administrators, would not assign." In Webster v. Nichols, 104 Ill. 160, it is said: "The clause in the lease providing that the premises shall not be assigned without the written consent of the lessors is clearly for the benefit of the lessors. It does not render the assignment, when otherwise made, absolutely void, but voidable only, at the option of the lessors or their representatives. But even if the lessors, instead of here attempting, as they now are, to enforce rights under an assignment otherwise made, were attempting to have such an assignment declared void, they could not succeed. They have knowingly accepted rent from Abiah G. Webster since she has been in possession as purchaser from Gage, and this concludes them, for it is well settled that 'any act done by a landlord knowing of a cause of forfeiture by his tenant, affirming the existence of the lease, and recognizing the lessee as his tenant, is a waiver of such forfeiture.'" Although in that case the court uses the expression that the landlord has the option to avoid the assignment, the whole quotation shows that the meaning is that the landlord may end the term. The question was whether the assignment was valid. The landlord not only refused to consent to the assignment, but refused to recognize the assignees as her tenants, and received rent from them only as subtenants. In Den v. Post, 25 N. J. Law, 289, the tenant having assigned in violation of such a covenant, the landlord re-entered and took possession. There was no stipulation that the landlord might so enter on the breach of the covenant. It was held that the assignee could recover possession from the landlord, who contended that the assignment was void. The court said: "No ejectment can be maintained by the landlord for a mere breach of the covenant not coupled with a proviso for a re-entry. His only remedy would be an action for breach of covenant. Neither the lease nor the assignment is avoided by reason of the breach of covenant." Wilson v. Phillips, 2 Bing. 13; Platt, Cov. 424.

Plaintiff's counsel do not really contend that the assignment was void, and did not pass the term. Their contention seems to be, although not so expressed, that the sureties cannot rely upon an offer to perform, made by one who could have no rights under the lease save by a violation of its covenants. But the first question here is, has there been a failure on the part of the tenant to perform the covenant to pay rent? If E. A. Billings was the legal owner of the term, she was the proper person to pay the rent, and if her offer was performance there has been no breach of that condition or covenant. Has there been then such breach of the covenant to pay rent as will make the sureties liable? Admitting that E. A. Billings was the owner of the term, (and we have concluded she was,) there seems hardly room for doubt upon this point. Leaving out of view any right plaintiff may have had to avoid the lease for the violation of the covenant not to assign, could he have ousted the tenant because she did not deposit the money in a bank, and notify him of the fact? No one, I think, would have the hardihood to contend that he could. If he could not, then it must follow that there has been no breach of the covenant to pay rent, and the sureties are not liable. We are not now treating of a tender which would extinguish a debt, nor inquiring whether there has been such a tender of money due as will relieve sureties from liability, but whether there has been a breach of a covenant. Plaintiff's contention is founded upon the wording of our Code, which he claims has changed the common-law rule. It is admitted that, independently of the lease, an offer to pay and a refusal by the creditor will release the sureties, although the tender were not kept good. Keeping this common-law rule in mind, and that the Code is, in general, intended to declare existing rules, I think it plain that the Code has not changed the rule in this respect. Section 2839, Civil Code, is as follows: "Performance of the principal obligation, or an offer of such performance, duly made, as provided in this Code, exonerates a surety." It is claimed that the phrase "duly made as provided in this Code," refers to section 1500, in regard to tender, and necessitates a deposit, or it will not amount to an offer. Section 1500 does not provide what shall be sufficient as an offer of performance of a contract. It is an advance upon the common-law rule that a debtor must keep his offer good, but cannot extinguish the obligation in providing a mode for the absolute extinguishment of the debt. The other sections of the chapter define what shall constitute such performance or offer to perform as will prevent the person making the offer from being in default in the performance of his contract, and will give a right of action in case performance is not accepted. But section 1500 itself, read in the light of the prevailing rule, clearly shows that the deposit is no part of the offer. The offer shall have a certain effect if the deposit is made. This is made more obvious by the other provisions in regard to an offer. Section 1502, for instance, provides that the title to the thing offered passes to the creditor if the debtor at the time signifies that such was his intention. Section 1504: The offer of payment duly made, though the title of the thing offered be not transferred, stops the running of interest. Section 1511: As to what will excuse an offer. Certainly the existence of such reasons would not extinguish an obligation to pay money. Section 1515: A refusal is equivalent to an offer of performance. It could not be equivalent to an offer followed by a deposit as provided in section 1500. Even if the obligation of defendants must be regarded as that of sureties for the payment of a debt, still I think the tender sufficient to discharge the sureties. I recommend that the order be affirmed.

PETERSEN v. TAYLOR. (No. 15,116.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1893.)

ACTION FOR TRUST FUNDS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—LIMITATIONS—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. Plaintiff alleged that defendant collected money belonging to another, and agreed to hold it till a dispute as to its ownership was settled, giving a written acknowledgment that he so held it; that such dispute was settled; and the assignment of claimants' rights to plaintiff. Defendant's answer admitted receipt of the money, but denied plaintiff's other averments. Defendant also pleaded a former judgment on the same cause of action. Plaintiff put in evidence defendant's written acknowledgment and the assignments to himself, and one of his assignors testified that defendant had not paid the money. Defendant did not put in evidence any memorandum of settlement, nor the judgment pleaded by him. He admitted his signature to the acknowledgment, but said that he had no memory of the matter, and he failed to contradict any of plaintiff's testimony. Held, that a verdict for defendant was not justified.

2. A certificate that the maker thereof holds certain money to abide settlement of disputes as to its ownership creates an express trust, with no definite time fixed for its termination by payment, and hence limitations will not run against a claim on such certificate until the true owner has been ascertained, and a demand made by one showing a right to the money.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by H. M. Petersen against Joseph W. Taylor. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Nagle & Nagle, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appeal from judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The complaint states three causes of action, the second and third, however, being different counts upon the same matter. The first cause of action is to recover $125, moneys alleged to have been received by defendant for the use of plaintiff on the — day of December, 1887. The first count on the second cause of action is for moneys had and received, amounting to $655, and the second count is for the same sum, alleging the facts substantially as follows: That on July 2, 1884, defendant collected from the city of San Francisco said sum on two certain judgments, one in favor of B. Bonnett, and the other of C. H. Parker; that defendant agreed to hold said money until certain disputes should be settled between B. Bonnett and Eli Bonnett as to which was entitled to the money, whereupon defendant signed and delivered to Eli Bonnett, for the benefit of all parties, the following paper: "This is to certify that I have the sum of $655, collected from the city and county of San Francisco in the suits of B. Bonnett and C. H. Parker against the city and county of San Francisco, claimed by Eli Bonnett, but attached in the suits of Petersen vs. Bonnett, as the money of B. Bonnett, to abide settlement or suit against me to determine the ownership of said sum. [Signed] Jos. W. Taylor. July 2, 1884." It was further alleged that all disputes about the ownership had been settled, and all claims of Eli and B. Bonnett there-to had been sold and assigned to plaintiff, and on or about December 1, 1887, plaintiff notified defendant thereof, and demanded payment. To the first cause of action the defendant answered, denying the facts alleged, and pleaded the statute of limitations, and made a like answer and plea to the first count of the second cause of action. To the second count he answered, admitting that on July 2, 1884, he collected in his own right in the cases mentioned $12,000, but denied that he agreed to hold the $655 until certain or any disputes should be settled between the Bonnetts; admitted that he signed and delivered the writing set forth in the complaint; alleged that all disputes concerning the same were settled July 8, 1884, by release in writing, as follows: "We have this day settled all our affairs, and the judgments in the actions of B. Bonnett vs. The City and County of San Francisco, and C. H. Parker vs. The City and County of San Francisco, belong to Jos. W. Taylor. [Signed] B. Bonnett. Eli Bonnett. Joseph W. Taylor." He also denied the assignment of the claims of said money to plaintiff, or that anything was due under it, and pleaded the statute of limitations. For a separate defense defendant pleaded two several judgments in his favor against the plaintiff in actions brought by the plaintiff against him upon the same cause of action. The cause was tried without a jury, findings were waived, and judgment went in favor of defendant for costs.

Appellant contends that the evidence does not justify the decision, specifying several particulars. As to the first cause of action the testimony was confused, indefinite, and conflicting. We cannot say that the conclusion reached by the court as to that cause of action is not justified by the evidence. As to the remaining cause of action we come to the opposite conclusion. Plaintiff put in evidence the paper set out in the complaint, and the several assignments from Eli and B. Bonnett indorsed thereon, showing that he had the sole ownership thereof, and of all moneys mentioned therein. This, of itself, made a prima facie case for the plaintiff; but, in addition, B. Bonnett (called by the plaintiff) testified to the facts and circumstances of the transaction, and that said sum had not been paid. The defendant did not put in evidence the memorandum of settlement made by him with the Bonnetts, nor give any testimony tending to show that it included the money in question, nor did he put in evidence either of the judgments pleaded in bar of the action. These averments in the answer are deemed denied, and the burden was on defendant to prove them. Neither the answer nor the copy of any paper therein is evidence for any purpose. The defendant was examined as a witness in his own behalf, and admitted his signature to the paper set out in the complaint, and said, in substance, that he knew nothing about the suits mentioned in it; did not remember that he had anything to do with them, or whether the money was attached in his hands. This was all the testimony on the part of the defendant as to either count of the second cause of action. He did not in any manner refer to the testimony of B. Bonnett, nor contradict nor explain any of the facts or circumstances testified to by him, and which, with the written instrument referred to, was quite sufficient to require a judgment for the plaintiff. Nor does it appear that this cause of action was barred by the statute. The evidence discloses the fact that a contract for street work was assigned to defendant by Eli Bonnett, upon which defendant had advanced some $4,000; and when the money was collected by defendant there was a balance in his hands of about $3,500. An attachment had been served on $655 of it, based upon a claim that it, the money attached, belonged to B. Bonnett. Defendant paid Eli Bonnett the balance in his hands except $655, and executed the paper set out in the complaint. This money was retained by defendant with the consent of Eli Bonnett, and, as the testimony shows, actually belonged to him, though claimed by Petersen, the plaintiff here, as well as the defendant, to belong to B. Bonnett, against whom the attachment was issued. Whether the circumstances under which defendant originally received the money constituted him a trustee or not, the instrument signed by him constituted an express trust, with no definite time fixed for its termination by payment. The statute therefore did not run until notice of the settlement and demand of payment. Wright v. Ross, 36 Cal. 433. By the terms of the instrument he was a mere custodian of the money until the true owner was ascertained, and not until a demand made by one who showed a right to the money was he in default; nor is he chargeable with interest prior to the date of the demand and refusal. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted as to the second and third causes of action only.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

APPLEBY v. JANSEN'S HEIRS et al. (No. 15,121.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1893.)

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by William Appleby against the heirs and assigns of Charles J. Jansen, the German Savings & Loan Society, and others, to set aside a sale of a leasehold interest claimed by plaintiff in certain land, and for an accounting as to the rents and profits. From a judgment for defendants, entered on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry I. Kowalsky, for appellant. Jarboe & Jarboe and Robert H. Countryman, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from a final judgment in favor of the defendant the German Savings & Loan Society. The action is brought for the purpose of setting aside a sale of a leasehold interest held by the plaintiff in a lot of land situate in San Francisco, and for an accounting as to the rents and profits. The sale sought to be set aside was made January 24, 1876. Plaintiff claims that he was defrauded into making the sale. The only defendant served, so far as appears from the record, was the German Savings & Loan Society, which defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds (1) that the complaint did not constitute a cause of action against said defendant, etc.; (2) that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, using apt terms to designate the sections of the statute under which the bar occurred. The demurrer was sustained, and judgment entered in favor of defendant. The complaint was probably prepared by the plaintiff, as he did not appear by attorney. To quote from the pleading, for the purpose of showing its utter insufficiency, would seem unkind to plaintiff, and I shall content myself with saying (1) it does not state a cause of action against the defendant; (2) the complaint shows upon its face that the cause of action is barred by lapse of time,—for which reasons the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

FISHER v. HOPKINS. (No. 13,171.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1893.)
REVIEW ON APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, on appeal, the evidence is found sufficient to justify the findings of the trial court, the judgment of that court will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James G. Maguire, Judge.

Action by Ann Fisher against Peter Hopkins for the conversion of certain household furniture. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James F. Smith, for appellant. T. J. Crowley and P. J. Morgan, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. It is alleged in the complaint that while plaintiff was the owner, and entitled to the possession, of certain personal property, (household furniture,) the defendant wrongfully converted the same to his own use, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $2,000. The defendant denies the alleged title of the plaintiff, and justifies the taking and alleged conversion of the property under writs of attachment and execution against one Minerva Button, issued to him as sheriff, alleging that the furniture in question was the property of Minerva Button. The case was tried by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $951.95 and costs. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only grounds upon which a reversal of the order and judgment is asked are that the findings of fact are not justified by the evidence. The plaintiff claims to derive her title to the property from Minerva Button, through an absolute bill of sale and delivery of possession from Mrs. Button to Josiah Lean, Robert Peoples, and Lydia Peoples, executed prior to the issuance of the writs by virtue of which the defendant took and sold the property, and a bill of sale from Lean and Peoples to the plaintiff. The findings excepted to relate principally to the considerations paid for the bills of sale, and to the questions whether there was an actual and immediate delivery of the property, followed by a continuous change of possession. After a careful examination of the 200 pages of conflicting evidence contained in the statement on motion for a new trial, I think, under the well-settled rule in such cases, that the evidence is sufficient to justify all the findings, and that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

COWGILL v. DINWIDDIE et al. (No. 15-161.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1893.)

CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE—TIME FOR BRINGING SUIT.

Code Civil Proc. § 1496, requires an executor to indorse on a claim its acceptance or rejection, and, if not done within 10 days, provides that the neglect may, "at the option of the claimant," be considered a rejection. Plaintiff's claim was presented January 16, 1891. Her attorneys were told that nothing had been done with it, and on February 7, 1891, were told they could consider it rejected. It was in fact indorsed "Rejected" February 2, 1891, though the fact was concealed from plaintiff. Held, that plaintiff had the right to consider the claim rejected February 7, 1891, and an action thereon within three months from that date was within Code Civil Proc. § 1498, providing for a suit on a claim within three months from its rejection.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by Louise Cowgill against J. L. Dinwiddie and Daniel Brown, executors of Thomas Rochford, deceased, to recover on a claim against decedent. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Haskell & Meyer, for appellants. Lippitt & Lippitt, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover $1,000 upon an instrument in writing executed by Thomas Rochford, deceased, on the 3d day of December, 1886, to be paid by his executors after his death, to the plaintiff, provided said sum is not left for her use in his last will. The demand was presented to the executors January 16, 1891, and, as plaintiff avers, rejected on the 7th day of February, 1891. Suit was brought within three months thereafter. The answer denies that the claim was rejected on the 7th day of February, 1891, but avers that it was so rejected February 2, 1891, and claims that the action was brought within three months thereafter. The principal contention at the trial seems to have been over the question of the rejection of the claim. The errors assigned by appellants are as follows: (1) That the findings in this case are contrary to the issues and admissions of the pleadings; (2) that the findings do not respond to all the issues; (3) that the findings contain evidence, instead of ultimate facts. The three objections are in their essential elements so blended that they may properly be considered together, and the findings of fact which illustrate them may be summarized in part, and stated at length, where deemed necessary, as follows: (1) Notice to creditors was given by defendants, as executors, September 29, 1890, in which such creditors were directed to present their claims to them at the law office of Haskell & Meyer, etc., within 10 months. (2) Plaintiff's claim was presented on January 16, 1891, by her attorneys. (3) That thereafter plaintiff's attorneys called several times, and made inquiry as to action by the executors on the claim, and were told that no action had been taken thereon. (4) "That on the 7th day of February, 1891, Frank K. Lippitt, one of the attorneys for the plaintiff, called again at the office of said Haskell & Meyer to learn what action had been taken by said executors, and was told by one of the attorneys for said executors that he might consider the claim rejected on that day, and that plaintiff commenced this action within three months from the said 7th day of February, 1891." (5) "That on said 7th day of February, 1891, the said attorneys-for said defendants had the said claim in their said office, and that the same in fact had been indorsed 'Rejected' on February 2, 1891." "That the said attorneys refused to allow the attorneys for plaintiff to see the claim, with the indorsement of the rejection thereon, or to return the same to them, though the same was demanded of them." It will be seen by the foregoing that the court found that the claim had in fact been indorsed "Rejected" on February 2, 1891. The additional facts, as found, were doubtless stated for one or two reasons, viz. either to show that, while secretly indorsed as rejected on that day, the indorsement was not operative as a rejection, because withheld from the plaintiff, or because, while in fact rejected February 2, 1891, defendants were estopped by the acts of their attorneys, who misled plaintiff, from setting up the rejection as of an earlier date than February 2, 1891. It will be observed that the fact of rejection is admitted by the pleadings. The only question in issue is the date.

Section 1496 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires the executor or administrator to whom a claim is presented to indorse thereon his allowance or rejection, with the day and date thereof. It does not, in terms, specify the time within which this must be done. If not so indorsed within 10 days the "refusal or neglect may, at the option of the claimant, be deemed equivalent to a rejection on the tenth day." As this is optional with the claimant, he need not so deem it unless he chooses. Bank v. Shoemaker, 67 Cal. 148, 7 Pac. Rep. 420. A claimant may well suppose, in many instances, that his demand, although not allowed within 10 days, will ultimately be approved, and hence that an action to establish its validity will be unnecessary. Whatever the motive may have been, it is made evident by the inquiries of plaintiff's attorneys, as late as February 7th, that they had not elected to deem the claim as rejected on the tenth day after its presentation. When a claim is allowed by the executor or administrator, and approved by a judge of the superior court, it must be filed in the court within 30 days, but as to rejected claims there is no such provision. Manifestly, it is the duty of the executor or administrator, on demand, to return a rejected claim to the claimant, with his official action indorsed thereon. Such indorsement is evidence of his action, necessary to the claimant in bringing and maintaining an action to establish the claim; and if he secretly rejects the claim, and refuses to deliver it to the claimant, or to inform him of the action taken thereon, it operates, or may operate, as a fraud upon the claimant, and becomes inoperative as a rejection. In Steward v. Hinkel, 72 Cal. 191, 13 Pac. Rep. 494,—a case in which the executors had rejected a claim, and thereafter refused to give the claimant any information as to the action taken,— Temple, J., in a concurring opinion, held the following language: "But in this case, inasmuch as the executors not only failed to inform the creditor of their action, but refused to do so, we may regard the case as though they had not acted at all. * * * Secret action, which the creditor has no means of knowing, is equivalent to no action at all." Under the notice given by the executors the claim was properly presented at the office of Haskell & Meyer. Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. Rep. 375; Roddan v. Doane, 92 Cal. 555, 23 Pac. Rep. 604. Allowing or rejecting a claim is an official act, which the attorneys of the executors had not the power to perform; but the delivery of a rejected claim to the owner thereof, upon demand, when in their possession, was a mere ministerial act, which, as attorneys of the executors, they had a right to perform, and their action therein bound the executors. I am therefore of opinion that on the facts, as presented in this case, there had not been, in contemplation of law, any rejection of the claim in question up to the 7th day of February, 1891. The apparent rejection on February 2d, having been secret, and knowledge thereof having been denied to plaintiff by a refusal to deliver to her the claim, or to furnish information, might be disregarded by the plaintiff. Under such circumstances it was, under the doctrine of Bank v. Shoemaker, 67 Cal. 148, 7 Pac. Rep. 420, the right of plaintiff to elect to consider the claim as rejected, as she did so on the 7th of March following. In the case versus Shoemaker, cited supra, the claim was presented to the executor October 19, 1881, and the action was commenced July 1, 1882. The complaint averred the presentation; that the executrix "did refuse and neglect, for the space of ten days thereafter, to indorse her allowance or rejection thereon, and has ever since so refused and neglected." Wherefore, the plaintiff demands judgment." A demurrer was interposed to the complaint setting forth the bar of the statute under sections 1496, 1498, Code Civil Proc. The demurrer was sustained by the superior court, and final judgment rendered in favor of defendant. On an appeal to this court, respondent contended that, if plaintiff had elected to consider its claim as rejected on the tenth day after presentation, then the action, not having been brought within three months thereafter, was barred by section 1498, Id. (2) That if it did not so elect, as there was no allegation of an actual rejection of the claim, the action could not be maintained, because never rejected. The contention of appellant was that, when the executor fails to avail himself of his privilege to accept or reject a claim in 10 days after presentation, the claimant may at any time thereafter elect to regard such nonaction as rejection, and it is only when he does so that the bar provided for by section 1498 is set in motion. From the decision reversing the case, it will be seen the court upheld the position of the appellant. The case, as reported, contains no full statement of facts, but by reference to the record on file the questions orally presented are readily attained. The doctrine of that case would seem to comport with justice, and does no violence to the provisions of the Code. Section 1498, which requires an action to be brought upon a claim within three months after its rejection, otherwise it shall be barred, is a statute of limitations, in favor of, and in the interests of, estates. It tends to an early settlement, and to the rejection of stale claims. The representative of the estate always has it in his power to set the statute in motion by an early rejection of claims presented to him. If he fails to do so, it would seem hardly just to a claimant who has not exercised his option, at the end of 10 days, to consider the claim rejected, to hold him to have set the statute in motion as of that date, when he afterwards brings an action on the claim.

No action can be maintained on a claim until it is first presented, save in the excepted cases. Section 1500, Code Civil Proc. The statute does not, in terms, hold that the executor or administrator must reject a claim before an action can be maintained upon it. Under what is believed to be the rule established by Bank v. Shoemaker, it is held that a claimant who has not elected to consider his claim rejected upon the tenth day after presentation may subsequently thereto, and at any time before official action by the executor or administrator thereon, elect, at his option, to consider his claim as rejected, and may, under section 1498, bring an action thereon within three months thereafter, and, in the absence of other proof, suit brought is conclusive evidence of such election, and notice thereof.

In this view of the case the findings are not contrary to the issues, and they respond to all the issues made in the case. What is claimed by the appellants as a statement of evidence, instead of a finding of the ultimate facts in the case, as to the refusal of defendants' attorneys to deliver the rejected claim to the attorneys of plaintiff, etc., is but a statement of such collateral facts as show that the apparent rejection of the claim on the 2d day of February, 1891, was of no effect, because a knowledge thereof was not, on demand, furnished to the plaintiff. For that purpose they were ultimate facts, and the declaration that the plaintiff might consider the claim as rejected on the 7th of February was mere surplusage, which, while, in the view we have taken of the case, immaterial, certainly did no harm to the appellants. The conclusion of law drawn from the facts, that the claim had never been actually rejected, was correct, for reasons hereinbefore given, and the statement that it "is deemed to have been rejected on the tenth day after presentation," instead of at the election of the plaintiff, is of no importance as to the validity of the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MALIC v. FOX et al. (No. 14,883.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)

ESTOPPEL OF PRINCIPAL TO DENY POWER OF AGENT—GUARANTY.

A bond given to the owner of a boat, conditioned to pay for all goods delivered to F., as steward of the boat, was executed by the sureties' bookkeeper without authority. In an action thereon by one who had furnished goods to F., it appeared that the bond was executed June 15th; that plaintiff had commenced furnishing goods June 1st, on F. agreeing to pay on the 15th of each month, and had furnished goods to the value of $100 before the bond was executed; that on June 30th, when $237 was due, and F. refused to pay, plaintiff declined to furnish more goods, but afterwards, when F. showed him the bond, he continued to let F. have goods, but made no inquiry of the sureties as to the genuineness of the bond until after the goods sought to be recovered for were furnished. Held, that plaintiff did not deliver the goods to F., relying on the bond, "in good faith, and without ordinary negligence," within the meaning of Civil Code, § 2334, providing that only in such case is "a principal bound by the acts of his agent under a merely ostensible authority."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by Charles M. Malic against C. G. Fox, W. F. Witzemann, and John J. Staiger. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and an order denying a new trial, defendants Witzemann and Staiger appeal. Reversed.

Henry N. Clement, for appellants. W. H. Barrows, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover from the defendant, Fox, and his guarantors, Witzemann & Staiger, copartners, the sum of $431.29, for goods sold and delivered to Fox by plaintiff's assignor, one H. A. Smith, who did business under the name of "Smith's Cash Store." The action is founded upon a written guaranty of Witzemann & Staiger to the San Francisco & North Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation, which owned and navigated the steamer James M. Donahue, in connection with its road, to transport passengers across the bay of San Francisco, given under the following circumstances: In the latter part of May, 1889, Fox applied to the railroad company for the position of steward of the steamer James M. Donahue, with the privilege of keeping a restaurant thereon for passengers and employes, and was informed by the agent of the company (H. C. Whiting) that he could be appointed to the position only on the condition that he would give a bond with satisfactory sureties that he would pay all bills contracted by him for goods and supplies for said restaurant. Upon his promise to give the required bond or guaranty, Fox was appointed to and took the position June 1, 1889, but did not give the bond or guaranty until June 15, 1889, when he gave the following instrument: "We, the undersigned, do hereby severally and jointly guaranty the full and complete payment of all bills, dues, and claims arising from the purchase of goods, wares, and merchandise by C. G. Fox, by himself or order, to be used on or for the steamer James M. Donahue, for boarding passengers or employes of the San Francisco and North Pacific Railroad Company; and we severally agree to pay all bills contracted by said Fox or his agent for goods, wares, and merchandise delivered on the steamer James M. Donahue, to be used by him or others as aforesaid, upon presentation to us, or either of us; and we further agree and guaranty that the said steamer James M. Donahue, and the said San Francisco and North Pacific Railroad Company, owners thereof, shall be forever held harmless by reason of any purchase or contracts made by said Fox or his agents for the purposes before named. In case said Fox shall neglect or refuse to pay any or all the bills so contracted, we hereby agree severally to pay the said bills promptly upon presentation, according to the terms of said purchase. Witness our hands, this 15th day of June, A. D. 1889. Witzemann & Staiger, H., 417 East street. Witness: W. B. Hayward." The defendants, Witzemann & Staiger, denied all the material allegations of the complaint, including the allegation that they executed the guaranty. But the court found for plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly for the full sum demanded. Witzemann & Staiger appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Counsel for appellants contend that the finding that Witzemann & Staiger executed the guaranty is not justified by the evidence. The undisputed evidence shows that the guaranty was signed and delivered to Fox by W. B. Hayward, the bookkeeper of Witzemann & Staiger, in their absence, without their knowledge, and without authority in writing, or any express authority whatever. It is claimed by respondent, however, that, by their acquiescence, Witzemann & Staiger impliedly ratified the execution of the instrument by Hayward; and whether he did so, as to plaintiff's assignor, Smith, is the principal question. "It is the general rule that the act of ratification must be of the same nature as that which would be required for conferring the authority in the first instance." If written authority is required by the statute of frauds, the ratification must be in writing, (Mechem, Ag.

§ 136;) otherwise, the statute of frauds may be evaded. And the only cases constituting exceptions to this general rule (if even they may be called exceptions) are those in which, although the assumed agent had no original authority, the alleged principal is estopped from denying such authority by reason of his acquiescence, acts, or words indicating ratification, upon which others have relied and acted in good faith and with ordinary care. These are causes of implied or ostensible ratification, to which the principle of estoppel in pais is applicable on the same grounds as to cases of original ostensible authority. In both these classes of cases the effect of the estoppel is equivalent to conclusive proof of original authority, (Mechem, Ag. § 107;) and the authority thus established by an ostensible ratification is an ostensible authority in the sense of section 2334 of the Civil Code, which is as follows: "A principal is bound by acts of his agent, under a merely ostensible authority, to those persons only who have in good faith, and without ordinary negligence, incurred a liability, or parted with value, upon the faith thereof." Conceding that the conduct or acquiescence of Witzemann & Staiger was such as to justify a finding of the ostensible authority of Hayward to execute the guaranty, (which is doubtful,) did Smith—plaintiff's assignor—part with his goods, relying in good faith upon such authority, and without ordinary negligence on his part? Smith commenced selling to Fox the goods sued for on June 1st, and before the execution of the guaranty had sold him goods to the value of over $100. Smith and his clerk, Murray, testified that credit for these goods was given because they had been informed that Fox could not take his position of steward without having given a bond to the railroad company "for the faithful performance of his duties." The agreement with Fox was that he should pay Smith on the 15th of each month. On the last day of June the bill, then amounting to $237, was presented to Fox, who failed to pay it. Smith then refused him further credit, and presented his bill to the railroad company, whose agent told him that "Fox was under bonds to pay the bill himself, and they didn't wish to have anything to do with it," but if he would get an order from Fox they would pay the June bill. On July 3d, Smith asked Fox for an order on the railroad company, but he indignantly refused to give it, saying he would pay his bills on July 15th, or that his bondsmen would. He then showed Smith a copy of the bond he had given the railroad company. As to this, Smith testified: "That was on the 3d day of July, I believe. I had refused to give him (Fox) any more goods at that time. On the strength of that bond I continued giving him goods until the 15th of July." On July 15th, for the first time, Smith called on Witzemann & Staiger, at their place of business, to inquire whether they were responsible for Fox's bills. Of this he testified: "I saw Mr. Staiger. * * * Introduced myself to him. Told him who I was. * * * Told him I was supplying goods to a man by the name of Fox, on the steamer Donahue. Asked him if it was all right, —whether he would pay the bill when it became due. * * * I gave him to understand that I would rely upon that bond. I said to him * * * that I considered the matter safe as long as they were on the bond, and that was all I wanted to know, —if Fox was short, that they would make it good. He made no response, but he was passing from the street at the time. He shook his head in an affirmative manner, although he made no response." It appears that Fox absconded on that day, (July 15th,) and that Smith sold him no goods after July 13th. On cross-examination, Smith said: "I never went to see Staiger or Witzemann * * * at any time prior to July 15th. I first went to see the railroad company on the 3d of June. * * * I did not ask to see the bond at the railroad company's. * * * He (Fox) showed me the bond, and I told him all right; go ahead; that it was a good bond, provided it was genuine. * * * The one I saw was a type-written copy, with written signatures, with the letter 'H.' 'Witzemann & Staiger. H.' * * * I had seen the signature of the firm, perhaps. Couldn't say that I recognized it. I should suppose, from the letter 'H,' that it was not signed by the firm. The reason I did not go and see Staiger when I saw that the bond was not signed by the firm was that I was very busy, and hadn't time to go at once. I should have done so, of course, but I delayed from time to time, thinking that, as long as I got there (at the railroad office) before he (Fox) drew any part of his money, that he couldn't get it, and that I was safe. * * * I accepted his assurances that the bond was genuine for the time being, excepting, however, that before the money was paid over, during the next month, I would see for myself. I had never been accustomed to dealing with this class of bonds before. * * * I think it is a little out of the regular course for this company to do this sort of business. It was a new arrangement with them, perhaps." Upon re-examination he said: "I had seen nothing about the bond that aroused my suspicion in regard to it. I simply wished to go and see Witzemann & Staiger to confirm its genuineness. * * * I never talked with Mr. Hayward about the bond previous to July 15th."

Martin Murray, who, to say the least, seems to have been somewhat reckless in his statements, testified that he was employed in Smith's Cash Store during the months of June and July, and knew when Fox commenced to buy goods from that store for his restaurant on the steamer Donahue; that, about a week after he commenced buying, Fox "brought in a copy [of the bond] into the store, [it was not signed until a week later,] and, knowing the man was devoid of veracity, I didn't take any interest in his statement, and I advised Mr. Smith to go and see Mr. Whiting; and I, in the mean time, consulted with the members of the Ocean Market, [Witzemann & Staiger.] I went down after he had purchased some stores. * * * We took all precautions, both myself and Mr. Smith, as I told Mr. Smith he was dishonest. * * * Mr. Smith saw Mr. Whiting, and I saw Mr. Staiger. 'Well,' I says, 'Mr. Staiger, I understand,' says I, 'that you are on the bonds of Mr. Fox.' He says, 'Yes.' Says I, 'Well, now,' says I, 'what am I to understand by that bond?' 'Well,' he says, 'we have given security for all the goods delivered upon that boat in the steward's department.' * * * I told Mr. Smith exactly the words Mr. Staiger told me, and, as I said before, we took every precaution. * * * We acted throughout with the understanding that Mr. Staiger was on the bond, and had also seen copies of it, * * * and it was with that understanding that we sold the goods to Mr. Fox, as we did not consider him responsible. * * * I know he owes me a hundred dollars from another time. I know he came here from Australia. He left his wife there, and he has a very bad record." Being asked when he had the conversation with Mr. Staiger, above detailed, he again answered that it was seven or eight days after Fox commenced to purchase the goods. It appears that Fox ordered the first lot of goods on June 1st, and that it was delivered on June 3d; so that, if Murray's memory is reliable, his talk with Staiger must have been at least five days before the guaranty was signed. Mr. Staiger, however, denied having any such conversation with Murray, and further testified that he did not know that this firm's name was signed to the guaranty by Mr. Hayward until he was so informed by Mr. Smith on July 15th; that although he had been told by Hayward, about the last of June, that he (Hayward) had signed that bond, he understood him to mean that he had signed his own name, and not that of Witzemann & Staiger. Mr. Hayward testified: "At the time I signed it, I thought it was a mere matter of form. * * * It had been in my desk for two or three days. I knew Mr. Staiger had not signed it, but I didn't know why. I knew Mr. Staiger had told Mr. Fox, in my presence, that he would be willing to sign a bond. * * * I assumed it would be all right for me to sign. I didn't speak of it to Mr. Staiger until some time afterwards,—I guess, ten days or two weeks. * * * When I did tell him I merely said I had signed that bond. That is all

I said. I naturally supposed he knew I signed it in the name of the firm. I didn't go into any explanation particularly in regard to it. I supposed he thought so at the time." Mr. Staiger testified that he had promised Mr. Fox to sign the bond, provided he would get other sureties to go on it; but when Fox failed to get any other surety he refused to sign it, except on the condition that Fox would assign his salary as steward, in advance, as collateral security, which Fox had declined to do.

The court found that Witzemann & Staiger had no notice until July 15th that Smith was selling goods to Fox upon the faith of their guaranty, nor that Smith looked to them for payment in case Fox failed to pay. It is clear that Witzemann & Staiger are not liable for the goods sold to Fox before the guaranty was signed, as it is not retroactive. And from the testimony of Smith it seems quite as clear that he sold no goods on the faith of the bond, as he calls it, until after the 3d day of July, 1889, prior to which $237.32 of the debt sued for had accrued. On July 3d, after having refused to give Smith an order on the railroad company, and after Smith's refusal to give him further credit, Fox first showed Smith the bond, for the purpose of inducing the latter to extend his credit. It was then, for the first time, that Smith claims to have given Fox credit "on the strength of that bond." It is true he testified that when Fox bought the first lot of goods he said he was to give a bond, but he also said at the same time that the bond had not been drawn up. The circumstances that he did not notify Witzemann & Staiger between the 1st and 3d of July, after Fox had refused to give an order on the railroad company, that he looked to them as sureties, is inconsistent with the claim that he had sold goods to Fox on the faith of their guaranty before July 1, 1889; and there is no explanation of this plainly apparent inconsistency. But further, conceding, for the sake of the argument, that Smith relied upon the guaranty as security for all goods sold to Fox after its date, (June 15th,) the question remains, did he rely upon it "in good faith, and without ordinary negligence?" If not, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, since, as above shown, the execution and validity of the guaranty depend upon the "merely ostensible authority" of Hayward, the assumed agent, by which the principal is bound "to those persons, only, who have, in good faith, and without ordinary negligence, incurred a liability, or parted with value, upon the faith thereof." Ordinary negligence is the absence of ordinary care; "the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person would not have done." And. Law Dict. If Smith parted with his goods on the faith of the guaranty of Witzemann & Stai-ger, I think he did so without ordinary care, and consequently with ordinary negligence. In estimating the degree of care exercised by Smith, it should be noted, in addition to the evidence above detailed, that he was not a party to the guaranty; the principal object of which was to indemnify the railroad company. He was but one of a large, indefinite class of unnamed persons, who might have sold Fox goods on the faith of the guaranty to an amount, for the price of which the guaranty, though properly executed, might have proved to be inadequate security. It should also be observed that Smith's Cash Store was but a short distance from the place of business of Witzemann & Staiger. To whatever extent Smith parted with his goods on the faith of the guaranty of Witzemann & Staiger, I think he did so without ordinary care, and, therefore, that the order and judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order and judgment are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment.

KLOPPER v. LEVY et al. (No. 14,677.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)

PLEADINGS—QUESTIONING SUFFICIENCY AFTER TRIAL—REVIEWING ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL.

1. Where a trial on the merits was had without questioning the sufficiency of the pleadings, plaintiff cannot claim on appeal that the answer raised no issue.

2. The grounds of a motion for a new trial were that the damages were excessive; that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict; that it was against law; and errors occurring at the trial. The motion was granted, but the ground of the order was not stated. Held, that the order would not be disturbed, it being conceded that the evidence was conflicting.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by Frederick Kloppe against Schewa Levy and others. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Coogan, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This appeal by plaintiff is from an order granting a new trial to defendants, Levy. The complaint states that, during all the times in the complaint mentioned, plaintiff was the owner and in possession of a leasehold interest, for a term of years, of the first floor of a certain building on O'Farrell street, in San Francisco, which on the 17th day of November, 1889, was and had been used by him as a store in carrying on his business as a dealer in leather and leather findings, and at said time was thoroughly stocked with valuable goods; that on said day the defendants broke and entered into plaintiff's said store from an adjoining store, and by breaking and removing a portion of the roof, in consequence of which great quantities of rain came through said walls and ceilings of said store, wetting his stock of goods, damaging the same to the extent of $1,397.81, and preventing him from carrying on business for a period of two weeks, to his damage in the sum of $400, and necessitating the employment of experts to examine his goods, at the cost of $50, and the further cost of $100 in removing his goods. Respondents' answer is an attempted denial, but is plainly defective, and it may be doubted whether any material allegation of the complaint is denied. But a trial was had in all respects as though the answer raised an issue as to the trespass and damage. Evidence was introduced by both parties upon these points, objections made and passed upon without a suggestion that the trespass was admitted by the answer. Under such circumstances, plaintiff cannot now claim that the answer raised no issue.

The case was tried with a jury, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiff against the respondents.

Respondents then moved for a new trial upon a statement of the case based upon the ground of excessive damages; insufficient evidence to justify the verdict; that it was against law; and errors of law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by them. The motion was granted, but upon what ground does not appear, and from that order the plaintiff takes this appeal. If it be conceded that there was any evidence that the respondents participated in the alleged trespass, as appellant claims there was, then there was a substantial conflict upon that point, and this court will not disturb the ruling of the trial court. If convinced that the verdict was clearly against the preponderance of evidence, the judge properly granted a new trial, and such ruling will not be disturbed. The rule prevailing here does not apply to the judge of the trial court. In this case there was no abuse of discretion, but, on the contrary, the order was just and proper.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

ACTION BY ASSIGNEE—ASSIGNMENT TO ATTORNEY

1. An action may be brought on a claim by an assignee thereof.

2. The assignment of claims to the clerk of the assignor's attorney, and an action thereon in the clerk's name, are not affected by Pen. Code, § 161, prohibiting an attorney from having claims assigned to him with intent to bring suit thereon, although the clerk is an attorney admitted to practice, where there was no solicitation on the part of any attorney that the claims be put in suit, and the assignment was made as a mere matter of convenience, for the purpose of collection.

3. The secretary and general manager of a corporation may assign accounts under a general authorization, the adoption of a special resolution authorizing it being unnecessary.

4. The court may, in its discretion, after the making of a motion for nonsuit, but before deciding it, permit the introduction of additional evidence by plaintiff.

5. Where the transcript contains a notice of appeal from an order made on a motion to retax costs, and a bill of exceptions setting out the ground of the notice, and the court's action thereon, but no mention is made of such appeal in the briefs of counsel, and no other case has been docketed, it will be presumed that the questions involved have been abandoned.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by W. N. Tuller against Charles S. Arnold and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert H. Countryman, for appellants.
John H. Dickinson, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Defendants were indebted to each of two business houses in Chicago for goods sold and delivered. The accounts were assigned to the plaintiff, who had prior to that time been admitted to practice in the superior court, but who was a clerk in the office of John H. Dickinson, Esq., who appeared as plaintiff's attorney. The answer denied the assignment, and that plaintiff was the owner; alleged that plaintiff is an attorney at law, and connected with the law office of John H. Dickinson, and that plaintiff bought these claims with the sole intent of bringing suit thereon. The cause was tried without a jury, and findings and judgment went for plaintiff. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

1. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, defendants moved for a nonsuit. The record discloses that the motion was taken under advisement; the court understanding that neither party had any further testimony to offer, and that, if the nonsuit should be granted, judgment should go for defendants; otherwise, for the plaintiff. The motion was afterwards denied, and judgment entered upon the findings for plaintiff, and defendants assign for error that the court did not give them an opportunity to introduce evidence. There is nothing in the record to show that the court misunderstood the parties, or that defendants had any evidence they desired to introduce, nor does the notice of intention to move for a new trial embrace any ground under which it could be made to appear that defendants had not submitted the case as stated.

2. The assignment of the claims to plaintiff made him the proper party to bring and maintain the action. The assignors could not have sued without a reassignment. "It is sufficient, under the Code, if he [the plaintiff] holds the legal title." O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 440, 16 Pac. Rep. 236. The assignment of the account by the L. Wolff Manufacturing Company, a corporation, was sufficient. The secretary and general manager testified that no special resolution was adopted, authorizing it, but that he had full power, as secretary and general manager, to do so, and there was no evidence tending to show that he had not such power. A general authorization is sufficient.

3. It sufficiently appears that the assignments were made before suit was brought.

4. The remaining ground of the motion for nonsuit was that plaintiff is an attorney at law, and that it is against the provisions of section 161 of the Penal Code for an attorney to have claims assigned to him, with intent to bring suit thereon. It is not necessary to construe that section further than to say that this case is not affected by it. The evidence shows that these claims came to Mr. Dickinson for collection through a law firm in Chicago, to whom the assignors gave them for collection; that Dickinson was the correspondent of said firm here; and that the assignment was made to plaintiff as a matter of convenience, for the purpose of collection. There does not appear to have been any solicitation by any attorney to the assignors that these claims be put in suit, or that they were brought by the assignee for that purpose, but on the contrary the assignors put them in the hands of their attorneys for collection. Nor were defendants in any manner injured thereby. They were not cut off from any defense they might have had to either of these claims if the action had been by the assignors, if such defense were alleged in the answer, and by uniting the claims in one action they were saved the costs of an additional action.

5. The findings support the judgment, and the evidence justifies the findings.

6. It was in the discretion of the court to permit the plaintiff to introduce further evidence after the motion for nonsuit was made, but before it was decided, and this discretion, we think, was not abused. The motion was renewed afterwards.

7. The transcript contains a notice of appeal from an order denying, in part, defendants' motion to relax costs, and a bill of exceptions setting out the grounds of the motion, and the action of the court thereon. Both notices of appeal were served the same day. No mention is made of this appeal in the briefs of counsel upon either side, and no other case has been docketed. We assume that the questions involved in it have been abandoned. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VAN-CLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ASHTON v. DASHAWAY ASS'N et al.
(No. 14,304.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)
DISMISSAL OF CASE — MOTION TO VACATE — ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

Where an attorney appears in court five minutes after the dismissal of the cause and rendition of judgment against his client because of the absence of both attorney and client when the case was called for trial, it is not an abuse of discretion for the court, on motion supported by a sufficient affidavit, to vacate the order of dismissal and judgment, and restore the cause to the calendar.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Charles Ashton against the Dashaway Association and others. The case was dismissed, and judgment rendered against plaintiff, because of the absence of both himself and his attorney when the case was called for trial. From an order setting aside the order of dismissal and vacating the judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Tilden & Tilden, for appellants. S. Heydenfeldt, Jr., and Jos. P. Kelly, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court, setting aside an order of dismissal and vacating a judgment. The cause had been set down for trial on the 15th day of October, 1890, but a hearing had been delayed from day to day by reason of other causes on the calendar having precedence, until the morning of October 23d, when it was called for trial at five minutes after 10 A. M., and, neither plaintiff nor his attorney being present, the cause was dismissed, and a judgment was entered on the same day in favor of defendant. Within five minutes after the order of dismissal was entered, the attorney for plaintiff appeared in court, and at once applied to the court on an affidavit and notice for an order shortening the time of notice, which was granted, and a motion to vacate the order and restore the cause to the calendar was noticed for the following day. The court vacated the order of dismissal, and restored the cause to the calendar. The notice of motion and affidavit on the part of plaintiff was accompanied by a transcript on appeal to the supreme court in the same cause after a former trial, stipulated to be correct, and which contained a sufficient showing of merits. The affidavit accompanying the notice of motion bears evidence of the haste with which it was probably prepared, and is not to be commended as a model in like cases. It is, however, taken with the other papers in the case, and viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances, sufficient to authorize us to say that the court below was not guilty of an abuse of discretion in setting aside and vacating the order of dismissal and the judgment thereon. A delay of five minutes in reaching court does not raise a very strong presumption of negligence, and in many places and in numerous courts, owing to the habits and practices of the court as to punctuality, as well as of attorneys and litigants, could hardly be regarded as negligence. Of all these things the court below is the more competent to determine, and the wide discretion confided to the nisi prius courts in such cases is wisely bestowed. There may be said to be parallel lines, limiting the discretion of courts acting between which their decisions will be sustained whether one way or the other; and when a court acts in a matter in which such discretion is vouchsafed to it, its order may well be affirmed. In other words, the appellate court, in such cases, does no determine whether it would decide the matter in the same way on the same showing, but only whether the court below has overstepped the legal bounds of its discretionary power. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 15, 1893.)

On rehearing.

For prior report, see 33 Pac. Rep. 63.

PER CURIAM. It appearing that in this cause a new trial is not necessary of any issue except as to the quantity of land to be subjected to the lien, the judgment hereinbefore rendered is modified so as to read as follows: "The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to hear such evidence as may be offered by the parties upon the sole point of the quantity of the land required for the convenient use and occupation of the building mentioned in the complaint, in accordance with the opinion of this court herein delivered, and to change its finding upon that point so as to comply with its conclusion upon such evidence, and thereupon to modify its judgment in accordance with such modified findings."

DIGGS v. PORTEUS. (No. 18,017.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1893.)

APPEAL — OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW — UNLAWFUL DETAINER — VERDICT — DEFINITENESS.

1. An objection that the legal and equitable issues on a summary proceeding for unlawful detainer were tried together cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

2. In an action for unlawful detainer, a verdict that "we, the jury," find for plaintiff "that he is entitled to the possession of the premises in controversy, and assess his damages at $——, and entitled to the sum of $30 as rent per month," is not sufficiently definite to support a judgment for rent at the rate of $30 per month from April 1st, the date of the termination of the lease under the notice which was conceded to have been given, to July 16th, the date the verdict was rendered.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by M. Diggs against S. Porteus to recover a house and lot and damages for their detention, etc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, unless plaintiff agrees to strike off the money part of the judgment.

R. Clark, for appellant. E. R. Bush, F. E. Baker, and Byron Ball, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Action to recover possession of a house and lot situate in Woodland, Yolo county, and damages for the detention, rents, etc. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant appeals. The cause comes up on the judgment roll.

The complaint avers, in substance, among other things, that on or about May 1, 1880, one Jacob Hays, being the owner of the locus in quo, did lease and let the same to the defendant from month to month, during the will of the lessor, at a monthly rent of $30, to be paid by defendant to the lessor, upon an agreement that defendant should vacate and surrender the premises to his lessor at any time when required so to do; that defendant entered under the lease, and is still in possession; that in January, 1891, plaintiff purchased the premises; that he is still the owner thereof; that his conveyance was duly recorded, etc.; that defendant had notice of plaintiff's purchase, and paid rent to him up to April 1, 1891, since which time no rent has been paid; that on February 20, 1891, plaintiff served defendant with written notice to vacate said premises and surrender possession to plaintiff on or before April 1, 1891, and that defendant's tenancy would terminate at said last mentioned date, and that, if defendant failed to surrender at said time, plaintiff would claim and demand of defendant $200 per month thereafter, and damages for detention, etc.; that, after the tenancy ceased, plaintiff demanded of defendant, in writing, a surrender of the premises, which was not complied with in three days, and has never been complied with, although more than three days elapsed before suit brought. Then follows certain allegations as a basis for special damages, not necessary to be mentioned here. Defendant filed an answer and cross complaint, in which he denies his tenancy under the plaintiff, except under and by virtue of a lease, etc., and by his cross complaint (in which it is asserted that Jacob Hays and Thomas Kelly have been made parties by order of the court) he avers that on June 1, 1888, Jacob Hays leased the disputed premises to Thomas Kelly, under a written lease, for a term of five years, at a monthly rental of $35 per month, payable monthly on the 11th day of each month, in advance, with a privilege of renewal for a further term of five years on like terms. That Hays and Kelly subsequently agreed that said lease should be delivered to Porteus by Kelly, and that Porteus should become responsible to Hays for the rent to the extent of $30 per month, and that he, Porteus, should be the owner and holder of the lease. That plaintiff, at the date of his purchase, had notice, and thereafter received the rent at $30 per month. That defendant made improvement, etc. That Kelly never delivered the lease to him as per agreement, and that thereafter Hays agreed to lease to him, and a lease was prepared, but never signed; and asks that Diggs and Kelly be decreed to assign the lease to him, and that Hays and plaintiff be decreed to execute the second lease, etc. The cause was tried by a jury, and, in obedience to instructions of the court, certain questions touching the issues were answered in favor of the plaintiff, and against defendant's theory that he entered under a lease, etc. The jury further found that plaintiff was entitled to possession of the premises, and to $30 per month as rent. The court adopted the findings of the jury; made additional findings, all in favor of plaintiff; that all the allegations of the complaint were true, except as to damages, which are fixed at $30 per month, being the same amount agreed to be paid as rent; and judgment of restitution was entered, with $315, being three times the rent found due.

There is not a formal assignment of errors in the transcript or brief, and it is difficult to glean from some of the objections made by counsel for appellant the precise nature of his intended contention. The first objection is that the notices given by plaintiff to defendant are based upon the theory that defendant was guilty of unlawful detainer, while the judgment is one for the nonpayment of rent. The notice of January 20, 1891, given to defendant, as specified in the complaint, was to the effect that the tenancy would expire April 1st, and required defendant to surrender the premises at that date. It contained all that is necessary under section 789 of the Civil Code, and section 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to terminate the tenancy. Upon the expiration of the time specified in the notice plaintiff could have maintained an action of ejectment. Martin v. Splivalo, 56 Cal. 128. The residue of the notice as to instituting a suit, the recovery of damages, and $200 per month, may, in view of the pleadings, be treated as surplusage. The second notice was in compliance with sections 1161 and 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and upon the expiration of three days entitled plaintiff to maintain an action for unlawful detainer under the summary proceedings provided for in chapter 4, tit. 3, pt. 3, Code Civil Proc. The summons in the cause is not set out in the transcript, and there is nothing to indicate with certainty whether the action was intended as one in ejectment or as a summary proceeding for an unlawful detainer. The complaint, with its prayer for relief and the relief granted, are all such as warrant the inference that the latter was the object aimed at, and we shall so regard it.

It is a sufficient answer to the objections urged against the instructions to the jury that no objections or exceptions to the giving of them, or any of them, appear in the record. Nor is there the faintest suggestion that any exceptions were in fact taken.

Appellant further objects that the issues of law, and the equitable defense contained in the amended answer, and amended cross complaint, were tried together. No doubt the better and more orderly method would be to first try the equitable issues where it can be done. In the present case, however, they were so involved by the pleadings with the legal issues that it would be difficult to segregate them. Conceding, however, that it could have been done, no request of that kind was made, and, having consented by a failure to object to the trial of all the issues, legal and equitable together, the objection made here for the first time comes too late. A general verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff and certain questions were also propounded to the jury, all of which were answered in favor of the plaintiff. The court adopted the verdict and findings of the jury, and found, further, that the affirmative allegations of defendant's answer and of his cross complaint were each and all untrue. These were the allegations going to establish an equitable claim. The general verdict was as follows: "We, the jury in this case, find for the plaintiff Diggs that he is entitled to the possession of the premises in controversy, and assess his damages at $—, and entitled to the sum of $30 as rent per month." The court, as before stated, adopted the findings, and as a conclusion of law found, among other things, that plaintiff was entitled to "judgment against said Porteus for rent of the same at the rate of $30 per month from and after April 1, 1891, until July 16, 1891, and that the same be trebled," etc.

April 1, 1891, was the date of the termination of the lease under the notice, which was admitted by the pleadings to have been given, and the date of the verdict, which was rendered July 16, 1891. Section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in cases of forcible entry and forcible and unlawful detainer the court or jury shall assess the damages occasioned to the plaintiff, and find the amount of any rent due if the alleged unlawful detainer be after default in the payment of rent, and the judgment shall be for three times the amount of the damages assessed and the rent found due. From this section it will be observed there can be no objection based upon the ground that the verdict was for rent, eo nomine, instead of for damages.

The only other question is, was the verdict sufficiently certain and comprehensive to authorize the entry of judgment for the rent from April 1, 1891, to July 16, 1891, at $30 per month? The verdict shows plainly that it was not simply for $30, but for $30 per month,—“to the sum of $30 as rent per month.” The allegations of the complaint are that plaintiff has suffered damages in the sum of $500 by reason of the hindrance, delay, and detriment to his business, his accruing damages per month will be $200, and prays for the sum of $200 per month from April 1, 1891, as rent, until restitution is had, and that the amount thereof be trebled, and with a like prayer as to the other damages. The court found all the allegations of the complaint true except as to the damages, which it finds untrue, “except so far as the same includes the rent found by the jury due the plaintiff, Diggs, and adopted by the court. This was, in effect, a finding that rent at $30 per month from April 1st was due the plaintiff. Section 626 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, “when a verdict is found for the plaintiff in an action for the recovery of money, or for the defendant, when a counterclaim for the recovery of money is established, exceeding the amount of the plaintiff’s claim as established, the jury must also find the amount of the recovery.” A general verdict must be certain. An uncertain verdict will not support the judgment upon an appeal. In Watson v. Damon, 54 Cal. 278, which was an action for the recovery of money on a contract, the verdict was as follows: “We, the jury, find for the plaintiff for the amount of contract, two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, with interest at ten per cent. per annum from April 1, 1876, to November 15, 1877, less the amount of notes of the value of nine hundred and fifty dollars, with interest on said notes.” This was held to be insufficient to support the judgment, upon the ground that the interest was uncertain, and that there was nothing in the pleadings from which it could be ascertained. In Macleota v. Packard, 14 Cal. 179, the verdict was as follows: “Verdict for the plaintiff for the full sum claimed, with interest and costs of suit;” and it was held that the verdict did not support a judgment entered thereon for the principal sum claimed, and interest thereon at 10 per cent. per annum from April 12, 1849, to the time of judgment. This court said, “The jury should have found the interest.” In Dougherty v. Haggis, 56 Cal. 522, the complaint alleged plaintiff to be entitled to 500 inches of water measured with a 4-inch pressure, and the verdict was: “We, the jury, find that the plaintiff is entitled to 40 inches, miners’ measurement,” etc. It was held the verdict was too uncertain. I am of opinion the verdict in this case is too indefinite to uphold the money judgment entered thereon.

The conclusion of law by the court, and its findings upon the complaint, do not help plaintiff’s case. The action was one at law, pure and simple. The defense was an equitable one. As to the defense it was the right and duty of the court to make findings of its own, or adopt the findings of the jury, or to do both at its option. It did the last, and that very properly; but, the cause having been tried by a jury, the court had no duty to perform in preparing findings. So far as plaintiff’s action at law was concerned, the findings and conclusion of law as to plaintiff’s cause of action must be regarded as surplusage. The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial had, unless plaintiff shall elect, within 30 days after filing the remittitur in the court below, to amend the judgment in his favor by striking out therefrom the sum of $315, awarded to plaintiff therein, and, if he shall so elect, and consent to such amendment, then, and in that event, the judgment so amended shall stand as approved, and as a final judgment in the case.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment will be reversed, and a new trial had, unless plaintiff shall elect within 30 days after filing the remittitur in the court below to amend the judgment in his favor by striking out therefrom the sum of $315, and if he shall so elect and consent to such amendment, then, and in that event, the judgment as so amended shall be affirmed.

BELL et al. v. SAUSALITO LAND & FERRY CO. (No. 14,367.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1893.)

EASEMENTS—WATER RIGHTS—APPEAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

1. Plaintiff, with defendant’s consent, conducted water to a tank on his lot from a spring on defendant’s lot. Thereupon he took possession of another lot, owned by defendant, and conducted water to the latter lot from the tank. Having used the water about eight years, he surrendered possession of the lot to which he had no title, and about a year thereafter purchased the same with its appurtenances, and sold the lot on which was the tank. In the conveyance to plaintiff no mention was made of the right to use the spring, but there was evidence that it was understood that he might use it so long as defendant did not need it. Held, that plaintiff had no water rights in the spring appurtenant to the lot.

2. The court having found for plaintiff in an action to enjoin the cutting off of the water, an assignment of error that there was no evidence to show any grant of the use of the waters of the spring to plaintiff was sufficient.

3. And so of an assignment that there was no evidence that an easement had been created in favor of the premises deeded to plaintiff, or that a servitude had attached to the land where the spring was located.

4. An assignment that there was no evidence to show the existence of an easement at any time in favor of plaintiff's land to the spring was likewise sufficient.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Julia Emma Bell and another against the Sausalito Land & Ferry Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. Wm. Reade and John Currey, for appellant. Taylor & Craig, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action is for an injunction to restrain defendant from removing certain water pipes, and depriving plaintiffs of water supplied thereby, from a certain spring, and for damages for alleged interruptions thereof. The executors of Alexander Forbes were made parties defendant, but they did not answer, and do not appeal. Plaintiffs had judgment granting a perpetual injunction, from which, and an order denying the corporation a new trial, it now appeals.

There is no material conflict in the evidence. Mr. Bell was the only witness on the part of the plaintiffs, and the testimony of defendant's witness was mainly to additional facts, which were not rebutted. In 1874 the plaintiffs were the owners and in possession of lot 2, block 29, of the village of Sausalito. Appellant had formerly owned that lot, and was then the owner of lots 3, 4, and 5 in the same block, and also of another lot, upon which was a blind spring, about 600 feet distant from lot 2, and which, with the knowledge and consent of appellant, plaintiffs improved, and conducted the water therefrom through pipes to a tank on lot 2, and from which water was supplied to their dwelling on said lot. In 1875 plaintiffs bid off said lots 3, 4, and 5 at an auction sale, but made no payment thereon, and obtained no title, but afterwards took possession of them, and conveyed water by pipes from the tank on lot 2 to said lot 3, and used water thereon for cultivating vegetables. One or two years prior to June 21, 1884, plaintiffs surrendered possession of lots 3, 4, and 5 to appellant, and on the date last named Mrs. Bell entered into a contract in writing with appellant for the purchase of lot 3 for the sum of $500, and completed her payments and received a deed therefor February 25, 1886. About the time said contract of purchase was made plaintiffs conveyed lot 2 to the Forbes estate, built a house on lot 3, and removed thereto. In the fall of 1884 appellant cut off the connection between the spring and the Forbes tank on lot 2 by taking up the pipe near the spring, and at the same time connected the tank with appellant's water mains, from which the tank was thereafter supplied, and for the water so furnished the usual rates were charged and paid. The contract of sale of lot 3 to Mrs. Bell was silent in regard to water rights or any appurtenances to the lot. The deed granted the lot with its appurtenances, but made no mention of the water by reservation or otherwise. The complaint alleged that the water from said spring had continuously and openly, and with the full knowledge of, and without objection from, and with the acquiescence of, defendant, been used on lots 2 and 3, and that for more than five years the use of the flow of water from the spring had attached as an appurtenance to lot 3. The complaint also alleged that on March 30, April 16, and May 5, 1885, and on two different occasions in 1886, appellant removed a portion of the pipe which conveyed water to lot 3.

It is contended by respondents that the assignments of error are insufficient, and for that reason the judgment and order should be affirmed. Appellant specifies that "there was no evidence to show any grant of the use of the waters of the spring to the plaintiffs. There was no evidence to show an easement had been created in favor of the premises deeded to plaintiffs, (lot 3,) or that a servitude had attached to the land where the spring was located. There was no evidence to show the existence of an easement at any time in favor of the plaintiffs' land to the spring referred to." It is also specified that the above facts are not found by the court. We think these specifications sufficient. They call attention directly to the controlling questions in the case, and are to be viewed in the light of the findings as made by the court. The findings are merely of probative facts, unless the conclusions drawn from them, and styled and intended as conclusions of law, may be regarded as ultimate facts. These conclusions are as follows: "(1) The hydrants and pipes and the water flowing from said spring to and in the same are necessary for the benefit and enjoyment of said lot 3, and are appurtenant to said lot. (2) The appurtenances, including said hydrants and pipes and said water, and the use and flow thereof, passed to the plaintiff Julia E. Bell, by said deed. (3) The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to a decree as prayed for in their complaint." If the first and second of the above-quoted conclusions are to be regarded as findings of fact, they are not justified by the evidence; and if they are conclusions of law, and not findings of fact, the ultimate facts are not found, nor are probative facts found, which necessarily or conclusively show the existence of the ultimate fact of an easement appurtenant to lot 3, and charged upon the lot upon which the spring is situated as the servient estate. An easement can only be created by grant or by prescription from adverse enjoyment for a period sufficient to bar an action; in this state, five years. At the time the spring was improved, and the water conveyed to lot 2, appellant had no interest in that lot, nor had plaintiffs any interest in lot 3. Plaintiffs not only allege that the water was conveyed to lot 2 with the knowledge and consent of appellant, the owner of the spring, but Bell testified that he talked it over with one of the directors; and Mr. Harrison, a director and chairman of the executive committee of the corporation, testified that it was understood plaintiff might use the spring so long as they did not need it. Under these circumstances, plaintiffs could acquire no right or easement in the spring, nor create any servitude upon the land on which the spring was situated, by possession and use under the license for any length of time, nor is there any evidence that they ever asserted any right otherwise than under this license. No easement was therefore created in favor of lot 2, nor could there be in favor of any other lot. Plaintiffs were not restricted by the terms of the license to a part of the waters of the spring, so there was no opportunity for acquiring a right to another portion of the water by adverse user. Of course, I do not mean to say that, notwithstanding the license, a right by adverse possession and use might not have been created; but that could only have been accomplished by a repudiation of the license, and the use of the water under an unequivocal assertion of right. But no claim or assertion of any such right was ever made until after the purchase of lot 3, and no adverse right in favor of lot 3 could have been created after that, as the water was cut off near the spring a few months after the purchase, and has never since flowed either to lot 2 or 3, through these pipes, or otherwise than through appellant's water mains.

Plaintiffs' claim in this action is based, however, upon an easement appurtenant to lot 3, existing at the date of the purchase; and it is obvious that, unless it then existed, it could not have passed by the deed made nearly two years later, the water from the spring having soon after the purchase been cut off, and the right, by repeated disconnections with the tank, having been emphatically denied. The question remaining to be considered, therefore, is whether a right appurtenant to lot 3 was created by plaintiffs' use of the water thereon during the time they were in possession of that lot without right or title thereto, and which possession and use ceased one or two years before the purchase. The complaint alleged that this use was open, and with the knowledge of appellant. The court found that the water was used upon lot 3 "after 1875, up to the time of the sale," but did not find that the use was known to appellant. No evidence was given on the part of the plaintiff that such use was known, unless it could be inferred from the cultivation of vegetables and the existence of hydrants thereon, while the testimony on the part of defendant was positive that such use was not known until after the pipe had been taken up at the spring, and the tank on the Forbes lot had been supplied from appellant's mains; that it was afterwards found that the supply was short at the Forbes tank, and, upon investigating the cause, the pipe leading from the tank to lot 3 was discovered and disconnected, presumably at the date of the first interruption alleged in the complaint, viz. March 30, 1885. This evidence was not disputed, nor was there any evidence of any claim of right to such use of the water in hostility to or otherwise than under the license. The mere finding of the use, without finding that it was with the knowledge of appellant, who was the owner both of the lot and the water, is insufficient to support the judgment; and, if the existence of an easement is found by the court, the evidence does not justify it. It would, indeed, be a strange conclusion that plaintiffs, having a mere license to use the waters of the spring upon their own lot, could, without the knowledge of appellant, use it upon one of appellant's lots, in which they had no interest, and thus create an easement in favor of one of appellant's lots, and a servitude upon another, and then sell lot 2 to a third party, who acquired no right to the spring, and buy lot 3, with a valuable easement created by themselves, and of which the seller had no knowledge. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

In re PEARSONS' ESTATE.

Appeal of HARSHALL. (No. 15,138.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1893.)

SALE BY EXECUTOR—POWER IN WILL—CONSTRUCTION—CHARITABLE DEVISES.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 963, authorizing an appeal from a judgment or order of the superior court against or in favor of directing the sale of real property, the purchaser of property at an executor's sale may appeal from an order confirming the sale over his objections.

2. Testator, in the first clause of his will, devised to his two aunts certain lands. By the second clause he devised to them also all land held by him jointly with them, directing that on the death of either before he died "all property of whatever nature herein bequeathed to them shall revert and vest in the survivor, her heirs and assigns, forever," and that, in case both of them died before he did, "the aforesaid property otherwise bequeathed to them shall be sold at public auction to the highest cash bidder." Held, that the power to sell given in the second clause of the will applied to the property devised by the first clause as well as that devised by the second.

3. The action of the superior court in refusing to construe a will and to instruct petitioner as to his duties as executor in making sales under a power given by the will, when there was no contention by interested persons that the executor's discretion was not being properly exercised, is not subject to review.

4. A power of sale in a will is not invalidated by the presence of a provision for the distribution of the proceeds among charitable institutions which is invalid under Civil Code, § 1313.

5. A sale by an executor under a power in a will, though required to be confirmed by the court, is not a judicial sale, and the purchaser can repudiate his contract only on grounds which would be sufficient for the rescission of any other contract of sale.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Appeal by Gustave Harshall from an order confirming a sale made by Elliott J. Moore, executor of Hiram A. Pearsons, deceased. Affirmed.

Rosenbaum & Scheeline and Jarboe & Jarboe, for appellant. J. H. Moore, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Hiram A. Pearsons died July 7, 1889, leaving a last will and testament, bearing date August 9, 1882, which was admitted to probate by the superior court of San Francisco August 12, 1889, and letters testamentary issued thereon to Elliott J. Moore, who was named therein as its executor. On the 28th of January, 1892, the executor sold at public auction several parcels of land belonging to the estate of his testator, one of which was purchased by the appellant. The executor did not obtain any order of sale from the superior court, but made the sales upon the contention that he had authority therefor by the terms of the will. After he had made his return, and asked for a confirmation of the sales, the appellant filed certain objections thereto, but upon the hearing the objections were overruled, and the court confirmed the sales, and directed conveyances to be made. From this order the purchaser has appealed.

1. The order confirming the sale and directing a conveyance to be made is appealable. Section 963, (3,) Code Civil Proc., authorizes an appeal to be taken from the superior court to the supreme court "from a judgment or order * * * against or in favor of directing the partition, sale, or conveyance of real property." There is no limitation upon the character of the proceeding in which the order directing the conveyance is made, and we are not authorized to limit the right of appeal more than it has been limited by the legislature. The provisions of section 1553, Id., are not a limitation of the right of filing objections to the confirmation of the sale, but an extension of such right to those who are "interested" in the estate. The right of the purchaser to be heard at the hearing upon the return is implied in the provision of the previous section, which requires public notice of the day fixed for the hearing to be given; and his right to be heard carries with it the right to make objection to the confirmation; and section 938, Id., gives the right of appeal to any party "aggrieved" by the action of the court, whether he be "interested" in the estate or not.

2. The chief objection made by the appellant to the confirmation of the sale is that the executor was not authorized by the will to sell the property, and, as there had been no order of sale made by the court, the sale was incapable of confirmation by reason of the want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter. Section 1561, Code Civil Proc., provides: "When property is directed by the will to be sold, or authority is given in the will to sell property, the executor may sell any property of the estate without order of the court, and at either public or private sale, and with or without notice, as the executor may determine; but the executor must make return of such sales as in other cases, and, if directions are given in the will as to the mode of selling, or the particular property to be sold, such directions must be observed. In either case, no title passes unless the sale be confirmed by the court."

The will in question contains the following provisions: "First. I give, devise, and bequeath unto Betsey Frances Matthewson and Polly Barton, my aunts, the following described lots and pieces of land situate in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California: [Describing the same.] Second. I do give, devise, and bequeath unto Betsey Frances Matthewson and Polly Barton, my aunts, all real property which I hold jointly with them, and I direct that, in the event of the death of either Betsey Frances Matthewson or Polly Barton prior to that of my own, all property of whatever nature herein bequeathed to them shall revert and vest in the survivor, her heirs and assigns, forever. And, furthermore, in the event of the death of both Betsey Frances Matthewson and Polly Barton prior to my decease, the aforesaid property otherwise bequeathed to them shall be sold at public auction to the highest cash bidder, the proceeds of said sale to be equally distributed among the different orphan asylums of the city and county of San Francisco, and said asylums I request to be designated by the judge of the probate court." "Seventh. I do give, devise, and bequeath the remainder of my property, of whatever kind, to Betsey Frances Matthewson and Polly Barton, subject to the reversion before stated. All the above real property being situated in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California." Betsey Frances Matthewson and Polly Barton died prior to the death of the testator, without leaving any descendants. By their death in the lifetime of the testator the testamentary disposition in their favor failed, but by virtue of the provisions of section 1343, Civil Code, the testamentary disposition of the property which had been devised to them did not fail, for the reason that it is apparent from the terms of the will that the testator intended to substitute the orphan asylums of San Francisco in their place. The provisions of section 1313, Id., which preclude these beneficiaries from receiving more than one-third of his estate, do not destroy this intention, but merely prevent it from being carried into effect.

The property sold by the executor is a portion of that described in the first of the above clauses in the will, and his power to sell it without any previous order of the court depends upon the construction to be given to the latter portion of the second of the above clauses. The executor's authority to sell property is, by the terms of the will, brought into existence only in the event of the death of both of the testator's aunts prior to his own death. Upon the happening of that event he directed the aforesaid property to be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, and it is therefore necessary to ascertain what was the "aforesaid" property to which the authority was extended. On the one hand it is contended that the authority to sell which is given in the will is limited to the property disposed of in the second clause; while on the other hand it is contended that it extends to all the estate which would have been taken by his aunts in case they or either of them had survived him. By his will the testator made his aunts his devisees of three different classes of property, viz.: (1) The specific lots of land described in the first clause thereof; (2) all property which he held jointly with them; (3) the residuum of his estate after satisfying his other dispositions thereof. The second clause of his will is devoted to three distinct subjects: (1) The devise to the aunts of the property therein specifically described; (2) the provision for the nature of the estate which they shall take in the property which he leaves to them; (3) the disposition to be made of this property in case both of them should die before him. This latter subject also contains two testamentary provisions, viz. that the property shall be sold at public auction, and that its proceeds shall be distributed among the orphan asylums of San Francisco. After giving to his aunts all real property which he held jointly with them, he directs that, in the event of the death of either of them prior to his own,

"all property of whatever nature herein bequeathed to them shall revert to and vest in the survivor, her heirs and assigns forever." The evident purpose of the testator in this clause was to make his aunts joint tenants with the right of survivorship in all the estate which they would receive under the will, although the use of the term "revert" in this connection is inappropriate, and must be construed in connection with the term "vest," as expressive of his intention to confer the right of survivorship. The property thus directed by him to vest in the survivor is not limited to that which in the first part of the same clause was devised to them both. In that part of the clause he only disposes of "all real property which I hold jointly with them," while in the latter part of the clause he directs that "all property of whatever nature herein bequeathed to them" shall vest in the survivor; thus clearly indicating that he intended the right of survivorship to extend to other property than that which in the previous portion of the same clause he had devised to his aunts. Nor does his use in this clause of the word "herein" limit the right of survivorship to the property which he had in that clause devised to them. "Herein," as used in legal phraseology, is a locative adverb, and its meaning is to be determined by the context. "It may refer to the section, the chapter, or the entire enactment in which it is used," (And. Law Dict.;) and this rule is applicable to the construction of a document as well as of a statute. In the present case its reference to "all property of whatever nature" indicates its application to other property than "real property held jointly" with his aunts. We are not seeking to determine herein the extent to which the testator directed the right of survivorship to attach, since both of his aunts died in his lifetime; but the object of this discussion is merely for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the testator, and the meaning which he gave to the words in his direction for the sale, that "the aforesaid property" be sold. Having provided for the contingency of the death of one of his aunts, the contingency of the death of both of them would naturally present itself to his mind; and it is reasonable to suppose that the provision which he would make for that contingency would be as extensive as that which he had made for the contingency of the death of only one of them. Accordingly, he "furthermore" directs that in that event "the aforesaid property" be sold at public auction. There is no rule of construction which limits the application of the term "aforesaid" to that which immediately precedes it, and in the present case there is nothing in the connection, or in the subject to which it refers, which would justify us in passing over the intervening clause in which the testator mentions "all property of whatever nature herein bequeathed to them," and limits its application to certain real property held jointly with his aunts that had been designated in a previous portion of the clause. See Doe v. Gell, 2 Barn. & C. 680. In the absence of any qualifying terms, its natural reference would at least include that which next preceded it, and would be as comprehensive as the term to which it referred. We have already seen that the "property" for which he made provision in the event of the death of one of his aunts included "all property of whatever nature" that by his will he had given to both of them, and it follows that the provision for the contingency of the death of both of them is equally extensive. We hold, therefore, that the "aforesaid property" which the testator directed to be sold at public auction includes "all property of whatever nature," which, in the sentence immediately preceding, he refers to as having been bequeathed by him to his aunts.

3. After the will had been admitted to probate, and prior to the sale of the land involved in this appeal, the executor filed a petition in the superior court, praying for the construction of certain clauses of the will, and for a determination of his duties in reference thereto. In his petition he set forth the foregoing clauses of the will, and showed to the court that the aunts had died before the decedent; that the decedent left certain heirs at law, and that the bequest to the orphan asylums exceeded one-third of his estate; that in the third clause of his will the testator had devised to a Mrs. Kinsey all his interest in a certain block excepting that which he held jointly with his aunts, and he asked the court to determine what portion of that block was held jointly by the testator with his aunts, who were the legatees and who the next of kin, how the estate should be distributed, and what real estate should be sold to pay the bequests to the different orphan asylums. At the hearing upon this petition the court declined to pass upon many of the questions presented therein, for the reason that the proper time for acting thereon would be upon an application for distribution, and limited its judgment to determining the property which Mrs. Kinsey was entitled to receive under the third clause of the will. From this judgment an appeal was taken, and is now pending in this court.

It is now urged by the appellant that by this proceeding the executor cast doubts upon his power to sell any portion of the estate of the testator, and rendered the title to the lands sold by him uncertain, and, therefore, that the purchaser ought not to be compelled to take the same, and that the court should not have made a confirmation of the sale. The judgment of the court upon that petition was, however, limited to the land described in the third clause of the will, and does not affect the land sold to the appellant herein. The question of the power of the executor to sell any property of the decedent was not involved in the proceedings before the court; nor does this power appear to have been questioned, either by himself or by any of the respondents to the petition, and it is not alluded to in the judgment. The executor did, it is true, ask the court to determine what property should be sold to pay the bequests to the several orphan asylums; but the court did not in its judgment give to him any direction, acting doubtless upon the theory that, as the discretion upon this subject had been already conferred upon him by the testator, it was not proper for the court to interfere, in the absence of any objection by interested parties that such discretion was not being properly exercised. It may have been prudent for the executor to seek in advance instruction upon his duties in these respects, but the court was at liberty to give it or not, and the exercise of its discretion in declining to give it is not subject to review or comment.

4. It is objected that, inasmuch as the testator's bequest to charitable purposes is in excess of one-third of his estate, he died intestate as to such excess, and therefore the power of sale in the will cannot be executed. The power of sale conferred by the will does not depend for the validity of its execution upon a valid disposition of the proceeds of the sale. The power of converting the estate into money depends upon the will of the testator, and may be conferred without any limitation, while the power of disposing of his estate is limited by a statutory provision. In the present case there is no specific property given to the orphan asylums, nor is there any specific property directed to be sold with which to pay the legacies to them, but the testator directs the sale of the entire estate "otherwise" (i. e. if they had survived him) bequeathed to his aunts, and the proceeds of said sale distributed among the different orphan asylums of San Francisco. Neither the statute nor the testator places any limitation upon the exercise of the power of sale over the property; but after that power has been exercised, and the estate reduced to money, the statute steps in, and prevents the executor from carrying into effect the further direction in the will that these proceeds shall be distributed to the orphan asylums. The provisions of section 1313, Civil Code, only make void "dispositions" of property made contrary thereto, but do not affect any other disposition of the property contained in the will, or impair a power of sale given by the will for converting the entire estate into money. The "disposition" of the property which the testator made in directing it to be sold at public auction does not contravene this section, but only the distribution of the proceeds of the sale is contrary thereto. A testator may confer upon his executor the power to sell all his estate, and divide the proceeds among his heirs at law, or he may confer such power, and distribute the proceeds according to his will, except as prevented by the statute. The heirs at law are not entitled to receive the estate in specie, since the act of the executor in selling the same is within the express authority conferred upon him by the will. Their rights arise only when an attempt is made to carry out the further provisions of the will in distributing the proceeds of those sales to the orphan asylums. The one-third of the estate which may be given to charitable uses is one-third of the distributable assets, (Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 457,) and a sale and conversion of the property into money when the devise is not specific is a convenient, if not a necessary, mode of ascertaining the amount of the estate for the purpose of determining the quantity thereof to which the charitable beneficiaries are entitled. Until a sale, it cannot be determined what is the amount of the estate. "The valuation of the inventory is not conclusive for any purpose." Estate of Hinckley, supra. Its value at the date of distribution must be ascertained for the purpose of ascertaining the amount to which the charitable beneficiaries and the heirs at law are respectively entitled.

5. It is further contended by the appellant that it is incumbent upon the executor to satisfy the purchaser that the title which his conveyance will transfer will pass all the estate in the property of which the testator was seised at the moment of his death, and, inasmuch as there may have been a wife or a pretermitted child whose interest in the estate would be paramount to the will, and would not pass by the executor's conveyance, the court ought not to have confirmed the sale without requiring the executor to furnish evidence in disproof of their existence. A sale by an executor under a power in the will is not a judicial sale, nor does the statutory requirement that no title shall pass until the sale be confirmed give to it the incidents of a judicial sale. A judicial sale is one made under the order of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the sale, and which it directs to be sold for the purpose of carrying its judgment into effect, or of directing a disposition of its proceeds. Freem. Jud. Sales, § 1. At such a sale the court is regarded as the vendor, and a purchaser who buys the property at the sale has a right to a conveyance which will vest in him the title to the property sold, and may present in objection to its confirmation any facts which will impair or defeat the title thereby transferred. We refer here to those sales which purport to sell the property itself, and not those in which only the right, title, and interest of the parties to the proceeding are sold, as in such cases the purchaser buys at his own risk. The purchaser from an executor at a sale under a power in the will deals with him in making the purchase as he would with any other vendor. He makes the purchase subject to a confirmation by the court, but in all other respects he may incorporate in his contract of purchase the same terms and conditions as he would in dealing with any other agent for the sale of property, and he can repudiate his contract for purchase only for the same reasons as he could in case he had bought from another. The executor is regarded as the donee of a power, (Conklin v. Egerton, 21 Wend. 436; Newton v. Bronson, 13 N. Y. 592,) and the sale is treated as if made under a power; and the purchaser is required to examine the sufficiency of this power as he is that of any other power under which a sale may be made, (Larco v. Casaneuava, 30 Cal. 561.) In this state it is essential that the will shall have been admitted to probate before the power can have any validity, (Castro v. Richardson, 18 Cal. 478,) but in all other respects the contract of purchase and sale between the executor and his vendee is attended with the same incidents, and is to receive the same construction, as a similar contract between any other vendor and vendee. Prior to 1861 a sale by an executor under a power in the will was valid without any confirmation by the court. In that year the legislature amended the procedure so as to require that such sale should be confirmed by the probate court, the same as those made under its own order. The confirmation thus required is, however, for the protection of the estate, and for the purpose of determining whether it will confirm the sale. The scope of investigation by the court is limited to ascertaining whether the sale was legally made and fairly conducted, and the sum bid not disproportionate to the value of the property sold, and that a sum exceeding such bid at least 10 per cent., exclusive of the expenses of a new sale, cannot be obtained. Code Civil Proc. § 1554. If any of these facts exist, the court is authorized to vacate the former sale, (Estate of Durham, 49 Cal. 490;) but unless such facts are shown to the court, the court must make an order confirming the sale. Section 1554.

In the ordinary contract of purchase and sale there is an implication that the conveyance to be made thereunder will transfer the title to the property; but, in the absence of any special agreement upon the subject, it is incumbent upon the vendee to examine the title for himself, and to point out any objections he may have to the title tendered him by the vendor. Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. Rep. 280. The title to a piece of real estate frequently depends as much upon the existence of facts outside of the record as it does upon the records and written muniments of title, and the investigation of these facts is as essential to an examination of the title as is the examination of the records. In the examination of a title to be derived from an executor under a power of sale in the will it is es-essential to know whether the testator was married at the time of his death, and, if so, whether the property offered for sale was community property; and also whether the decedent left children surviving him whom he did not mention in his will. These, however, are questions of fact to be determined by the vendee, and, if found to exist, and deemed by him to impair the sufficiency of the title tendered by the vendor under his contract, should be pointed out. In the present case no proof of the existence of these facts was presented, and it is very clear that, unless they are shown to exist, the vendee cannot make the possibility of their existence a ground for refusing confirmation of the sale, any more than he could make such possibility a ground for resisting an action for specific performance.

The order is affirmed.

This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained while plaintiff was crossing Ninth street, in San Francisco, at its intersection with Howard, through being run into by a wagon negligently driven by the defendant. The case was submitted to a jury, which returned a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order refusing him a new trial.

Plaintiff's testimony tended to prove that plaintiff was crossing Ninth street, going towards Tenth, on the street crossing, when a meat wagon driven by defendant's servant rapidly down Howard turned upon Ninth, over the crossing where plaintiff was; that plaintiff started to run down Ninth, leaving the crossing, and defendant's wagon, without slackening speed, ran upon her, knocking her down, and inflicting upon her the injury complained of. Naturally, the defense contended that by leaving the crossing, and running down the street, instead of hastening across, plaintiff increased the danger; was, in fact, guilty of such contributory negligence as should prevent her recovering. The plaintiff, who was about 70 years old, at the trial stated that she did not see the wagon, but, hearing the noise, she thought it was the street car, (on Howard street, I presume,) and so started to run as fast as she could, but had proceeded but a few steps when she was struck. This raised a question, undoubtedly, as to whether plaintiff was not guilty of negligence which contributed proximately to the injury. But the matter was left to the jury, and it cannot be said that there was not sufficient evidence to justify their conclusion. Defendant's evidence conflicts with that of the plaintiff, but, as the jury evidently did not believe defendant's witnesses, and the court refused a new trial, that is not a matter of much interest here.

There is nothing in the claim that the verdict is against law. The point there made is that there was no proof of negligence on the part of defendant. The argument to sustain the point is that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. This point cannot be made under the objection that the verdict is against law. Still, it is the same as that made under the exception as to insufficiency of the evidence, and need not be further considered.

The defendant complains of the refusal of the court to give certain instructions. The first is as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff brought about the collision by pursuing her intended route, when she could easily and safely have avoided the contact by turning to the left, and from the wagon, then she is guilty of contributory negligence, and your verdict should be for defendant." This instruction was properly refused. It involves the proposition that if the jury can now see that there was some other course open to plaintiff than the one she did take, which would have prevented the injury, she cannot recover. This is not law. That she used bad judgment in the excitement of imminent danger does not necessarily prove negligence. Whether the fact that she took an unwise course was negligence, under the circumstances, was for the jury.

2. An instruction was also asked to the effect that streets may be used by vehicles and pedestrians; that wagons must go over the crossings; and that all persons using the crossings must use a high degree of care and caution for their own safety, and that of others. It is difficult to see any benefit in the instruction for the defendant, but there was no occasion to tell the jury that the streets were for use and included the crossings, and I do not understand that a pedestrian is called upon, when upon a street crossing, to use more than ordinary care for the safety of others. It certainly was no injury to the defendant that the court failed to instruct the jury that the defendant was bound to use a high degree of care and caution at that point. Besides, the jury were fully instructed upon this subject.

3. The next complaint is the refusal to give the following instruction: "If you believe from the evidence that the driver of the defendant's wagon checked his horses seasonably when about to turn the corner, and the plaintiff, seeing the wagon, also checked her speed, the driver of the wagon, seeing his road clear, had a right to suppose that the plaintiff was alert to care for her safety, and would not run against the wagon or the horses, and the driver might lawfully resume his progress at a moderate speed, using proper care to avoid accident." There are several objections to this proposed instruction. If the driver checked the speed of his wagon, and plaintiff also "checked her speed," it would not therefore necessarily follow that the driver, seeing his road clear, could drive on, relying on the alertness of the plaintiff to get out of the way. There may have been indications that she was not alert, or was confused; and if, for any reason, she did not get out of the way, defendant had no right to drive over her. The instruction also assumes that she run against the wagon or horses. This was not conceded to be the fact, but was opposed to testimony of plaintiff's witnesses, and to plaintiff's theory of the case. The instruction, at the best, is as to the effect of testimony. Whether the driver could properly resume his course, supposing that he did check his team, was for the jury.

The right to do so did not follow as matter of law from the assumed facts.

4. The next point is that the instruction given by the court on the subject of contributory negligence is erroneous. The only objection made to this instruction was that it was not sufficiently explicit, and was not applicable to the facts and circumstances of the case. This objection admits the correctness of the instruction as a proposition of law. If the defendant desired an instruction which would be in some respects more explicit, he should have drafted the desired instruction, and requested the court to give it. The objection does not state in what respect it failed to be sufficiently explicit. It is not so much an objection to the instruction as a statement that the party is entitled to further instruction, upon what special point, however, was not stated. Under such circumstances the appellant cannot complain. That it was not applicable to the facts was probably intended as a repetition of the same objection. In the briefs no such claim is made. The defect in the instruction, argued here, was not only not called to the attention of the court, but the objection actually made conceded the correctness of the instruction in that respect. See Robinson v. Railroad Co., 48 Cal. 425. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

DESMOND v. FAUS et al. (No. 14,116.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1893.)

NEW TRIAL—EXTENDING TIME FOR SERVING STATEMENT—PRACTICE.

1. The fact that counsel consented to the first extension of time in which to serve the statement on a motion for a new trial did not authorize the court to further extend the time 30 days, under the Code, exclusive of the first extension.

2. An order denying a motion for a new trial is properly made on the hearing of a motion to dismiss the same for failure to prosecute with due diligence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by James Desmond against Otto Faus and others. There was a verdict for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James F. Smith, for appellant. J. F. Castelhun, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries, and the verdict was for the defendants. Plaintiff appeals from an order refusing a new trial.

Respondents contend that the order must be affirmed, without considering the alleged errors, because plaintiff lost his right to move for a new trial by his failure to prepare and serve his proposed statement in time. Notice of intention to move for a new trial was given April 7, 1888. The proposed statement was served May 28th,—49 days after the notice of intention was given. The adverse party did not consent to any extension of the time. Sundry orders extending the time were made by the court, amounting to 45 days in all. But the court could only grant extensions amounting to 30 days, which, added to the 10 days given by the Code, make 40 days. The statement was therefore served 9 days too late. No excuse is attempted for this delay, but it seems to be contended that the court granted the first extension of 15 days with the consent of the attorney for defendants. His record does not sustain this contention, but if it did it would not satisfy the exigencies of plaintiff's case. Such consent is itself a refusal to stipulate, and amounts to referring counsel to the court for his relief. It falls far short of a consent that the court may extend the time more than 30 days.

December 14, 1888, a motion was noticed to dismiss the motion for a new trial on the ground that plaintiff had not prosecuted it with due diligence. Amendments to the proposed statement were served July 3, 1888. It does not appear whether anything was done to effect a settlement prior to October, when plaintiff was ordered to engross the statement. December 8, 1888, defendants gave notice of a motion to dismiss for want of due diligence in prosecuting the motion. Yet the statement was not engrossed until March 14, 1889, and was certified and settled March 15, 1889, and not filed until March 30th. I find no evidence in the record that the motion for a new trial was ever brought on, or submitted for decision, except by the motion to dismiss. The order appealed from is as follows: "In this action the defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's motion for a new trial having been heretofore submitted to this court for consideration and decision, now, the court having fully considered the same, it is ordered that the motion for a new trial herein be, and the same is hereby, denied." By this order it would seem that the motion was granted, or rather that the motion for a new trial was denied, because of the failure to prosecute with due diligence. This practice has been approved by this court in several cases. Quivey v. Gambert, 32 Cal. 309; Calderwood v. Peyser, 42 Cal. 110; McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 325; Bunuel v. Stockton, 83 Cal. 319, 23 Pac. Rep. 301. Whether the first objection, that the proposed statement was not served in time, is properly included in the motion to dismiss for failure to prosecute with due diligence, may be questioned. No point is made on this, however, and no injury is done. By such failure, plaintiff's motion was lost. The objection to the failure to serve in time was never waived by respondents, but was expressly reserved in all subsequent steps in the proceeding. The order, I think, should be affirmed.

GARBER v. GIANELLA. (No. 14,736.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)

DEED OF LEASED LAND—NOTICE TO PURCHASER—POSSESSION BY SUBTENANT—UNRECORDED LEASE TO TENANT—ESTOPPEL.

1. The owner of land leased it for five years to defendant, for cash rental, but the lease was not recorded. The latter sublet it, by recorded lease, to B., for a share of the crops. Thereafter the owner conveyed the land, with the rents and profits, by full warranty deed, to plaintiff, "subject, however, to a lease to B., which said lease expires" nearly two years from date of the deed. Held that, in the absence of actual notice to plaintiff of defendant's interest under his lease from the owner, plaintiff was entitled to the rents and profits after his purchase of the land, as the record of the lease from defendant to B. was not constructive notice to plaintiff of defendant's interest.

2. Defendant, as representative of the owner, placed the land in the hands of brokers for sale, through whom plaintiff purchased, and also delivered to the latter the deed, and received the purchase money, without at any time disclosing to plaintiff any interest in the land under his unrecorded lease. Held, that defendant was estopped from claiming any interest in the land.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by Samuel Garber against Vincenzo Gianella for the conversion of certain wheat. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. G. Murphy and Barney & Donohoe, for appellant. M. E. Sanborn, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff recovered a judgment in this action against the defendant for the conversion of certain wheat. The plaintiff claimed title to the wheat by virtue of his ownership of the land; and the defendant, by virtue of a lease executed between him and one Boulware prior to the acquisition of the land by the plaintiff. The land is situated in Yuba county, and was originally owned by Lorenzo Gianella, the father of the defendant, and was conveyed to the plaintiff by a deed of conveyance bearing date April 12, 1888, and recorded two days thereafter. The deed was an ordinary grant, bargain, and sale deed of the land in question, "together with the rents, issues, and profits thereof," and contained the following covenant: "And the said party of the first part, and his heirs, the said premises in quiet and peaceable possession of the said party of the second part, and his heirs and assigns, against the said party of the first part, and his heirs, and against all and every person and persons whomsoever, lawfully claiming or to claim the same, shall and will warrant, and by these presents forever defend, subject, however, to a lease to Daniel Boulware, which said lease expires November 1, 1889." The defendant testified that his father had given him a lease of a tract of land, including that conveyed to the plaintiff, upon a money rent, for the term of five years, expiring November 1, 1889, and by virtue thereof, on the 6th day of September, 1886, he had leased the same to Boulware for the term of three years from November 1, 1886, by the terms of which Boulware was to pay him a yearly rent or sum of one-third of the crops in the stack at the machine. The lease from Lorenzo Gianella to the defendant was not acknowledged or recorded, and the lease from the defendant to Boulware was recorded, at the request of the defendant, April 3, 1888. The wheat which the defendant is charged with having converted is that which was delivered by Boulware to him in accordance with the terms of the lease between them. While the plaintiff was negotiating for the purchase of the land he was informed that there was a lease to Boulware, which did not expire till a year from the ensuing fall, but he was not informed who was the lessor to Boulware, and testified that he supposed that it was his grantor. Other testimony was given to the effect that at the time of the negotiation it was the understanding between the plaintiff and the brokers who had charge of the sale that the plaintiff was not to disturb Boulware in his possession, and was to receive all the rents and issues of the land.

The conveyance from Lorenzo Gianella to the plaintiff had the effect to transfer to him the entire ownership of the land, including its rents, issues, and profits, subject to only such limitations as were contained in the instrument of transfer, or of which the plaintiff had either actual or constructive notice. As the lease to the defendant from his father was not recorded, there was no constructive notice thereby to the plaintiff of its existence. The lease was a "conveyance" of the land, within the definition of section 1215 of the Civil Code; and the interest in the land that was thereby created in the defendant, though limited to a right to receive the products of the land, was as void, as against the plaintiff, by reason of the failure to have it recorded, as if it had been an unrecorded conveyance in fee. The record of the lease from the defendant to Boulware was not constructive notice of the lease to the defendant, or that he had any interest in the land. The provisions of recording acts are for the protection of subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers from the common grantor, and do not affect the rights of strangers to the claim of title. Chicago v. Witt, 75 Ill. 211; Losey v. Simpson, 11 N. J. Eq. 249; Traphagen v. Irwin, 18 Neb. 198, 24 N. W. Rep. 684; Ely v. Wilcox, 20 Wis. 523; Long v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 227; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 658, 701. Records are only constructive notice of a title, of which they enable a party to obtain actual notice or knowledge by means of a search. As the record did not impart any constructive notice to the plaintiff of the rights of the defendant in the land, it was necessary for him to show that the plaintiff had actual notice of such rights before he made his purchase, and of this the burden was upon the defendant. The record, however, fails to show that the plaintiff was ever informed, either by the defendant himself, or by any other person, that the defendant claimed any interest in the land, or that he was the owner of the leasehold estate under which he seeks to defend this action. The clause in the conveyance to the plaintiff, "subject, however, to a lease to Daniel Boulware, which said lease expires November 1, 1889," does not contain or imply any notice of this character, and is entirely consistent with the title which the deed purported to transfer. Not naming any one as the lessor to Boulware, and being found as a limitation upon a covenant on the part of the grantor, the natural construction to be given to the language of the instrument is that which was testified to by the plaintiff, and those through whose agency he effected the purchase, viz. that the possession of Boulware was not to be disturbed until the time named in the deed as the termination of his lease. The deed does not contain any reservation of the rents that were to be paid by Boulware under this lease, and the grant of the rents, issues, and profits of the land in a previous portion of the deed justified the belief that whatever rents were to be paid by Boulware were to belong to the plaintiff herein. If it had been intended that such rents should be reserved for the defendant, there should have been an express mention thereof in the deed.

It clearly appears from the record that the plaintiff was wholly ignorant of any claim by the defendant to an interest in the land, or in the lease to Boulware, until many months after he had made the purchase, and the position which the defendant held in the matter of the purchase by the plaintiff gave him every opportunity for giving to the plaintiff actual notice of his unrecorded lease. As the representative of his father, he had placed the property in the hands of the brokers for sale, and after the sale to the plaintiff had been effected by them, and the deed sent for execution to his father, who lived at Santa Rosa, the defendant wrote for the deed, and it was returned to him, executed by his father, and containing the foregoing clause in reference to Boulware's lease; and upon its receipt the defendant notified the plaintiff thereof, and they went together to a banking house in Marysville, where the money was paid to him, and the deed delivered by him to the plaintiff. It was then incumbent upon the defendant, if he had intended to claim an interest in the land by virtue of the lease to Boulware, to notify the plaintiff thereof; and his failure to do so estops him from now claiming that the deed did not transfer the land according to its terms. Whatever ambiguity there is in the deed, in its reference to the Boulware lease, is to be construed as strongly against the defendant as against the grantor in the deed; and inasmuch as that clause is consistent with the transfer of the entire ownership of the land, except as to the right of Boulware to remain there, we must hold that the plaintiff took the land discharged of any claim of the defendant.

Certain errors of law are specified in the statement, but none of them deserve any particular notice. It was within the discretion of the court to allow the plaintiff, after the motion for a nonsuit had been denied, to supplement his case by additional proof. The objection to allowing any testimony by the witnesses thereafter called, upon the ground that after the motion for the nonsuit had been denied it was incompetent to call them, cannot be used as against any particular testimony, thereafter introduced, that was not specially objected to.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re JOHNSON'S ESTATE. (No. 18,028.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)

ADOPTION—EXAMINATION OF CHILD.

1. Civil Code, §§ 222-226, provide, as necessary to the adoption of a child, that the person adopting must be at least 10 years older than the child; that certain persons must consent, including the child if over 12 years of age; and that the child, the person adopting, and other persons whose consent is necessary, must appear before the county judge, and the necessary consent must thereupon be signed, and an agreement executed by the person adopting to educate and treat the child in all respects as his own. Section 227 provides that the judge must examine "all persons appearing before him," each separately, and, if satisfied that the interests of the child will be promoted, shall make an order of adoption. Held, that the examination of a child under the age of consent is not necessary. Harrison and Pater-son, JJ., dissenting.

2. The fact that the agreement and consent are not actually signed in presence of the judge, but are signed and filed with the clerk before the parties appear, can make no difference as to the validity of the adoption, since the material thing under the statute is merely that the parties shall consent in presence of the judge, and that such consent shall be manifest by writings then delivered.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Petition of Mary Eliza Johnson Howell for revocation of letters of administration issued to Eugene W. Kay upon the estate of William B. Johnson, deceased, and for her own appointment as administratrix. From an order denying the petition, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Baldwin & Campbell, F. T. Baldwin, J. C. Campbell, and Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for appellant. Jas. H. and J. E. Budd, Nutter & Devries, and Wesley Minta, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Appeal from an order of the superior court denying the petition of Mary Eliza Johnson Howell for the revocation of letters of administration issued to one Eugene W. Kay upon the estate of William B. Johnson, deceased, and for her appointment as administratrix of said estate. The proceeding was commenced under section 1383 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The petitioner claims to be the legally adopted child of the deceased, and whether she is or not is the only question presented by this appeal.

It appears from the evidence that on July 8, 1874, the petitioner was a motherless child, five years of age, and the daughter of David G. Strahan; and on that day the deceased, William B. Johnson, then an unmarried man, the petitioner, and her father, all residents of the county of San Joaquin, appeared before the Honorable W. S. Buckley, county judge of that county, and an order was made by said judge declaring the petitioner adopted by the said deceased, and that she should be regarded and treated in all respects as his child, and should take his family name. The order, as shown by its recitals, was based upon a petition therefor, signed by the deceased, accompanied by the written consent of the father of the petitioner herein to such adoption, and an agreement executed by the deceased to the father to the effect that the petitioner here should be adopted as the child of the deceased, and treated in all respects as if she were his own lawful child. The order further sets forth that all parties to the proceeding were "present before the county judge of said county of San Joaquin in open court," and "were then and there (save and except said child) duly sworn and examined separately in relation thereto;" and that it appeared "that the interest of said minor would be promoted by such adoption." The petitioner lived with the deceased as his child from the date of the proceeding for her adoption until her marriage in April, 1889. The adoptive father had no other children, and died in January, 1891, intestate. The natural father of petitioner is also dead. Upon the foregoing evidence, which is undisputed, the superior court found that the adoption papers were not signed or acknowledged before the county judge of San Joaquin county, and that the child, Mary Eliza Strahan, the petitioner here, was never examined before the county judge, and, as a conclusion of law, held that the adoption proceedings were and are invalid.

1. The respondent claims that the appellant was never legally adopted by the deceased, because she was not examined by the county judge at the time the order of adoption was made, as required by section 227 of the Civil Code, then and now in force; and this is the main question to be decided by us. The right of one person to legally adopt the offspring of another, and thus to create between the person adopting and the child adopted the relation of parent and child, giving the child all the rights and subjecting it to all the duties of that relation, was unknown to the common law, and exists in this state as a pure creation of statute law; and, in order to effect such adoption, it is necessary that there should be a substantial compliance with all of the essential requirements of the law under which the right is claimed; but, in determining what provisions of the law are essential, and therefore mandatory, the statute is to receive a sensible construction, and its intention is to be ascertained, not from the literal meaning of any particular word or single section, but from a consideration of the entire statute, its spirit and purpose. In the case of Rutledge v. Crawford, 91 Cal. 533, 27 Pac. Rep. 779, this court said that "it is one of the great maxims of interpretation to keep always in view the general scope, object, and purpose of the law, rather than the mere letter. He who considers merely the letter of an instrument goes but skin-deep into its meaning." Broom, Leg. Max. 611.

Following this rule of construction, it is necessary to read section 227 of the Civil Code with other sections of the same Code relating to the subject of adoption, in order to determine the force of the objection made by respondent to the validity of the adoption proceedings under consideration now. Those sections are: Section 222: "The person adopting a child must be at least ten years older than the person adopted." Section 223: "A married man, not lawfully separated from his wife, cannot adopt a child without the consent of his wife; nor can a married woman, not thus separated from her husband, without his consent: provided, the husband or wife not consenting is capable of giving such consent." Section 224: "A legitimate child cannot be adopted without the consent of its parents, if living, nor an illegitimate child without the consent of its mother, if living, except that consent is not necessary from a father or mother deprived of civil rights * * * or who has been judicially deprived of the custody of the child on account of cruelty or neglect." Section 225: "The consent of a child, if over the age of twelve years, is necessary to its adoption." Section 226, (as it read in 1874):

Cal. Rep. 32-34 P.—27

"The person adopting a child, and the child adopted, and the other persons whose consent is necessary, must appear before the county judge of the county where the person adopting resides, and the necessary consent must thereupon be signed, and an agreement be executed by the person adopting, to the effect that the child shall be educated and treated in all respects as his own lawful child should be treated." Then follows section 227, upon which the respondent places special reliance, and which provides: "The judge must examine all persons appearing before him pursuant to the last section, each separately, and, if satisfied that the interests of the child will be promoted by the adoption, he must make an order declaring that the child shall thenceforth be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of the person adopting."

The language of this section, if literally construed, is broad enough to require the examination of an infant incapable of consenting to the proceeding, or of giving to the judge any information which could aid him in determining whether to give or withhold his consent to the adoption; and the contention of respondent on this point is that the section is mandatory, and must receive this literal construction; and that without the examination of such an infant the proceeding for its adoption, although regular in every other respect, and acquiesced in by all of the parties to it, is void, and may be collaterally assailed by a stranger to the proceeding. We are unable to accept this as a correct interpretation of the statute. The adoption of a child under the section of the Civil Code above cited is not a judicial proceeding, (In re Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 23 Pac. Rep. 379,) although the sanction of a judicial officer is required for its consummation. The proceeding is essentially one of contract between the parties whose consent is required. It is a contract of a very solemn nature, and for this reason the law has wisely thrown around its creation certain safeguards, by requiring, not only that it shall be entered into in the presence of a judge, but also that it shall receive his sanction, which is not to be given until he has satisfied himself of these three things: First, that the person adopting is 10 years older than the child; second, that all the parties whose consent is required do consent, fully and freely, to the making of such contract; third, that the adoption contemplated by the contract will be for the best interest of the child adopted.

It is apparent that the only object of section 227 of the Civil Code in directing the judge to examine the parties who are required to appear before him is that he may satisfy himself in relation to the facts just mentioned, and the subject of the examination is to be confined to these three matters; and, in order that he may thus satisfy himself that a child over the age of 12 years, or a wife whose consent is necessary, does freely consent to the adoption, the judge is required to examine the parties separately. But the examination of a child whose consent to the contract is unnecessary, and who is of such tender years that it is incapable of exercising any judgment as to the effect of such contract upon its interests, would certainly be an idle thing to do, and the section should not receive such an extremely narrow and literal construction as to make the examination of such a child mandatory, and its omission fatal to the creation of a valid contract, binding upon adults who have done everything required of them in order to manifest their full and free consent to such adoption. The provision in relation to the separate examination of the parties to such contract, most certainly in so far as it is applicable to a child under the age of consent, is simply directory, and is to be complied with or not, in the discretion of the judge. "Unless a fair consideration of a statute directing the mode of proceeding of public officers shows that the legislature intended compliance with the provision in relation thereto to be essential to the validity of the proceeding, it is to be regarded as directory merely. Thus, directions which are not of the essence of the thing to be done, but which are given with a view merely to the proper, orderly, and prompt conduct of the business, and by the failure to obey which the rights of those interested will not be prejudiced, are not commonly to be regarded as mandatory; and, if the act is performed, but not in the time or in the precise mode intended, it will still be sufficient, if that which is done accomplishes the substantial purposes of the statute." Suth. St. Const. p. 575; Jones v. State, 1 Kan. 273; People v. Supervisors, 34 N. Y. 272. In this latter case the court said: "A strict and literal adherence to the letter and form of a statute in minor or nonessential particulars will often defeat a remedy or destroy a right which it was the principal intention of the legislature to create or provide. Where the statute directs an act to be done in a certain way, or at a certain time, and a strict compliance as to the time or form does not appear to the judicial mind to be essential, the proceedings are held valid, though the command of the statute has been disregarded." Keeping in view the foregoing rule for determining whether the provisions of a statute relating to the mode of proceeding by a public officer are mandatory or simply directory, and looking at the substantial object which the statute has in view in requiring the judge to examine the parties appearing before him for the purpose of entering into the contract of adoption, it is clear to us that the examination of a child under the age of consent should not be deemed indispensable to the validity of the adoption proceeding.

The cases of Long v. Hewitt, 44 Iowa, 363; Tyler v. Reynolds, 53 Iowa, 146, 4 N. W. Rep. 902; Shearer v. Weaver, 56 Iowa, 578,

9 N. W. Rep. 907; Furgeson v. Jones, 17 Or. 204, 20 Pac. Rep. 842; Ex parte Chambers, 80 Cal. 219, 22 Pac. Rep. 138; and Ex parte Clark, 87 Cal. 640, 25 Pac. Rep. 967,—cited by respondent, are neither of them in conflict with the views here expressed, as an examination of those cases will show. In Iowa the statute requires that the act of adoption shall be evidenced by an instrument in writing, signed by the parents or others named, and provides that "upon the execution, the acknowledgment, and filing for record of such instrument, the rights, duties, and relations between the parent and child by adoption shall thereafter * * * be the same as exist by law between the parent and child by lawful birth;" and it was held in each of the above-cited cases from the supreme court of that state that until the instrument was filed for record its execution was not complete; that the filing for record was in the nature of a delivery, and was necessary in order to give validity to the instrument. Thus in Tyler v. Reynolds, 53 Iowa, 146, 4 N. W. Rep. 902, the court said: "The statutory conditions and terms are that the written instrument must be executed, signed, acknowledged, and filed for record. When this is done, the act is complete. If the named requisites are not done, then the act is not complete, and the child cannot inherit from the parent by adoption." This is the ground upon which all the above-cited cases from the supreme court of Iowa were decided, and it will thus be seen that they are all based upon the sound legal principle that, until the parties whose consent is necessary to the formation of a contract have performed every act which the statute requires of them in order to manifest such consent, the contract is not complete. In Oregon adoption is a judicial proceeding, and under the statute of that state, in order to give the court jurisdiction to proceed, the natural parents must be served with notice, or must consent to the decree; and in Furgeson v. Jones, 17 Or. 204, 20 Pac. Rep. 842, the only matter decided was that a decree of adoption without notice to the natural parent, and without his consent, was void for want of jurisdiction in the court rendering the decree. The distinction between that case and this is most obvious. In this state, as we have seen, adoption is simply a matter of contract, and in the case before us all of the parties whose consent was necessary to the formation of such contract entered into the same freely and voluntarily, and with the sanction of the proper officer. In Ex parte Chambers, 80 Cal. 216, 22 Pac. Rep. 138, involving the right to the custody of a child, it appeared that the order for its adoption was made without the consent of the managers of the orphan asylum having the care of the child, and such consent was required by the statute under which the adoption proceeding was had. The court held the adoption invalid, because of the failure to comply with this essential requirement of the law, and it was with reference to this omission that the court used the general language relied upon by the respondent here, saying: "The power to adopt minor children is a creation of the statute unknown to the common law, and the mode must be held to be the measure of the power." The court simply meant by this language that the statute having made the consent of certain parties necessary, there could be no valid adoption without such consent. In Ex parte Clark, 87 Cal. 638, 25 Pac. Rep. 967, the natural mother was seeking to obtain the custody of her child from John D. Reulin and his wife, who claimed to be the adopted parents of the child, and the case was submitted to the court upon the record of the adoption proceedings alone, and the court, in its opinion, speaking of this record, said: "It will be observed that the parents consented to the adoption of their child by Jacob Reulin, that the agreement to adopt is signed by David Reulin, and that the order of the court gives the child to Jacob Reulin. There is nothing in the record of the proceeding to show that the names Jacob Reulin, David and John D. Reulin indicate one and the same person." And upon this record, which did not show that the parents of the child had ever consented to its adoption by John D. Reulin, or that John D. Reulin had ever agreed to adopt the child, or that the judge had ever made an order declaring the child adopted by him, the court held that the natural mother was entitled to the custody of the child, saying: "In our opinion, the order is void, and affords respondents no warrant for the detention of the child. It confers no rights upon them, and is manifestly too uncertain, when read in connection with the agreements and consents upon which it was based, to render any one liable as the parent by adoption,—especially one whose name does not appear in the record at all." And this was all that was decided in that case, and was the only question before the court. It is true that it was also said in the opinion in that case by way of argument: "The child by adoption cannot inherit from the adopting parent unless the act of adoption has been done in strict accordance with the statute. No matter how persuasive may be the equities of the child's case, or how clear the intention of all parties, it must appear that the statutory conditions have been strictly performed, otherwise the relation never existed, and the right to inherit never was acquired. * * * It cannot be said that one condition is more important than another." But it is evident that the court, in saying that one condition or provision of the statute concerning adoption was no more important than another, was speaking of essential conditions, such as, under a proper construction of the statute, are mandatory, as the case then under consideration was one where there had been a failure to observe essential requirements of the law, the order of adoption not being based upon an agreement signed by the person named in such order as the adopting parent; nor did the record there show any consent upon the part of the natural parents of the child to its adoption by the respondents in that case.

In Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, Chief Justice Marshall repeated the rule which it is always necessary to keep in mind when construing the opinion of a court. He said: "It is a maxim never to be disregarded that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented for decision." And Lord Manners, in Revell v. Hussey, 2 Ball & B. 286, said upon this same point: "It is always unsatisfactory to abstract altogether the reasoning of the court in any reported case from the facts to which this reasoning is meant to apply. It has a tendency only to misrepresent one judge and to mislead another." The opinion in Ex parte Clark, supra, when construed and limited as it must be by the facts of that case, is not in conflict with the conclusions here announced, that the statute in relation to adoption must receive a reasonable construction, and that a substantial compliance with its essential provisions is all that is required in order to effect a valid adoption. The essential foundation of the proceeding is the consent of the persons named in the statute; and when this has been given in the presence of the proper judge, and manifested in writing, and by the order of such judge, the contract cannot be declared invalid because of some merely technical objection to the manner in which the judge who signed the order of adoption may have discharged his duty in the premises.

2. The finding of the court that the agreement of the deceased to adopt the petitioner, and the consent of her father thereto, were not signed or acknowledged before the county judge of San Joaquin county, is not sustained by the evidence. The only basis for this finding seems to be that there was no evidence that the papers were actually signed in the presence of the judge, and that the recitals in the order show that they were signed and filed with the clerk of the court before the parties appeared before the judge. But the evidence does show that the papers were actually signed by the parties, and the court so finds, and they were presented to the judge at the time he made his order thereon. This was sufficient. It can make no difference whether the papers already properly signed were presented to the judge by the parties, or whether such papers were signed by them at the time. The substantial thing required by the statute is that the parties whose consent is required do consent in the presence of the judge, and that such consent is manifested by writings then delivered by them for that purpose.

Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; McFARLAND, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment and generally in the opinion of Justice DE HAVEN, but I am not willing to say that the provisions of the statute requiring the judge before whom an adoption proceeding is had to examine the child, even when of tender years, is in no sense mandatory. The provision is designed to safeguard the interests of the child, and it may be that she or one proceeding in her behalf could attack the validity of the order upon the ground that the statute had not been strictly pursued. As to children under 12 years of age the proceeding is strictly in invitum, and to change or abridge their natural rights the prescribed procedure must be strictly followed. But it does not lie in the mouth of a stranger, or one claiming through an adult, and a consenting party to the adoption proceeding, to say that because the interests of the passive and helpless subject of it were not so carefully looked after as they should have been she must therefore be deprived of the advantages of the order of adoption to which she has always conformed, and the protection of which she invokes.

HARRISON, J., (dissenting.) William B. Johnson died intestate in San Joaquin county, January 16, 1891, and on the 13th of February, 1891, letters of administration upon his estate were granted by the superior court of that county to Eugene W. Kay. April 10, 1891, Mary Eliza Johnson Howell, wife of M. D. Howell, filed a petition in said court, alleging that she was the child and sole heir of the decedent, and therefore entitled to letters of administration upon his estate, and praying that the letters theretofore granted to Kay be revoked, and that she be appointed administratrix of said estate. To this petition answers were made by Kay, both as administrator and as one of the next of kin of the deceased, and also by Mollie Settle, a grandniece of the decedent, contesting the application of Mrs. Howell, and denying that she was the child of the deceased, or entitled to any portion of his estate. At the hearing before the superior court the evidence presented was limited to that involving the determination of the issue whether Mrs. Howell was the child of the decedent. The evidence offered by her in support of this averment consisted of certain proceedings taken before the county judge of San Joaquin county, July 8, 1874, for the purpose of her adoption by the decedent, under the provisions of the Civil Code. The court held that these proceedings were not in conformity with the provisions of the Code, and that the petitioner had not been adopted as a child of the decedent, and therefore was not his heir, and dismissed her petition. From the order denying her application, and the judgment entered thereon, she has appealed to this court.

The question presented for consideration upon the appeal is whether the proceedings for adoption taken before the county judge sufficiently complied with the requirements of the Civil Code to constitute the petitioner the child of the decedent. The point chiefly urged in support of the judgment of the superior court is that it appears upon the face of the order made by the county judge that he did not make any examination of the child whose adoption was sought, as required by the Code before he could make an order sanctioning the adoption, while on the part of the appellant it is contended that under the circumstances of this case no examination of the child was required.

The evidence offered in support of the claim of adoption consisted of: (1) A petition by Johnson to the county judge setting forth that the child was about five years of age; that the petitioner was desirous of adopting the child, and had made a written agreement to that effect; that the mother of the child was dead; that its father had given his consent in writing to its adoption by the petitioner, and praying the judge to make an order declaring that the child be adopted and treated by him as his lawful child. To this petition was annexed a request of the father of the child that the county judge would make an order of adoption. (2) An agreement executed by the petitioner to the father that he would adopt and treat the child in all respects as his own lawful child should be treated. (3) An order signed by the county judge reciting the filing of the petition and the facts therein recited, and the filing of the consent and the agreement; and also that "the said David G. Strahan, the father of said minor, and the said minor, Mary Eliza Strahan, and the said petitioner, being present before the county judge of said county of San Joaquin, in open court, were then and there (save and except said child) duly sworn and examined separately in relation thereto;" and ordering "that said Mary Eliza Strahan, minor child of said David G. Strahan and Nancy Ann Strahan, be adopted, and that the said minor is hereby adopted, by said William B. Johnson, under and in pursuance of chapter 2, tit. 2, of the Civil Code of California, and the acts amendatory thereof, and that said Mary Eliza Strahan be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of said William B. Johnson, and that she take his family name." These documents were severally entitled "In the County Court of San Joaquin County," and were each indorsed by the clerk, "Filed July 8, 1874."

Adoption has the effect to change the status of an individual from that which was impressed upon him at his birth, and can never take place unless authorized by some positive law, and then only to the extent so authorized, and in the manner prescribed by the statute conferring such authority. The common law made no provision for adoption, but within the past 50 years statutes upon that subject, and providing for its exercise, have been enacted in a majority of the states of this country. The principles upon which these statutes are based are taken from the civil law. They are also to be found in the Twelve Tables, and were the subject of many social regulations in Roman history, and were finally embodied by Justinian in his Institutes. Liber 1, tit. 11, De Adoptionibus. Under this system an adoption was always attended with restrictions, and made a matter of public ceremony and sanction. Code Just. lib. 8, tit. 48. The provisions necessary to effect an adoption vary in different states, and hence, in considering opinions of other courts, it is necessary to read them in the light of the statutes under which they were given. In many of the states the proceedings partake of the nature of a judicial proceeding, either in the form of an action in court upon notice to the interested parties, wherein a judgment is rendered from which an appeal may be taken, or, if not in the form of an action, are conducted in the presence of the court, so far as to be made a matter of record therein under its sanction; while in others the act of adoption is invalid until it has been authenticated before some designated officer, and made a matter of public record. The provisions of the Civil Code of this state differ materially from those of any other state to which our attention has been called, and are characterized by much greater simplicity. The various steps requisite to an adoption under this Code are in the nature of a deed of adoption, which is required by the statute to be authenticated before the county judge. Upon such authentication and sanction the act of adoption is complete, and when thus executed and authenticated becomes the only evidence by which the adoption can be established. These provisions of the Civil Code are in no respect judicial in their requirements, and are entirely dissociated from any judicial supervision or sanction. The provision for their sanction by the county judge does not make it a judicial proceeding, or subject the acts done to the rules governing judicial acts. The county judge has been selected by the legislature as the officer to be charged with the function of solemnizing the ceremony of adoption, but his duties in the exercise of that function are no more of a judicial character than would be the same duties if performed before a notary public. In re Stevens, 83 Cal. 331, 23 Pac. Rep. 379. See, also, People v. Bush, 40 Cal. 346. Jurisdiction, in the sense in which that term is ordinarily employed, is not predicable of the function of the judge in making the order which he is authorized to make under section 227 of the Civil Code, but his action thereunder resembles more the execution of a power conferred upon him by the statute. The statute has conferred upon him an authority to make the order provided in that section whenever certain conditions have been complied with, but, as the power to make the order is conditional, it is always requisite to show that the condition under which the authority could be exercised existed, before the exercise of the power can be invoked in support of any right claimed thereunder. There is no provision in the Code authorizing or sanctioning the filing of the instruments with the clerk, or making a record of the act of adoption, or of the order of the county judge, either in the minutes of the court or in any of the public records of the county.

The law upon this subject as it existed in 1874 is contained in sections 226 and 227 of the Civil Code, which are as follows: "Sec. 226. The person adopting a child, and the child adopted, and the other persons whose consent is necessary must appear before the county judge of the county where the person adopting resides, and the necessary consent must thereupon be signed, and an agreement be executed by the person adopting to the effect that the child shall be adopted and treated in all respects as his own lawful child should be treated. Sec. 227. The judge must examine all persons appearing before him pursuant to the last section, each separately, and, if satisfied that the interests of the child will be promoted by the adoption, he must make an order declaring that the child shall henceforth be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of the person adopting." From these sections it is seen that the acts to be performed before the adoption is complete are: First. The person adopting the child, and the child adopted, together with its parent or parents, must all appear before the county judge, and he must make a separate examination of each of the persons appearing before him. Second. The parents of the child must execute a written consent to its adoption by the person proposing to adopt it, and he must execute an agreement to the effect that the child shall be adopted and treated in all respects as his own lawful child should be treated. Third. After such adoption and the execution of said instruments, the judge, "if satisfied that the interests of the child will be promoted by the adoption," must make an order sanctioning the adoption of the child. The Code is silent as to the character and extent of the examination to be made by the judge of either of the persons who are to appear before him, but, inasmuch as the evident object of this examination is that the judge may be satisfied that the interests of the child will be promoted by the adoption, it is apparent that the extent, as well as the character, of the examination must be determined by the judge according to the circumstances of each case. The provision of the section is, however, imperative and mandatory that the judge "must examine all persons (including the child) appearing before him." The fact that the consent of the child, if under 12 years of age, is not required, does not obviate the necessity of its examination. The examination is not for the purpose of obtaining any consent, as that, both of the parent, as well as the adopter, must have been previously given, and is required to be evidenced by writing, but is for the purpose of satisfying the judge whether the interests of the child will be promoted by the adoption. There would seem to be a greater necessity for an examination by the judge of a child under 12 years of age than of one above that age, for, as the child above 12 years of age must give its individual consent, the ascertainment whether such consent was voluntary would greatly dispense with any further examination, whereas, in the case of an infant under 12 years of age, a greater responsibility is placed upon the judge in determining whether the interests of the child will be subserved by the adoption. For this purpose the judge would naturally inquire into the character and circumstances of the person adopting, the motives influencing the parent to give its consent, the history and life of the child; and whenever the child was capable of giving expression to its feelings or wishes, these feelings and wishes would be not only proper, but essential, subjects of examination. The character of the child, its sex, its age, its feelings towards its parent, as well as towards the adopter, would all be elements for the purpose of giving to the judge information on which to base his determination.

The precise age at which an examination would be followed with results tending to the satisfaction of the judge cannot be fixed by general rules, but must be left to the individual case. Even in matters which affect the interests of other persons, and where the child is without any interest, he can be a witness if over 10 years of age, and also, though under that age, if he is capable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which he is examined, and of relating them truly. Code Civil Proc. § 1880. There is no precise age at which a child can be regarded as absolutely disqualified from testifying, and therefore it has been wisely left to the judge to determine, after an examination in each particular case, the extent to which he will prosecute his inquiries for the purpose of determining its competency. The rule which formerly obtained in England, that, as the child could not be examined except under oath, its evidence was excluded unless it understood the nature of an oath, not only does not obtain in this state, but would be inapplicable to the case under consideration, as the examination of neither of the parties is required to be under oath. While an infant of only a few months of age would not be competent to respond to any examination by the judge, it is equally clear that a child of 11 years of age would be presumed to have decided preferences which should be consulted for the purpose of satisfying the judge whether its interests would be promoted by the adoption proposed. A child of five years of age has ordinarily reached such maturity as to be able to have preferences as well as memory, and to give intelligent responses to the questions that might be put to it by the judge. It was doubtless for this reason that the legislature required that such examination should be made in all instances, and that the judge should determine in each case to what extent the examination should proceed, rather than limit the age at which it might be made. As in the case when a child is a witness upon matters between other parties, its competency can be determined only after a preliminary examination. Such examination must be had in every case under the statute in question for the purpose of determining in the first instance whether the child is competent to give answers to the inquiries, and, if so, then the examination should be continued as to the matters which may enlighten the judge in reaching his conclusion. But it is not necessary to find a reason for the form in which the law has been enacted, or to say that, because the reason which would exist in some cases does not exist in the individual case, therefore the requirements of the statute need not be observed. Laws are enacted for the purpose of prescribing a rule of action applicable to all the cases which fall within the class for which they are enacted. But to substitute the will of one man in each individual case for a general rule made for an entire class would be to subject society to a rule of men, and not of law. It would be difficult to give a satisfactory reason for requiring that a summons in a civil action should be personally served upon a newborn infant in its nurse's arms, as well as upon the person who has the custody of the infant, except that it is the requirement of the statute that in all cases there shall be a personal service upon the defendant. There would be no certainty or safety in judicial proceedings if it were left to the arbitrament of a judge to determine in each case whether the defendant was of such tender years that it would be useless to make a personal service upon it, and therefore the legislature has wisely determined that there shall be personal service upon the defendant in all cases, as it has also said that in all cases the judge shall make a separate examination of a child proposed for adoption.

As it appears upon the face of the order made by the county judge that he disregarded this requirement of the Code for an examination by him of the child, I am of the opinion that there was an essential defect in the proceedings taken for its adoption, and that the order of the judge sanctioning the adoption was made without a compliance with one of the essential provisions of the Code, and consequently conferred no rights either upon the person adopting or upon the child. In thus holding that it is necessary to show a compliance with all the requirements of the Code, I do not disregard the provisions of section 4 of the Civil Code, that "its provisions are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." This rule for a liberal construction is applicable only to the provisions of the Code, and is limited to the objects sought to be effected. The most extended application of this rule has never justified the disregard of plain requirements of a statute, or the omission of any act which is specifically declared essential to effecting the object of the provision. "Liberal construction does not mean enlargement or restriction of a plain provision of a written law. If a provision of the Code is plain and unambiguous, it is the duty of the court to enforce it as it is written. If it is ambiguous or doubtful, or susceptible of different constructions or interpretations, then such liberality of construction is to be indulged in as, within the fair interpretation of its language, will effect its apparent object, and promote justice." In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 419, 21 Pac. Rep. 976, and 22 Pac. Rep. 742, 1028. "The power to adopt minor children is a creation of the statute which was unknown to the common law, and the mode must be held to be the measure of the power." Ex parte Chambers, 80 Cal. 219, 22 Pac. Rep. 138. "The right of adoption is purely statutory. It was unknown to the common law, and, as the right when acquired under our statute operates as a permanent transfer of the natural rights of the parent, it is repugnant to the principles of the common law, and one who claims that such a change has occurred must show that every requirement of the statute has been strictly complied with. It cannot be said that one condition is more important than another." Ex parte Clark, 87 Cal. 641, 25 Pac. Rep. 967.

The construction of a statute is the interpretation of the meaning of the legislature; and when its meaning is clear, or the language of the statute is unambiguous, there is no opportunity for construction. It is only when the language of an act is susceptible of different meanings, or when the object sought or the means provided for effecting the object are imperfectly expressed, that rules of construction are invoked. The rule directing that a statute shall be liberally construed means that the terms therein used are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the evident purpose of the statute by a strict adherence to the letter, but that, if the acts required by the statute are performed, it will be a sufficient compliance with the legislative intent, though they may not be performed in the exact mode or order prescribed by the statute. In the present case, for example, the provision in section 226, that when the parties appear before the county judge "the necessary consent must thereupon be signed, and an agreement executed by the person adopting," does not require the literal construction that such consent and agreement are ineffective if signed prior to the appearance of the parties before the judge. The object of the statute is that the consent and agreement shall be executed and approved by the judge, and it is immaterial whether they are signed before the parties appear before him or are signed in his presence, if their execution is conceded and sanctioned by the judge. It is never permitted, however, under any rule of liberal construction, to dispense with an explicit requirement of the statute, upon the theory that it could not have been intended by the legislature, or that the court or judge shall exercise its discretion in determining whether such requirement is essential. It is not within any definition of liberal construction for a court to substitute its own judgment for that of the legislature.

It cannot be presumed that the judge did any other act or made any other examination than he has recited in his order; and in the face of his recital that he examined the parties who appeared before him "save and except the child," it cannot be presumed that he made any examination whatever of the child. As the order was made in the execution of a statutory authority, it was necessary to show by the order itself the existence of all the conditions under which the statute permitted him to exercise such authority; and, although he was a county judge, yet the execution of this authority was not in the exercise of any judicial power, and the rules of presumption that are invoked in support of judicial action have no application. I think that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the views expressed by Mr. Justice HARRISON.

RICO et al. v. BRANDENSTEIN et al. (No. 14,315.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—CONVEYANCE BY WIFE DIRECT TO HUSBAND—VALIDITY.

Const. 1849, art. 11, § 14, provided that all property of the wife, owned before and acquired after marriage, shall be her separate property, and laws should be passed, defining her rights in relation thereto. Act April 17, 1850, (St. 1850, p. 254,) gave the husband the control of the wife's separate property during coverture, but provided that no alienation thereof could be made, or lien thereon created, unless by instrument in writing, signed by both husband and wife, and acknowledged by her on privy examination. Section 7 provided that when any sale is made by the wife, of her property, for her husband's benefit, it shall be deemed a gift, and neither she, nor those claiming under her, shall have any right to recover the same. Act April 16, 1850, § 19, provided that "a married woman may convey any of her real estate by any conveyances thereof executed and acknowledged by herself and her husband," etc. Held, that the common-law disability of the husband to take a conveyance direct from the wife was not removed, and that a deed of trust of the wife's separate property, executed in 1857 by a married woman and her husband to the latter, was void.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; John K. Alexander, Judge.

Action by Tomas Rico and another against Meyer Brandenstein and another, for the partition of certain lands. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for appellants. Reinstein & Eisner, for respondents.

SEARLE, C. Appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The action was brought for a partition of the southeast two-thirds of the Rancho San Bernardino, situate in the county of Monterey. The two plaintiffs claim to be the owners of an undivided one-eighth each, as tenants in common, with defendants Brandenstein and Godchaux, who are averred to be each the owner of an undivided three-eighths in said rancho. The answer denies the ownership of plaintiffs, or that they were ever tenants in common with defendants, and avers ownership in defendants to the entire tract of land, except as to certain lots conveyed by them to third parties. The area of the land in question is 8,901 and 25-100 acres. Francisco Rico, the father of the plaintiffs, on the 10th day of January, 1855, became the owner of the premises in controversy, and on August 27, 1855, conveyed the same by deed to Tomasa Sepulveda Rico, his wife. The title asserted by plaintiffs in the action rests upon a deed of trust of the premises, dated November 9, 1857, executed by Francisco Rico and Tomasa Sepulveda Rico, his wife, as parties of the first part, to the said Francisco Rico, as party of the second part. The deed purports to be in consideration of $15,000, paid to the parties of the first part by Theodora Gonzales and Jose Sepulveda, the receipt of which is acknowledged, and which, the proofs show, was actually paid. The remaining portions of the deed, important to the inquiry, are as follows: "And by these presents doth bargain, sell, remise, release, and quitclaim and convey unto Francisco Rico, in trust for and the use, interest, behoof, benefit of Guadalupe Rico, Francisco Rico, Junior, Vicente Rico, and Alexander Rico, all being legitimate children of the parties of the first part hereof, * * * all now living, and all other offspring that may be born hereafter of the said parties of the first part hereof, all the right, title, and interest of the parties of the first part hereof in and to. * * * This conveyance is intended as a deed of trust, to be held by the said Francisco Rico under the express conditions hereinafter set forth, that is to say, to hold the same aforementioned premises to and for the uses, interests, and purposes of the said minors, Guadalupe, Francisco, Vicente, and Alexander Rico, now living, and also all other children that may be born hereafter of the said parties of the first part hereof, to receive the rents, issues, and profits of the said lands and improvements thereon, and apply the same to the use and benefit of the said aforementioned children now living, and all others that may be born hereafter of the said parties of the first part hereof, during their natural lives." Then follows a clause authorizing the said Francisco Rico to appoint his successor as trustee of said property for said children during his lifetime, and by will after his death. The trustee and beneficiaries are forbidden to sell, pledge, or hypothecate the land and premises described in the deed. The deed was duly acknowledged and recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of Monterey, November 9, 1857. Francisco Rico, the grantee of the deed of trust, was one and the same person with Francisco Rico, one of the grantors, and the grantors were husband and wife. The plaintiffs herein were their children, born subsequent to the execution of the deed of trust. Defendants Brandenstein and Godchaux hold the premises under a conveyance in trust executed by the same grantors, in 1862, to third parties, as trustees. It was admitted at the trial, for the purposes of the case, that, if plaintiffs are not the owners of two-eighths of the rancho, defendants are the owners thereof.

The first question presented by the record relates to the validity of the deed from Rico and wife to the husband. It must be assumed that at common law the wife could not convey her separate property to her husband. The contention of appellant is that, conceding the property to have been the separate property of the wife, still at the time of the deed there was, under the statute of this state, no restriction upon such a conveyance. Section 14, art. 11, of the constitution of this state, adopted October 10, 1849, provided that "all property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned and claimed by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise, or descent, shall be her separate property, and laws shall be passed more clearly defining the rights of the wife in relation as well as to her separate property, as to that held in common with her husband." By an act approved April 17, 1850, the legislature, in obedience to the requirements of the constitution, passed a law by which the husband was given "the management and control of the separate property of the wife during the continuance of the marriage, but no sale or other alienation of any part of such property can be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, unless by an instrument in writing, signed by the husband and wife, and acknowledged by her upon an examination separate and apart from her husband, before," etc. The seventh section of the same act provided "that when any sale shall be made by the wife of any of her separate property for the benefit of her husband, or when he shall have used the proceeds of such sale, with her consent, in writing, it shall be deemed a gift, and neither she, nor those claiming under her, shall have any right to recover the same." St. 1850, p. 254. An act concerning conveyances, passed April 16, 1850, provided as follows: "Sec. 19. A married woman may convey any of her real estate by any conveyances thereof, executed and acknowledged by herself and her husband, and certified in the manner hereinafter provided, by the proper officer taking the acknowledgment." A number of other statutes might be referred to, tending to indicate the evident policy of our lawmakers, to loosen the chains which bound married women at the common law, and, so far as their separate property is concerned, to confer upon them like power of alienation with that possessed by their husbands. Step by step the work has gone on, until now "a conveyance by a married woman has the same effect as if she were unmarried, and may be acknowledged in the same manner." Civil Code, § 1187. We are dealing, however, with a question which depends, not upon the present condition of the law, but upon the status and rights of married women as they existed in 1857, the date of the deed under consideration. No question is made here as to the due execution of the deed by the husband and wife, or that it was properly acknowledged as required by statute. The contention of respondents in this behalf is that the deed is void because at the date of its execution, to wit, November 9, 1857, a married woman could not convey real property directly to her husband. The husband was required to join in the conveyance. The objects of the statute in requiring the husband to join with his wife in the conveyance of her separate property, as it has been said, was to afford her his protection against imposition and fraud, and to aid her by his counsel and advice. Meagher v. Thompson, 49 Cal. 190. The requirement of the statute is analogous to the rule of the civil law, under which the wife must have the authorization of her husband, or a decree of a judge, before she could convey any of her rights, or enter into a civil contract. The wider experience of men in business affairs, their better opportunities for becoming conversant with property values, and the mode of its transfers, as well as the important object of promoting unity of purpose and harmony of action in the close relation existing between husband and wife, may well have conduced to the enactment of the law requiring them to join in a conveyance of property which, while belonging to the wife, was yet subject to the management and control of the husband. The law required them to join in the conveyance, and there is no disposition to question either its wisdom, or its binding force; and these remarks are only indulged as tending to a better understanding of the cognate question, can the husband and wife convey her separate real property to the former?

This court has repeatedly decided that a husband, when free from debt, may make a gift to his wife of either his separate property, or of the community property of the husband and wife. Barker v. Koneman, 13 Cal. 9; Peck v. Brummagim, 31 Cal. 441; Dow v. Mining Co., Id. 653; Woods v. Whitney, 42 Cal. 361; Higgins v. Higgins, 46 Cal. 263. It does not necessarily follow that the converse of the proposition is true, and that the wife can convey by way of gift to her husband. If, however, she cannot do so, or, rather, if she could not do so under the law we are considering, viz. the statute in force in 1857, it must be because of the inherent condition of the parties as husband and wife. The owner of property competent to convey may convert himself into a trustee by making a proper declaration of the trust, in writing. Suarez v. Pumpelly, 2 Sandf. Ch. 336; Pinkett v. Wright, 2 Hare, 120. A trust is valid only to the extent of the legal capacity of the one creating it. Tiff. & B. Trusts, p. 2. Any person may create a trust who is capable of making a valid distribution of property. The power to dispose of property involves the right to attach such limitations to the act of disposition as will vest the legal estate in one, and the beneficial interest in another.

At common law, neither husband nor wife could convey property directly to the other. The power to alienate and to take property on the part of the husband was unaffected by marriage, except in the single instance of conveyances to and from his wife. To the wife the common-law system was a source of constant repression. Her husband became the absolute owner of her personal property, and was entitled to the rents, issues, and profits of her real estate. To relax the severity of the rules of her environment, as a wife, many of the states have adopted laws similar to the one under consideration, empowering her to convey her real property by joining with her husband in the deed of conveyance; and in a few of the states—New York and California (since 1891) included—a conveyance by a married woman may be made in the same manner, and has the same effect, as if she were unmarried. Under these laws, however, the courts, in numerous instances, still adhere to the doctrine that the wife cannot convey her property directly to her husband.

The general result of the reasoning of the cases may be summarized as follows: (1) These statutes are for the benefit of married women, and not for that of their husbands; and any construction which would result in making it more easy for the husband to secure control of the estate of the wife would tend to defeat the very object of the law. (2) The inhibition of the common law, as applied to the husband, was that he could neither convey to his wife, directly, nor be a grantee from her; and, while the right of the wife to take by gift removes the impediment to a voluntary conveyance from the husband to her, yet the right to receive such voluntary conveyance from the wife has not been conferred upon the husband, and he stands, as at common law, incapacitated from taking by deed of gift directly from his wife. (3) The "power to convey and devise real and personal property as if she was unmarried" does not enlarge the powers of the grantees under conveyances by her, and she could not devise to a corporation or person incapable of taking by will, or convey to one incompetent to be a grantee. (4) To render a conveyance from the wife to her husband valid, the husband's common-law disability, as well as that of the wife, must be removed. White v. Wager, 25 N. Y. 328; Brooks v. Kearns, 86 Ill. 547; Scarborough v. Watkins, 9 B. Mon. 545; Cards, Leg. & Eq. Rights Mar. Wom. § 428; Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, tit. "Husband and Wife," p. 794; Bish. Mar. Wom. §§ 711, 712; Kinnaman v. Pyle, 44 Ind. 275; Winans v. Peebles, 32 N. Y. 423; Sims v. Rickets, 35 Ind. 181.

I find no case extant in which, under a statute requiring the husband and wife to join in the conveyance of her separate property, a sale and conveyance from the latter to the former has been sustained. The law having provided for the joinder of the husband in this class of conveyances, with a view, as has often been declared by this court, of giving the wife the benefit of the husband's counsel, advice, and judgment, it would seem strange and illogical to permit him at the same time to act as her opponent, as one working against her interests, and seeking to obtain her land for himself, either with or without limitations upon the effect of the conveyance. In Colorado, Iowa, and some other states, statutes have been passed, giving to married women the same rights of alienation of their separate property as those enjoyed by unmarried women. Where such laws prevail, we may reasonably expect to see their right to convey directly to their husbands, as well as to others, finally upheld, as has already been done in a number of cases. Wells v. Caywood, 3 Colo. 487; Simms v. Hervey, 19 Iowa, 287; Robertson v. Robertson, 25 Iowa, 350; Allen v. Hooper, 50 Me. 371; Burdens v. Amperse, 14 Mich. 97.

The views herein enunciated are expressly confined to an interpretation of the statute as it existed prior to the amendment of 1891, and are not intended as an exposition of the rights of married women under the broader aegis of that amendment. I am of opinion that, under the law as it existed in 1857, the husband and wife could not legally convey her separate real estate to the husband, and that the deed of trust to the latter, set out in the record, was void. This view renders a consideration of the other points made in the case unimportant. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY v. SUPERIOR COURT. (No. 15,227.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1893.)

MANDAMUS—WHEN LIES—CHANGING PLACE OF TRIAL.

On the overruling of a motion to change the place of trial of an action of ejectment the remedy of the moving party is by appeal, and not by mandamus to compel the change.

In bank.

Mandamus by the county of San Joaquin to compel the superior court of that county to change the place of trial of an action of ejectment. Proceedings dismissed.

P. W. Bennett, T. C. Van Ness, and L. A. Redman, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is an original proceeding by mandamus to compel the superior court of San Joaquin county to change the place of trial of an action of ejectment to which the judges of said court are parties defendant. A motion to change the place of trial was made, and promptly overruled. The proper remedy of the petitioner was an appeal from that order. In such cases mandamus is only proper when the court refuses or unreasonably delays to decide the motion, as in Krumdick v. Crump, (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 800; and Livermore v. Brundage, 64 Cal. 299, 30 Pac. Rep. 848. But when the motion is overruled without delay, an appeal from the order affords a complete remedy, and if the case is for any reason one of urgency the hearing of the appeal can be expedited so as to reach a decision as soon as it can be reached in an original proceeding. Proceeding dismissed.

PAINTER et al. v. PAINTER et al. (No. 15,310.)

APPEAL—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS — UNDERTAKING.

1. In an accounting between partners the decree was that plaintiffs should receive a certain sum from defendant personally. Defendant's interest in the partnership property was to be sold to realize the amount, and, if not sufficient, personal judgment was to be entered against defendant for the deficiency. Held that, until a judgment for the deficiency was entered, there was no judgment "directing the payment of money," within Code Civil Proc. § 942, and that hence defendant was entitled, pending an appeal, to have the proceedings stayed without the undertaking required by said section, and on the giving merely of the ordinary undertaking required by section 941.

2. In so far as the decree directed the sale of real property for satisfaction of the lien therein declared, no undertaking to pay the deficiency was required, under Code Civil Proc. § 945, as such lien was not created by mortgage.

In bank.

Original application by the executors of Jerome B. Painter against Thomas P. Painter and others for a stay of proceedings during the pendency of an appeal. Granted.

Pringle, Hayne & Boyd, for appellants.
Fox & Kellogg, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an original application for a writ staying proceedings in the court below upon a judgment during the pendency of an appeal therefrom to this court. The appellant has given the ordinary undertaking on appeal from the judgment, required by section 941, Code Civil Proc. The application must be granted. It would have been entirely proper, under the pleadings in the action, to have entered a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for the amount found to be due them upon the accounting, and upon such a judgment the plaintiffs would have been entitled to an execution against all property of the defendant, as upon an ordinary judgment for the recovery of money; but the judgment actually given seems to be of a different character. After reciting the amount due from the defendant Thomas P. Painter to the partnership of which he and Jerome B. Painter, now deceased, and represented in this action by plaintiffs as his executors, were members, the court, in the decree appealed from, proceeded to adjudge that plaintiffs "are entitled to and shall have and receive from said Theodore P. Painter, defendant, (in accordance with the terms and provisions of this judgment and decree,) personally, * * * the sum of $14,337.82." The decree then makes this sum a lien upon that defendant's interest in the partnership property, and further directs that such interest be sold "to realize and pay the said amount of $14,337.82 to said plaintiffs," and, if such interest be not sufficient for that purpose, "then, upon the ascertainment of the deficiency, that a judgment for such deficiency shall be docketed for such balance, and entered against said Thomas P. Painter personally, in favor of plaintiffs," and that said plaintiffs shall have the right to apply for and have such judgment against said defendant. A portion of the partnership property thus directed to be sold consists of real estate.

The effect of this decree is clearly to postpone the right of plaintiffs to a personal judgment against the defendant Theodore P. Painter for the recovery of the money found to be due from him to the plaintiffs, as representatives of the deceased partner, until such time as the interest of the defendant in the partnership property has been sold or appropriated, as in the decree provided, and then such personal judgment shall only be for the deficiency appearing after the application of such property or its proceeds to the satisfaction of said indebtedness. Until a judgment for such deficiency has been entered there will be no personal judgment against the defendant, directing the payment of the money, within the meaning of section 942, Code Civil Proc.¹ In so far as the decree directs the sale of real property for the satisfaction of the lien therein declared, no undertaking to pay the deficiency is required in order to stay its execution, because such lien was not created by mortgage, and it is only in such case that an undertaking to pay the deficiency is required by section 945, Code Civil Proc. This was so held in Englund v. Lewis, 25 Cal. 354, in construing section 352 of the old practice act, which contained similar provisions to those found in section 945, Code Civil Proc. It was there said: "Where the sale is directed for the purpose of satisfying any lien other than a mortgage lien the undertaking need not provide for the payment of any deficiency which the judgment may direct. To this extent the statute discriminates in favor of mortgage, and against all other liens." It follows from these views that the defendant is entitled to a writ staying the execution of the judgment appealed from until the determination of such appeal. Application for writ staying execution granted.

GAYLORD v. PLACE et ux. (No. 18,106.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1893.)
HOMESTEAD—MINERAL LANDS—EX PARTE ORDER —VALIDITY.

1. Mineral lands of the United States, which have been located and used chiefly as a placer mining claim, though also used by the owner as a residence for himself and family, and to some extent for pasturing stock and raising vegetables, may be selected, under the state laws, as a homestead; and the fact that such lands are reserved by acts of congress from entry and sale, except as mining claims, and that title to them cannot be acquired by pre-emption or homestead entry, is immaterial in a contest between a homestead claimant and his creditors, since, as between them, the title to the land claimed as a homestead is immaterial.

2. The fact that Code Civil Proc. § 690, subd. 5, exempts from execution the dwelling of a miner, not exceeding in value $500, and also his mining claim, actually worked by him, not exceeding $1,000, does not preclude the right to select the dwelling and claim as a homestead.

3. An order setting apart a homestead for an insolvent under Code Civil Proc. § 1465, though made ex parte, and without notice to the assignee and creditors, is valid.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by George C. Gaylord, as assignee of the estate of Henry M. Place, an insolvent debtor, against Henry M. Place and Mary Ann Place, to recover certain lands set apart as a homestead. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. Burrows, for appellants. P. F. Simonds, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. On September 24, 1891, the defendants were husband and wife, and were residing on a tract of land in Nevada county. On that day the husband, Henry M. Place, executed, in proper form, and caused to be recorded, a declaration of homestead on the said land, in which he stated that he estimated the actual cash value of the property to be $1,500. On October 10, 1891, Place filed, in the superior court of Nevada county, his petition in insolvency, properly verified, and stating the necessary facts, and having annexed thereto the schedule and inventory required in such cases; and thereupon an order was made by the court, adjudging the petitioner to be an insolvent debtor, and fixing November 16, 1891, as the time for the creditors of the debtor to meet and prove their debts, and choose an assignee of his estate. A copy of this order was duly published, and served by mail on all the creditors named in the schedule. On October 26, 1891, the insolvent presented to the court, and filed, his petition, asking that the premises described in his declaration of homestead be set apart for his use and benefit as a homestead; and thereupon the court, on the same day, and without any notice being given to creditors, made and entered an order as prayed for. On the day appointed for that purpose the creditors met, and elected the plaintiff assignee of the insolvent's estate, and within five days thereafter he duly qualified, and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such; and the clerk of the court then, by an instrument under his hand and seal of the court, assigned and conveyed to him all the estate, real and personal, of the debtor, not exempt by law from execution. On January 5, 1892, the plaintiff commenced this action, alleging, among other things, in substance, that the premises set apart as a homestead to the defendant Henry M. Place were, at the time his declaration of homestead was filed thereon, public mineral lands of the United States, which had been located by him as a placer mining claim, and had been used solely for mining purposes; that the said premises were of a value of not less than $3,000, and that no portion thereof was, or ever had been, exempt by law from execution, or from the operation of proceedings in insolvency, or subject to be selected or set apart as a homestead; that by virtue of the election and appointment of plaintiff as assignee, and the assignment and conveyance made to him as such assignee, he became, and then was, the sole and exclusive owner, and entitled to the possession, of all of said premises. And the prayer was that it be adjudged and decreed that the said premises were not impressed with a homestead character; that plaintiff, as assignee of the estate of the insolvent, was the sole and exclusive owner thereof; and that neither of the defendants had any interest in, or right of possession to, any portion thereof. The answer of defendants denied that the premises described in the complaint were valuable solely for placer mining purposes, or had been solely used by them as a mining claim; denied that no portion of the said premises was, or had ever been, exempt by law from execution or not subject to be selected or set aside as a homestead; denied that the plaintiff, as assignee, ever became or was the sole or exclusive owner, or entitled to the possession, of that part of said premises described in the declaration of homestead set forth; and also denied that the claim of defendants, or either of them, was without right. It then alleged that defendants were husband and wife, and that for many years prior to September 24, 1891, they actually resided upon and used the land described in the declaration of homestead, with the dwelling house thereon, as their permanent home; that up to the said date the said premises were largely used by the husband for the purpose of earning a living by the process of hydraulic mining, but that the said operations were so impeded by injunctions and other legal process as to prevent him from properly working the ground; and that at the time the declaration of homestead was recorded the premises were of little value for any purpose, but remained the permanent residence and home of the defendants. It then sets forth the declaration of homestead, and the filing thereof, the proceedings in insolvency, and the order of the court setting apart the homestead, as before stated, and alleges that the said order was duly given and made, and is still in full force and effect, and that the court had jurisdiction to make it; that the plaintiff, and those whom he represents, were parties defendant to the insolvency proceedings; and that plaintiff is estopped from questioning the validity of the order so setting apart the homestead, and that defendants plead the same as a bar to the suit.

The case was tried, and the court found, among other things, that the premises in controversy were public mineral land of the United States, held by the defendant Henry M. Place by virtue of locations thereof as placer mining claims, and that they were chiefly valuable as a mining claim, and had been used by defendants as their sole means of support, chiefly by carrying on the business of gold mining thereon; "that on the 24th day of September, 1891, and for many years prior thereto, the defendants, Henry M. Place and his wife, actually resided upon and occupied the dwelling house and premises described in the declaration of homestead, occupying and using the same as their home and residence, * * * but said occupation was for the purpose of carrying on mining on said premises and the land adjoining, the use of the homestead premises for grazing or agriculture being secondary, and merely incidental to the said occupation of mining; that said defendants had no other home or residence save the one described in their homestead declaration; that, on and up to the time when the declaration of homestead was filed, all the premises described therein were used by the defendants for the additional purpose of grazing their horses and cattle, and a small portion thereof for a vegetable garden;" that the order setting apart the premises as a homestead "was still in full force and effect at the date of the commencement of, and at the date of the trial of, this action, and that in making said order this court had jurisdiction so to do, and that the plaintiff and those whom he now represents were parties defendant to said insolvency proceedings, but that said order was made ex parte, and without notice of any kind, and inadvertently and improvidently made by said court, and that said plaintiff is not estopped by the said order from questioning its validity;" that the premises embraced in the said declaration of homestead are of a value of not less than three thousand dollars, and that no portion thereof is, or ever at any time has been, exempt from execution, or subject to be selected or set apart as a homestead, and that the plaintiff, by virtue of his election, appointment, and qualification as assignee, and the conveyance made to him by the clerk of the court, "became and is the sole owner of all the premises" described in his complaint; that the defendants each claim some interest in the premises and property described, and refuse to deliver possession thereof to the plaintiff, but that their "said claim and refusal are wholly without right, and a cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto, and right of possession thereof, as such assignee." Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiff, as assignee, was the true and lawful owner of all the premises and property described in his complaint, and that all adverse claims of the defendants thereto were invalid and groundless, and that they, and each of them, be perpetually estopped from setting up any claim to the said premises. From this judgment the defendants have appealed on the judgment roll.

The conclusion reached by the court below was evidently based upon the theory that mineral land of the United States, which had been located and chiefly used as a placer mining claim, could not be selected as a homestead, though it was also used by the owner as a place of residence for himself and family, and to some extent for pasturing stock and raising vegetables, and, therefore, that the proceedings taken by the defendant to select the premises in controversy were wholly ineffectual to impress upon them the character of homestead. If this theory is correct the judgment should be affirmed, and, if not, it should be reversed.

The statute provides that the homestead consists of the dwelling house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated, selected as in the Civil Code provided, and that from and after the time the declaration is filed for record the premises therein described constitute a homestead. Civil Code, §§ 1237, 1265. The homestead right does not depend upon the character of the title held by the party claiming it. It is impressed on the land to the extent of the interest of the claimant in it, not on the title merely. "The actual homestead, as against everybody who has not a better title, becomes impressed with the legal homestead right by taking the proceedings prescribed by the statute." Spencer v. Geissman, 37 Cal. 99. "In the solution of all questions arising between homestead claimants and those claiming under or against them, as creditors, the absence of title is a false quantity, which must be excluded from consideration." Brooks v. Hyde, 37 Cal. 373. A homestead in the country may include a farm, whether it contains a hundred or a thousand acres, and whether it is used for the ordinary purposes of farming, or for grazing and raising stock. The only tests are use and value. Its value must not exceed $5,000, and its use must be primarily as a home for the family. "Whatever is used—being either necessary or convenient—as a place of residence for the family, as contradistinguished from a place of business, constitutes the homestead, subject to the statutory limit as to value. If, however, it is also used as a place of business by the family, which frequently happens, it may not therefore cease to be a homestead, if it would be necessary or convenient for family use independent of the business." Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 220; Ornbaum v. His Creditors, 61 Cal. 455.

It is claimed, however, for respondent, that mineral lands of the United States are expressly reserved by statute from entry and sale, except as mining claims, and therefore, as the title to such lands cannot be acquired by pre-emption or homestead entry, they should be held not subject to selection under our homestead laws. But, if title to the land selected, as between the homestead claimant and his creditors, is a false quantity, which must be excluded from consideration, how can it be material in what way, or under what statute, title in fee to the premises might be acquired? It is enough that the claimant has actual and rightful possession of the premises at the time of his selection, and the courts will go no further in investigating his title.

It is also claimed that a homestead is intended to make a permanent home for the claimants, and that a placer mining claim is taken up for the purpose of washing it away, and thus, within some limited time, destroying the home, if located upon it, and that this must necessarily preclude the right to select the claim as a homestead. But it is not necessary that a homestead should be and remain a permanent home. It may be sold or abandoned by the claimants at any time. It only remains their home so long as they choose to make it so. We fail to see, therefore, how the right to select a particular parcel of land for a homestead can in any way be affected by the fact that the claimants intend to, and do, make a living by washing out gold from the ground, rather than by raising grain, hay, or fruit thereon.

It is further claimed that the statute exempts from execution "the cabin or dwelling of a miner, not exceeding in value the sum of five hundred dollars, * * * and also his mining claim, actually worked by him, not exceeding in value the sum of one thousand dollars," (Code Civil Proc. § 690, subd. 5,) and that this exemption is inconsistent with, and must preclude, the right to select the cabin or dwelling and claim as a homestead, and thus have them exempt under another statute. We see no inconsistency in the two supposed rights, and nothing in the statutes or policy of the law precluding the miner from claiming exemption under either of the statutory provisions referred to. The homestead is for the benefit and protection of the family, and the law providing for its selection should be liberally construed, so as to effectuate the beneficent ends contemplated by it. Heathman v. Holmes, 94 Cal. 291, 29 Pac. Rep. 404. The exemption of the claim under section 690 of the Code, supra, does not depend upon residence thereon, but its selection as a homestead does. The dwelling may be of a value greater than $500, and the claim of a value greater than $1,000, and when they are properly selected and filed upon as a homestead we think they should be protected as such.

The court found that the order setting apart the homestead in the insolvency proceedings "was made ex parte, and without notice of any kind, and inadvertently and improvidently." Section 60 of the insolvent act provides that "it shall be the duty of the court having jurisdiction of the proceedings to exempt and set apart for the use and benefit of said insolvent such real and personal property as is by law exempt from execution, and also a homestead, in the manner as provided in section one thousand four hundred and sixty-five of the Code of Civil Procedure." In Kearney v. Kearney, 72 Cal. 591, 15 Pac. Rep. 769, it was held that under section 1465, Code Civil Proc., an order or decree setting apart a homestead was valid, although no notice of the application was given to the heirs. The order setting apart the homestead involved in this case was therefore not invalid because made ex parte, and without notice. Nor is there anything tending to show that the order was made inadvertently or improvidently, except the facts on which the court based its conclusion that the property set apart did not and could not constitute a homestead. But, as we have seen, that conclusion was not justified by the facts and law of the case, and cannot, therefore, be sustained.

Under the findings—and they cover all the issues in the case—we think the defendants were entitled to judgment. We advise, therefore, that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in favor of the defendants.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court to enter judgment in favor of the defendants.

STEWART v. POWERS et al. (No. 14,956.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)
"CONVEYANCE"—WHAT CONSTITUTES—MORTGAGE—VALIDITY.

1. Civil Code, § 1215, provides that "the term 'conveyance,' as used in sections 1213 and 1214, embraces every instrument by which any estate or interest in real property is created, aliened, mortgaged, or incumbered, or by which the title to any real property may be affected, except wills." Section 2920 defines a mortgage as "a contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act without the necessity of a change of possession." Held that, since section 1215 defines the term "conveyance," as used in the recording act only, a mortgage, according to the definition given in section 2920, was not a conveyance.

2. Rev. St. U. S. § 2262, provides that, before a person claiming the benefit of the pre-emption laws can enter upon the lands, he must swear that he has entered and improved the land in good faith, for his own exclusive use, and has made no contract by which the title may inure to the benefit of any one but himself; that, if he swears falsely, he shall forfeit the money paid, and all right and title to the land, and any "grant or conveyance" made by him, except in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, shall be void. Held, that a mortgage executed by a pre-emption claimant before final proof and payment to secure the repayment of money borrowed to perfect the title was not a "grant or conveyance," within the statute, and was therefore valid.

3. Rev. St. U. S. § 2263, which provides that "all assignments and transfers of the right hereby secured prior to the issuing of the patent shall be null and void," refers to transfers and assignments of the right of pre-emption, and therefore the mortgage is not void under this section.

Latimer & Brown and Eli R. Chase, for appellants. W. S. Tinning, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Prior to November 12, 1887, Harriet H. Harding (afterwards the wife of Nathan Powers) and her sister Sarah Harding (afterwards the wife of Aurelius Sharp) each filed pre-emption claims upon certain lands of the United States situate in Contra Costa county, and had applied to the local United States land office to prove up and enter their respective parcels under the pre-emption laws of the United States, and November 15, 1887, was fixed for that purpose. Contests against their several claims had been initiated, whereby it became necessary to employ counsel; and in order to meet this expense, and to provide money to pay for their land, the two sisters, then unmarried, borrowed from respondent \$400, and executed to him their joint and several note therefor, and a mortgage upon all said lands, to secure the same, and also to secure such further sums as they might require, not exceeding \$1,500, in addition to the sum then borrowed. Final proofs were made on November 15, 1887, but, owing to the contests, payment was not made until November 9, 1888, at which date receivers' receipts were given for the portion of their claims to which they were found to be entitled. On January 16, 1891, respondent commenced an action to foreclose said mortgage for the amount of said promissory note and other advances. A decree of foreclosure was granted, from which Harriet H. and Nathan Powers appeal upon the judgment roll. The land involved in this appeal is the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 26, township 2 N., range 3 W., M. D. M.

The question, as presented by appellants, is: "Can a court decree that a title derived from the government of the United States under its pre-emption laws be sold to satisfy a mortgage given by a pre-emptor on the land pre-empted prior to making his final proofs and entry?" Appellants contend that, under the provisions of sections 2262 and 2263 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the mortgage in question is void. Section 2262 is as follows: "Before any person claiming the benefit of this chapter is allowed to enter lands, he shall make oath before the receiver or register of the land district in which the land is situated * * * that he has not settled upon and improved such land to sell the same on speculation, but in good faith to appropriate it to his own exclusive use, and that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person whatever, by which the title which he might acquire from the government of the United States should inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person except himself; and, if any person taking such oath swears falsely in the premises, he shall forfeit the money which he may have paid for such land, and all right and title to the same, and any grant or conveyance which he may have made, except in the hands of bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, shall be null and void, except as provided in section 2288." Section 2263 provides that proof of settlement, etc., shall be made before final entry; and the last clause of the section is as follows: "And all assignments and transfers of the right hereby secured, prior to the issuing of the patent, shall be null and void." These statutes were considered by the supreme court of the United States in Myers v. Croft, 13 Wall. 291. The court said: "It had been the well-defined policy of congress, in passing these laws, not to allow their benefit to inure to the profit of land speculators, but this wise policy was often defeated. Experience had proved that designing persons, being unable to purchase valuable lands, on account of their withdrawal from sale, would procure middlemen to occupy them temporarily, under an agreement to convey them so soon as they were entered by virtue of their pre-emption rights. * * * This was felt to be a serious evil, and congress, in the law under consideration, undertook to remedy it by requiring the applicant for a pre-emption, before he was allowed to enter the land on which he had settled, to swear that he had not contracted it away, nor settled upon it upon speculation, but in good faith to appropriate it to his own use." And, after quoting the last clause of section 2263, the court further said: "Looking at the language employed, as well as the policy of congress on the subject, it would seem that the interdiction was intended to apply to the right secured by the act, and did not go further. This was the right to pre-empt a quarter section of land. * * * This right was valuable, and, independently of the legislation of congress, was assignable. The object of congress was attained when the pre-emptor went with clean hands to the land office, and proved up his right, and paid the government for his land." The direct question before the court in that case was the right to convey after the entry, but before the patent had issued, (which right was affirmed;) but the purpose of the restrictions in the act, and the policy of congress in its enactment, have an important bearing on the question here, and conclusively settle that the assignments and transfers declared null and void by section 2263, Rev. St. U. S., are transfers and assignments of the right of pre-emption. It remains to be considered whether the mortgage in question is embraced in the expression "grant or conveyance," used in section 2262.

The granting part of the mortgage is in the usual form, and, following the tenendum clause, contains this covenant: "And the parties of the first part hereby covenant that they are lawfully seised in fee of the above-described premises; that they are free from all incumbrances; that they have good right to sell, grant, and mortgage the same; and that they will forever warrant and defend the same to the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, against the lawful claims and demands of all persons." That under this covenant any after-acquired title would inure to the benefit of the mortgagee is beyond question, (Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 629; Civil Code, § 2930,) unless the mortgage itself is void. It is contended, however, that a mortgage is a conveyance, and is so declared by section 1215 of the Civil Code. That section is as follows: "The term 'conveyance,' as used in sections 1213 and 1214, embraces every instrument by which any estate or interest in real property is created, aliened, mortgaged, or incumbered, or by which the title to any real property may be affected, except wills." This section defines the term "conveyance" only "as used" in the recording act, and does not imply that a mortgage is in fact a conveyance of real property, but rather the contrary; for if it were a conveyance, and so regarded and understood, it need not have been included in the definition. Section 2920, Civil Code, defines it as follows: "Mortgage is a contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act, without the necessity of a change of possession." The Code commissioners, in a note to this section, say: "The definition of the text is new. It is designed to make a clear distinction between a pledge and a mortgage, and at the same time to avoid the idea of a mortgage being in any sense a transfer." It is so well understood in this state that a mortgage does not transfer the title that a citation of authorities is unnecessary. A mortgage is therefore not necessarily embraced in the term "grant or conveyance," as used in the act of congress, even though, as appellants suggest, there was at the date of that act but one state in which it was held that a mortgage did not pass the title. But for the restriction imposed by the act of congress, the right of the pre-emptor before proof and payment was transferable. The restriction, therefore, cannot be extended beyond the express terms of the act, interpreted in the light of the mischief to be remedied, and this transaction was not of the character requiring prohibitory legislation. On the contrary, it was in aid of the beneficent purpose of the pre-emption act. Without the aid of respondent, the mortgagors were unable to perfect their entries. Making the mortgage was not inconsistent with a purpose in good faith to appropriate the land to their exclusive use, but was in aid of the purpose; nor was it a contract or agreement by which the title they might acquire from the government "should inure," in whole or in part, to the benefit of respondent. There is nothing in the record tending to show that it was the intention of the mortgagors not to pay the mortgage debt, or that the mortgage should be used as a vehicle to transfer the title they might acquire to respondent. For appellants now to make such admission would be to admit that the oath taken before the register, after the execution of the mortgage, was false.

That the point under consideration has been decided in accordance with appellants' contention in other states is true. McCue v. Smith, 9 Minn. 259, (Gil. 237,) and Woodbury v. Dorman, 15 Minn. 338, (Gil. 272,) cited by appellants, were expressly overruled in Jones v. Tainter, 15 Minn. 512, (Gil. 423.) In line with the earlier Minnesota cases are Bass v. Buker, 6 Mont. 442, 12 Pac. Rep. 922, and Brewster v. Madden, 15 Kan. 249. While the precise question here presented, under well-defined facts, bringing it clearly within the facts of the case at bar, seems not to have been discussed in the cases in this state, we think they nevertheless conclusively settle the law against the contention of appellants. In Tartar v. Hall, 3 Cal. 263, the mortgage was upon "a pre-emption claim," but executed before the pre-emption laws had been extended to this state. Its validity was attacked. Held, the mortgagor was estopped from asserting its invalidity. Whitney v. Buckman, 13 Cal. 536, was a mortgage upon a pre-emption claim. The court said: "The mortgage does not pretend to transfer to the mortgagee the right to a pre-emption. This is not assignable, but the possession of public lands, whether taken for the purpose of getting a pre-emption right, or any other purpose, may be mortgaged, or the land itself; and, if the mortgagee gets no title through the mortgage, this is not an objection to be raised by the man who makes it." This doctrine of estoppel was also applied in Kirkaldie v. Larrabee, 31 Cal. 456, where the mortgage was upon a homestead claim before title acquired. In Christy v. Dana, 42 Cal. 174, the mortgage was upon land upon which the mortgagor resided, and which "he proposed to claim as a pre-emption." He afterwards pre-empted the land, obtained title, and sold to a third party. Held, that the title inured to the benefit of the mortgagee. Bull v. Shaw, 48 Cal. 455, differs from Christy v. Dana, in this: that, after the mortgage was executed, the mortgagor sold part of the land mortgaged to a third party, who afterwards secured the government title. As to this part it was held, the title not having been acquired by the mortgagor, it did not inure to the benefit of the mortgagee, as he did not derain title from the United States through Shaw, the mortgagor; but that if Shaw had acquired the title, and had then conveyed to Delaney, the latter would have been estopped from asserting title against the mortgage. In Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 25, it does not appear under what statute Grider acquired the title from the United States, but a mortgage executed while he was in possession, and before he obtained title, was enforced, and was held to inure to the benefit of the mortgagees. The latest, and a case not distinguishable in principle from the one at bar, is Orr v. Stewart, 67 Cal. 275, 7 Pac. Rep. 693. There the mortgage was upon land taken up by Stewart under the homestead act of 1862. After the foreclosure of the mortgage, and the sale thereunder to Orr, and the purchaser had gone into possession under the sheriff's deed, Stewart went to the United States land office, and was permitted to commute his homestead entry into a cash entry, paid for the land, and received a certificate of purchase. The action was commenced by Orr to quiet title against Stewart. Judgment for defendant was reversed. It was held that the after-acquired title inured to the benefit of Orr, the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. The only apparent distinction between that case and this is that in Orr v. Stewart the land, at the time the mortgage was made, was held under the homestead laws, though afterwards commuted and entered under the pre-emption laws. The opinion proceeded upon two grounds: (1) That the mortgagor was estopped from defeating, by his own act, the enforcement of the lien he attempted to create; and (2) that the mortgage was not made void or voidable under the provisions of the homestead act. In no case which we have been able to find in the reports of this state has a mortgage been held invalid against the mortgagor because of the fact that the title was in the United States at the date of the mortgage, whether the land was occupied by the mortgagor under the homestead or under the pre-emption laws. In none of these cases has either section 2262 or 2263 of the Revised Statutes of the United States been mentioned by the court, though it is hardly possible that they have been overlooked; and that fact would seem to show that a mortgage, under our system at least, was not regarded as a "conveyance," within the meaning of those sections. We conclude, therefore, that a mortgage executed by a pre-emption claimant before final proof and payment, at least if given to secure the repayment of money loaned to pay for the land, or in any manner to aid the mortgagor in perfecting his title, is not in contravention of the pre-emption laws, and that, if it purports to be a mortgage of the fee, it carries the after-acquired title, unless it is intended as a mode of transferring the title in evasion of the statute; and, further, that, under the uniform current of authorities in this state, the mortgagor is estopped from defeating by his own act the operation and enforcement of the lien appellants have attempted to create. These views render it unnecessary to distinguish between that part of the mortgage debt created before entry and any portion of it which may have been created afterwards. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

STEWART v. POWERS et al. (No. 15,217.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)

CONVEYANCE SUBJECT TO MORTGAGE.

A pre-emption claimant, before final proof and payment, mortgaged the claim to secure the repayment of money borrowed to perfect her title. After she had entered upon and paid for the land, and had received her certificate of purchase, she conveyed a part of the claim to one H. Held that, as the title acquired by the pre-emptor from the United States inured to the benefit of the mortgagee when acquired, the conveyance to H. was subject to the mortgage.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Action by James Stewart against Harriet H. Powers and others to foreclose a mortgage. Decree for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Latimer & Brown and Eli R. Chase, for appellants. W. S. Tinning, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. In Stewart v. Powers, (No. 14,956, this day filed,) 33 Pac. Rep. 486, the appeal was from the same judgment, and upon the same judgment roll, from which the above-named appellants have taken this appeal.

As to appellants Sarah E. Sharp and Aurelius Sharp, the facts and the questions of law presented are precisely the same as in No. 14,956, and, upon the authority of that case, the judgment should be affirmed as against them.

As to appellant John Harding, a fact not appearing in No. 14,956 is necessary to be stated, viz. that on December 31, 1888, Sarah E. Sharp, the above-named appellant, after she had entered and paid for the land, and had received her certificate of purchase therefor, conveyed to said John Harding a part of the premises so mortgaged, to wit, the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 26, township 2 N., range 3 W., M. D. B. & M. All other facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion in No. 14,956. It must be apparent that if the title acquired from the United States after the mortgage was executed inured to the benefit of the mortgagee, as was there decided, it must follow that it inured at the moment the title was acquired by the pre-emptioner, and that the conveyance afterwards received by appellant Harding vested the title in him subject to the mortgage. See Christy v. Dana, 42 Cal. 174; Bull v. Shaw, 48 Cal. 455, and Orr v. Stewart, 67 Cal. 275, 7 Pac. Rep. 693, cited in the former opinion. It follows that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed as against all the appellants.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed as against all the appellants.

In re STOW et al., Park Commissioners.
(No. 15,063.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1893.)

GOLDEN GATE PARK COMMISSIONERS—NEGLECT OF DUTY—SUFFICIENCY OF ACCUSATION.

Pen. Code, § 772, provides that where an accusation verified by the oath of any person is presented to a superior court, alleging that any officer within the jurisdiction of the court has refused or neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his office, the court must cite the accused to appear, and on his appearance must hear the accusation, and, if the charge is sustained, must enter a decree removing the accused from office, and must render judgment for $500 in favor of the informer, with costs. Pol. Code, § 3245, provides that "eight hours' labor constitutes a legal day's work in all cases where the same is performed under the authority of any law of this state, or under the direction, control, or by the authority of any officer of this state, acting in his official capacity, or under the direction, control, or by the authority of any municipal corporation within this state, or of any officer thereof, acting as such; and a stipulation to that effect must be made a part of all contracts to which the state or any municipal corporation therein is a party." Held, that an accusation under Pen. Code, § 772, that the commissioners of Golden Gate Park, "while acting in their official capacity," entered into a contract for labor, from which the stipulation directed by Pol. Code, § 3245, was willfully omitted, and that such commissioners compelled their laborers to work nine hours a day, is insufficient, where it fails to show the location of Golden Gate Park; that the commissioners, when they made the contract, or compelled the laborers to work nine hours a day, were officers of the state, or of any county or municipality within the state, or that the commissioners were acting as such, or held any office, when the accusation was filed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Accusation under Pen. Code, § 772, by William M. Willey, against W. W. Stow, R. P. Hammond, and Joseph Austin, as commissioners of Golden Gate Park. The accusation was dismissed, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Willey, per se. Harold Wheeler, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. On January 6, 1892, William M. Willey filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco an accusation in writing, verified by his own oath, alleging that the respondents, Stow, Hammond and Austin, "while acting in the official capacity of commissioners of the Golden Gate Park," entered into and signed an agreement with one Charles Warren, on or about August 12, 1891, whereby said Warren contracted to perform certain work upon and within said public park; that the said contract was not drawn in the form prescribed by law, in that the stipulation, directed by section 3245 of the Political Code, that eight hours should constitute a legal day's work, was omitted therefrom; and that this omission was made willfully and knowingly by respondents, because prior to the execution of the said contract they had been petitioned, for and on behalf of the citizens for whose protection the said statute was enacted, to have the said stipulation inserted in all contracts let by them. The accusation also alleged that the respondents, "while commissioners of said Golden Gate Park," have compelled the laborers employed by them to work nine hours daily, and it concludes with a prayer that the respondents be cited to appear in court, and show cause why they should not be removed from office, and that judgment be given against them, in the sum of $500 each, in favor of the deponent, as informer, and for costs, "as provided by section 772, Pen. Code Cal., under which section this information is herewith filed." The respondents severally appeared and demurred to the accusation upon nearly all the statutory grounds. After argument the demurrers were sustained, and, the complainant declining to amend, judgment was entered that the proceeding be dismissed without costs. From this judgment the complainant appeals.

Section 772 of the Penal Code is as follows: "When an accusation, in writing, verified by the oath of any person, is presented to a superior court, alleging that any officer within the jurisdiction of the court has been guilty of charging and collecting illegal fees for services rendered or to be rendered in his office, or has refused or neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his office, the court must cite the party charged to appear before the court at a time not more than ten nor less than five days from the time the accusation was presented; and on that day, or some other subsequent day not more than twenty days from that on which the accusation was presented, must proceed to hear, in a summary manner, the accusation, and evidence offered in support of the same, and the answer and evidence offered by the party accused; and if, on such hearing, it appears that the charge is sustained, the court must enter a decree that the party accused be deprived of his office, and must enter a judgment for five hundred dollars in favor of the informer, and such costs as are allowed in civil cases." And section 3245 of the Political Code is in these words: "Eight hours' labor constitutes a legal day's work in all cases where the same is performed under the authority of any law of this state, or under the direction, control, or by the authority of any officer of this state, acting in his official capacity, or under the direction, control, or by the authority of any municipal corporation within this state, or of any officer thereof, acting as such; and a stipulation to that effect must be made a part of all contracts to which the state, or any municipal corporation therein, is a party." The evident purpose of section 772, above quoted, was to authorize a superior court to remove from office any unfaithful officer of the state or of a county or municipality within the state, who is within its jurisdiction, and who has refused or neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his office. The section is penal in its character, and, in order to give the court authority to enforce it, all the facts showing that the accused is a state, county, or municipal officer within the jurisdiction of the court, and when, how, and where he refused or neglected to perform his official duty, should be plainly and fully alleged; and the proceeding must be instituted while the accused is still in office, and not after his term has expired. Smith v. Ling, 68 Cal. 324, 9 Pac. Rep. 171; Woods v. Varnum, 85 Cal. 639, 24 Pac. Rep. 843. The only question, then, is, does the accusation in this case meet these requirements? In our opinion, it does not, but is fatally defective in several respects. In the first place, there is no averment as to where Golden Gate Park is located. So far as appears from the averments, it may be in San Diego or Siskiyou county, or in the states of Nevada or Oregon. In the second place, it does not appear from any averment that the respondents, when they entered into the contract with Warren, or when they compelled laborers employed by them to work nine hours daily, were officers of this state, or of any county or municipality within the state. The averment is only that they did the acts complained of "while acting in the official capacity of commissioners of Golden Gate Park." And, in the third place, it does not appear that the respondents were park commissioners, or held any office, when the accusation was filed against them. This being so, the demurrers were properly sustained, and it is immaterial upon what particular ground the court below based its ruling.

The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment. The failure of the defendants to have inserted in the agreement alleged to have been made by them with Warren a clause to the effect that eight hours should constitute a legal day's work thereunder did not constitute a refusal or neglect upon the part of defendants "to perform the official duties pertaining" to the office of park commissioner, within the meaning of section 772 of the Penal Code. The official duties referred to in that section, and the nonperformance of which is made cause for removal from office, relate to such official duties, the failure to perform which may injuriously affect the rights of some one of the general public, and the performance of which duties is made mandatory upon the part of the officer in the interest of the public. The omission here charged is not of this nature, because, if it should be assumed that section 3245 of the Political Code has any reference whatever to such a contract as is mentioned in the accusation, the omission to insert in such agreement a provision that eight hours should constitute a legal day's work thereunder can in no wise affect the rights of laborers employed by the contractor, and who did not expressly stipulate as to the number of hours they would work each day, for the section itself, independent of any such express provision, forms part of the contract, and the contract, in such a case, is to be read and interpreted as if it contained the express stipulation mentioned in the statute. Plainly, therefore, the rights of no one can be, or were, affected by the omission complained of. If, upon the other hand, section 3245 of the Political Code does not include such a contract as the petition alleges was made by defendants with Warren, then, clearly, the omission to make the express stipulation referred to was not, in any sense, a failure to discharge an official duty. Looked at from any point of view, the petition fails to state a cause of action against the defendants.

BOYSON v. THORN. (No. 14,534.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1893.)

TORTS—MALICIOUS INTERFERENCE WITH CONTRACT.

An action will not lie against one who maliciously, but without threats, violence, fraud, falsehood, or benefit to himself, procures a breach of contract between others.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Thomas Boyson against S. F. Thorn for maliciously procuring a breach of contract. There was a demurrer to the complaint, which was sustained. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. Wm. F. Herrin, J. M. Allen, and Wm. H. L. Barnes, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Defendant demurred to plaintiff's complaint, the demurrer was sustained, and judgment was thereupon rendered dismissing the action, from which judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that Frank G. Newlands is the owner and in possession and control of the Palace Hotel in the city of San Francisco, and of a public restaurant attached thereto, and conducted the same as a hotel and restaurant, and that the defendant, during all the times mentioned in the complaint, was the agent of Newlands, and as such had charge of the business thereof, and direction of the servants therein. That immediately prior to November 1, 1889, Newlands entered into an agreement whereby plaintiff hired certain rooms in said hotel, as lodgings for himself and wife from November 1, 1889, at the monthly rent of $100; that they were to have their meals at said restaurant, or furnished from said restaurant to their said rooms, he paying therefor the usual rates; that they entered and occupied the rooms, and in all things complied with said agreement, but that on December 5, 1889, the "defendant maliciously, and with intent to oppress, annoy, and disturb plaintiff in the occupancy of his lodgings, and to force him to abandon the same, and to deprive him of the comforts and conveniences which he was then and there enjoying, and to injure him in his profession, and to degrade and belittle him in the eyes of the guests of said hotel and of his friends and of the public in general, and in fraud of said agreement, caused and procured F. G. Newlands then and there to demand that plaintiff and his wife forthwith vacate said lodgings." It is further charged that defendant maliciously caused and procured Newlands to refuse to furnish meals, etc., and to instruct the servants to refuse their orders; and that on December 12, 1889, defendant maliciously caused and procured Newlands to threaten and attempt to forcibly eject plaintiff and his wife from said rooms, whereby his wife became ill, and he was compelled to and did employ a nurse at an expense of $60, and also to hire men to protect his wife and retain possession, etc., at a further expense of $60, and prays for $25,120 damages. The action is against Thorn alone. The demurrer is that the facts stated do not constitute a cause of action against the defendant.

The broad question presented is whether an action will lie against one who, from malicious motives, but without threats, violence, fraud, falsehood, deception, or benefit to himself, induces another to violate his contract with the plaintiff. We state the question thus because it will be observed that the complaint does not state the means used to cause or procure Newlands to violate his contract with the plaintiff, but only that it was done "maliciously." The general rule is that only those who are parties to, or in some manner bound by, a contract, are liable for a breach of it. To this general rule there are certain exceptions, as, for example, contracts for personal services involving the relation of master and servant; and there are also other cases that are sometimes classed as exceptions, but which are not strictly so. In Cooley on Torts (2d Ed., p. 581) it is said: "An action cannot, in general, be maintained for inducing a third person to break his contract with the plaintiff, the consequence, after all, being only a broken contract, for which the party to the contract may have his remedy by suing upon it. But if the third person was induced to break his contract by deception it may be different. If, for example, one were to personate a vendee of goods, and receive and pay for them as on a sale to himself, the vendee would have his action against the vendor; but he might also pursue the party who, by deceiving one, had defrauded both." In the case supposed by the learned author the gist of the action is the fraud of the defendant in personating the vendee. The fact that the only injury or damage sustained by the vendee in consequence of defendant's fraud was the loss of the benefit he would have derived from the performance of the contract does not at all change the character of the action. Suppose that A., knowing that B. is about to bestow upon C., as a gratuity, a large amount of money or property, and A. fraudulently personates C., and receives the money or property, C. could have no action against B., for there was no contract relation between them; but C. could have his action against A. for the loss caused by his fraud. The means used to accomplish the wrong is in each case the same, showing conclusively that the fraud is the basis of the action, while the breach of the contract thus procured goes only to the question of damages; that is, how and in what manner and to what extent has the plaintiff been injured by the fraud, deceit, or other wrongful act of the defendant? Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82, cited by appellant, is another illustration. There the plaintiffs had contracted verbally with Stebbins for the purchase of a large quantity of cheese. The defendant, Manley, procured a telegram to be sent to Stebbins in the name of E. Rice, falsely saying that plaintiffs did not want the cheese, and thereby induced Stebbins, who supposed E. Rice was one of the plaintiffs, to sell the cheese to Manley. Stebbins was not bound by the verbal contract, but it is found that he would have performed it but for the fraud of defendant. The action was sustained. Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. 385, also cited by appellant, was another case where a contract with the plaintiff was broken because of defendant's false representation that plaintiff had abandoned all intention of fulfilling it. Lally v. Cantwell, 30 Mo. App. 524, also cited by appellant, was an action for loss of employment. The court, after discussing the cases involving the relation of master and servant, said: "But this case falls within another well-settled principle, which is that, where the interference takes the form of false, defamatory statements,—of libel or slander,—an action will lie for interference with a relation beneficial to the plaintiff, although the relation did not rest in contract, and although the breach of it by the party who was procured to break it was not actionable." The cases are too numerous to be cited or reviewed where interference with business or contract relations through acts of violence, nuisance threats, deceit, fraud, libel, and slander have been redressed, both in England and in this country. Most of the cases cited by appellant, which do not involve the relation of master and servant, will be found of the character above mentioned, though in many of both classes will be found expressions which more or less directly support the proposition for which appellant contends.

Cases involving the relation of master and servant, though that relation is now created solely by contract, seem to stand upon different grounds from contracts not involving that relation. Section 49 of the Civil Code, entitled "Protection to Personal Relations," is as follows: "The rights of personal relation forbid (1) the abduction of a husband from his wife, or of a parent from his child; (2) the abduction of a wife from her husband, or of a child from a parent or guardian entitled to its custody, or of a servant from his master; (3) the seduction of a wife, daughter, orphan sister, or servant; (4) any injury to a servant, which affects his ability to serve his master." In this state, at least, no analogy favorable to appellant can be drawn from cases involving what the Code itself declares to be "a personal relation" existing between master and servant. The Code does not distinguish between different means which may be employed to disturb or destroy any of these relations, for it is the direct interference with the relation which is forbidden, whether the relation be one founded in natural right, as parent and child, or created by the law, as guardian and ward, or by personal contract, as between master and servant; and therefore does not depend upon the mode or means in or by which the relation may be created. It is not the mere procuring of one party to a contract to break his contract, but it is the taking away from or depriving the master of the subject of the contract, or that which the master contracted for, viz. the services of the servant.

The facts alleged in the complaint do not bring the case within the principle governing cases involving the relation of master and servant, nor of those other cases where a contract is procured to be broken by fraud, deceit, slander, or other actionable wrong, as in Rice v. Manley, and other cases above noticed. It is conceded by appellant, and it is unquestionably true, that "one may advise a friend in all honesty, and without ill will to the other contracting party, to abide the risks of breaking an onerous or mischievous contract, rather than those of performing it." In Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. Div. 343, Brett, L. J., said: "Merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or in fact." This being true, will the fact that the advice or persuasion proceeds from malicious motives create a liability where the same advice or persuasion, if given from good motives, would not? In considering this question the distinction between civil and criminal proceedings must not be overlooked. In the dissenting opinion of Lord Coleridge, C. J., in Bowen v. Hall, supra, the question above presented is answered thus: "It is, I believe, also admitted, except by Sir William Erle, whom I think no one has ever followed, that if a man endeavors to persuade another to break his contract, and succeeds in his endeavor, yet if he does this without what the law calls 'malice,' the damage which results, however great, is not in itself a cause of action against him. But if the damage which is not in itself actionable be joined to a motive which is not in itself actionable, the two together form a cause of action. This seems a strange conclusion. * * * I do not know, except in the case of Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, that it has ever been held that the same person, for doing the same thing, under the same circumstances, with the same result, is actionable or not actionable, according to whether his inward motive was selfish or unselfish, for what he did. I think the inquiries to which this view of the law would lead are dangerous and inexpedient inquiries for courts of justice. Judges are not very fit for them, and juries are very unfit."

It is a truism of the law that an act which does not amount to a legal injury cannot be actionable because it is done with a bad intent; that what one has a right to do another cannot complain of. It is conceded that one may lawfully persuade or procure another to break his contract with a third person, "if it be done from good motives." We think the qualification has no place in the proposition. If it is right, and the means used to procure the breach are right, the motive cannot make it a wrong any more than a good motive would justify fraud, deceit, slander, or violence to effect the same purpose. Suppose A. by fraudulent representations induces B. to sell him a large quantity of goods upon credit, intending to defraud B. of the entire value of the goods. C., knowing that the representations are false, and not caring whether B. shall lose his goods or not, but of unmixed malice and ill will towards A., procures B. to refuse to deliver the goods, by truthfully informing B. of the falsity of the representations made by A. Will it be said that C. is liable in an action brought by A.? In Cooley on Torts (2d Ed., p. 832) the learned author says: "Bad motive, by itself, then, is no tort. Malicious motives make a bad act worse, but they cannot make that a wrong which in its own essence is lawful. When in legal pleadings the defendant is charged with having wrongfully done the act complained of, the words are only words of vituperation, and amount to nothing unless a cause of action is otherwise alleged." Again, the same author (at page 836) says: "Motive generally becomes important only when the damages for a wrong are to be estimated. It then comes in as an element of mitigation or aggravation, and is of the highest importance." That the mere fact that one induces another to break a contract with a third person does not give a right of action, seems to have been directly decided in McCann v. Wolff, 28 Mo. App. 447, cited by appellant. The petition alleged that "by some means unknown to plaintiff" the defendant induced a third person to renege from a contract, whereby the plaintiff lost commissions. The court said: "The demurrer was properly sustained. The petition charges neither malice nor fraud on defendant's part, and in the absence of both an action of this kind is not maintainable."

Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216; Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. Div. 333; and Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555,—are cited and largely relied upon by appellant. In Lumley v. Gye, plaintiff, the proprietor of a theater, employed Miss Wagner to sing in his theater for a specified time. Defendant, knowing the premises, and maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff, enticed and procured Wagner to refuse to perform, by means of which enticement and procurement she wrongfully refused to perform, etc. Defendant demurred to the declaration. The court held that the relation of master and servant existed, and the decision was placed upon that ground; Crompton, J., saying, however, that he did not wish to be considered as deciding "or as saying that in no case except that of master and servant is an action maintained for maliciously inducing another to break his contract to the injury of the person with whom such contract has been made." Mr. Justice Coleridge (now lord chief justice of England) dissented in a long and able opinion, holding that the relation of master and servant did not exist within the intent of the statute of laborers of 23 Edw. III., in which he said the law in relation to the seduction of servants had its origin; and as to the broader proposition argued by counsel and referred to by Crompton, J., concluded: "Merely to induce or procure a free contracting party to break his covenant, whether done maliciously or not, to the damage of another, for the reason I have stated, is not actionable." In Bowen v. Hall, supra, a contract for skilled labor, the case was decided in the appellate court upon the authority of Lumley v. Gye, Lord Coleridge again dissenting. The opinions of the majority of the court go far to sustain the broad proposition contended for by the appellant here. Lumley v. Gye was declared by Lord Coleridge, in the latter case, to stand alone. The reasoning in the dissenting opinions in those cases seems conclusive and satisfactory. Walker v. Cronin, supra, was also a case of enticement of laborers. The question arose upon demurrer. The court held, after stating the declaration: "This sets forth sufficiently (1) intentional and willful acts; (2) calculated to cause damage to the plaintiffs in their lawful business; (3) done with the unlawful purpose to cause such damage and loss, without right or justifiable cause on the part of the defendant, which constitutes malice; and (4) actual damage and loss resulting." This case does not seem to be based upon the relation of master and servant, or that of a contract for personal services; but, unless it can be sustained upon that ground, (a point not necessary to consider,) the decision is clearly wrong. In Payne v. Railroad Co., 13 Lea, 507, plaintiff, a merchant, had a large and profitable trade with defendant's employees. Defendant circulated a notice to the effect that any of its employees who, after that date, traded with plaintiff, would be discharged. This, it is alleged, was done maliciously, whereby plaintiff was damaged. The court held that an act not unlawful, done in a manner not unlawful, though from wicked and malicious motives, and causing injury, is not actionable. That no contract existed between the merchant and the employees does not affect the principle involved. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 453, defines a malicious act: "In a legal sense, any unlawful act, done willfully and purposely to the injury of another, is, as against that person, malicious."

Two cases recently decided by the supreme court of Kentucky fully sustain our conclusion. Boulter v. Macauley, 15 S. W. Rep. 60, was a stronger case than Lumley v. Gye, as the dramatic performer was not only induced to violate her agreement with plaintiff, but to perform in defendant's theater instead. It was held that defendant was not liable. The other case—Chambers v. Baldwin, 15 S. W. Rep. 57—was for procuring a third party to break his contract for the sale of a crop of tobacco. The complaint was demurred to. The questions presented, as stated by the court, are: "First, whether one party to a contract can maintain an action against a person who has maliciously advised and procured the other party to break it; second, whether an act lawful in itself can become actionable solely because it was done maliciously." The judgment of the court below sustaining the demurrer was affirmed. Jones v. Stanly, 76 N. C. 355, cited by appellant, directly sustains appellant's contention, but the decision is based upon Haskins v. Royster, 70 N. C. 601, (the only case cited,) which case involved the relation of master and servant, and was decided by a divided court. It may be questioned whether the omission to allege that Thorn knew of the contract between appellant and Newlands is not fatal to the complaint, but, as we conclude that the demurrer was properly sustained upon the principal point made, it is not necessary to consider it. We are of the opinion that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

DOWLING v. ALTSCHUL. (No. 14,978.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1893.)
STREET ASSESSMENT—APPEAL TO CITY COUNCIL—CONCLUSIVENESS OF DECISION.

Act March 18, 1885, p. 147, § 11, provides for an appeal to the city council from an act or determination of the superintendent of streets as to the legality of any assessment; that on such appeal the city council may "confirm, amend, set aside, alter, modify, or correct" the assessment, as it may deem just; that all decisions of the council shall be conclusive, on all persons entitled to such an appeal, as to all errors and irregularities which the council might have remedied. Held, that an appeal on the ground that an assessment for paying a cul-de-sac failed to assess the land at the end of the same presented a question which the city council had power to determine, and therefore their decision was conclusive.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1.
Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by J. J. Dowling against L. Altschul to enforce a street assessment. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce a street assessment in the city of San Francisco, in which the judgment was in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff brings this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll, in which there is no bill of exceptions, and contends that upon the findings of fact the judgment should have been in favor of the plaintiff. There is no question that the plaintiff entered into a valid contract with the superintendent of streets to construct sidewalks and curbing, and to pave the roadway throughout the entire length of Clarence place, which is a cul-de-sac 35 feet in width, extending northwesterly from Townsend street a distance of 412½ feet, as shown by the following diagram:

The black figures on the diagram represent feet, and the red (which are large) designate the numbers of lots assessed. The land adjoining the northwesterly end of Clarence place was not assessed; and for this reason alone the defendant, who owns lot No. 3, contends that the assessment is not equal or uniform, and is therefore void, and so the trial court expressly found, as a conclusion of law. It is found as a fact that the defendant duly appealed from the assessment to the board of supervisors, and that the board affirmed the assessment; and counsel for appellant contends that under section 11 of the act of March 18, 1885, (page 147,) such appeal was respondent's only remedy, and that the affirmance of the assessment by the board of supervisors is conclusive. And, as I think this point should be sustained, it will be unnecessary to consider whether the decision of the supervisors was erroneous or not. Section 11 of the act above cited provides for an appeal to the city council from any act or determination of the superintendent of streets as to the correctness or legality of any assessment, and that "upon such appeal the city council * * * may confirm, amend, set aside, alter, modify, or correct the assessment in such manner as to them shall seem just, * * * and may instruct and direct the superintendent of streets to correct the warrant, assessment, or diagram in any particular, or to make and issue a new warrant, assessment, and diagram.

* * * All the decisions and determinations of the city council * * * shall be final and conclusive upon all persons entitled to appeal under the provision of this section, as to all errors, informalities, and irregularities which said city council might have remedied or avoided; and no assessment shall be held invalid, except upon appeal to the city council as provided in this section, for any error, informality, or other defect * * * in the assessment, when notice of the intention of the city council to order the work to be done has been actually published in any designated newspaper in said city for the length of time prescribed by law before the passage of the resolution ordering the work to be done." In this case it is found that the notice mentioned in the last clause of the above quotation was duly published, and that all the proceedings up to the time the assessment was levied were regular, and it is also clear that the error in the assessment, if error it was, might have been remedied or avoided by the city council on the appeal. The assessment upon defendant's lot was not so totally void that it could not have been amended by order of the city council. It was founded upon a valid contract for work that had been completed according to the contract, and for which defendant's whole lot was assessable, and was made by an officer (superintendent of streets) having plenary power to make it. In consequence of the alleged error, defendant's lot was assessed for $490.30, when it should have been assessed at only about $470. If such an error cannot be corrected on appeal to the city council, I think no substantial error in an assessment can be so corrected, and that it must follow that section 11 of the act of March 18, 1885, so far as it purports to authorize the city council on appeal to amend, alter, modify, or correct an assessment, is wholly ineffectual.

To the point that the error could not have been corrected on appeal, and, therefore, that defendant is not concluded by the decision of the board of supervisors, counsel for respondents cite People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15; Dyer v. Harrison, 63 Cal. 448; and Diggins v. Brown, 76 Cal. 318, 18 Pac. Rep. 373. But in none of these cases does it appear that any question as to the effect of the failure to appeal, or of a decision on appeal, was raised or expressly decided. Nor does it appear that any such question possibly could have been involved in the leading case, (People v. Lynch.) which arose in Sacramento city, and was governed by the charter of that city, in which I find no provision analogous to section 11 of the general act of March 18, 1885. While I find no case construing section 11 of the act of 1885, or any other similar statute, which sustains the position of respondent's counsel, I think the following late cases, and many earlier ones, are in point for the appellant: Frick v. Morford, 87 Cal. 576, 25 Pac. Rep. 764; Perine v. Forbush, (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 226. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the lower court directed to render judgment for the plaintiff on the findings of fact.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reason given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the lower court is directed to render judgment for the plaintiff on the findings of fact.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the judgment for the reason that in my opinion the assessment was correct. The provision in the statute that the assessment shall be made upon the lots and lands fronting upon the work must be construed as referring to the lots which front laterally upon the street, and not as including one which abuts upon the bottom of a court or a cul-de-sac. I am not prepared to say, however, that the act of the board of supervisors, confirming an assessment which is made in manifest violation of the provisions of the statute, concludes the owner from making such defense in an action to enforce the assessment.

WALLACE et al. v. Sisson et al. (No. 14,-566.)

CONTRACTS—EVIDENCE—PARTNERSHIP—ACCOUNTING.

S. W. & Co. made a business of hiring Chinese laborers to railroad and construction companies. No direct compensation was paid for this service, but the understanding was that S. W. & Co. were to have the right to furnish supplies to whatever men they obtained for the companies, which supplies were to be retained out of the men's wages. There being a scarcity of labor, S. proposed the importation of men direct from China. Not meeting with encouragement from the other partners, he took the matter to the president of the S. P. R. Co., and an agreement was perfected, under which importations were afterwards made. The secretary of the construction company, one of the parties signing the contract, testified that certain advances were to be made under the contract by his own company and by S. W. & Co. to cover the cost of importation; that, according to his recollection, S. W. & Co. signed the contract, and that the last he saw of it it was in the hands of W. The person who was to go to China to secure the importations was to act ostensibly for the S. P. Co., as that company was better known than the construction companies. Directions were sent by the S. P. officials to the steamship agent in China to make the advances and draw on S. W. & Co. for the entire amount. The clerk to whom the draft was presented at S. W. & Co.'s office, in their absence, claimed that they were not to pay it. The secretary of the construction company testified that he then had some conversation with the clerk concerning payment, in which reference was made to the contract. The contract itself was not produced. A large number of Chinese were imported, and worked for the construction company. Held, that there was not merely a privilege to furnish supplies, but a contract to which S., W. & Co. was a party, and which, at least by force of usage, gave them the right to furnish supplies to the men obtained thereunder, and on the death of one of the partners his estate was entitled to a share of the profits arising therefrom.

2. The rescission of a partnership settlement effected through fraud, and return of property received thereunder by the estate of a deceased partner, is not necessary to the maintenance of a suit for further accounting by the representatives of deceased.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action for an accounting, brought by Emeline Wallace and Cora A. Herzstein against Joseph H. Sisson and Milo A. Burke, executors of A. W. Sisson, deceased, and Julia Ann Crocker, executrix of Clark W. Crocker, deceased. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

A. N. Brown, (D. M. Delmas, of counsel,) for appellants. Mastic, Belcher & Mastic, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Appeal from a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial. A. W. Sisson, W. H. Wallace, and Clark W. Crocker were copartners in the name of Sisson, Wallace & Co. Wallace died intestate, October 2, 1881. This action was commenced in May, 1884, against Sisson and Crocker, and, Sisson having died before judgment, his executors were substituted, and, defendant Crocker having died since this appeal, his executrix was substituted in this court. The firm was organized about 1868, having its principal place of business at San Francisco, and subsidiary places of business at different points on the line of the Central and Southern Pacific Railroads during the construction and operation of those roads. The Pacific Improvement Company, the Western Development Company, and the Southern Development Company were corporations severally engaged in the construction of these railroads under contracts with the railroad companies. Sisson, Wallace & Co. were dealers in merchandise, but their principal business was procuring Chinese laborers for the railroad and construction companies, and furnishing them with supplies of food and clothing while laboring for those corporations. As Chinamen were needed for construction or repairs, orders were given Sisson, Wallace & Co. for the men, and these would be procured and forwarded. No compensation was paid by the corporations for this service, but there was an understanding that Sisson, Wallace & Co. should supply the men so furnished with food and clothing out of the profits of which they would be compensated for their labor and expense in procuring them. The Chinamen labored under the immediate direction of the railroad or construction company, who also kept their time; but the pay rolls, when made out, were delivered to Sisson, Wallace & Co., and the money called for by the rolls was paid to them, and they retained the amounts due them from the Chinamen for supplies, and paid them the remainder. In June or July, 1881, more Chinamen were required than could be obtained here. One Koopmanschap suggested to Mr. Sisson that he could obtain in China all the men required, but it would involve the expense of procuring them, and of their transportation from China. Sisson communicated the suggestion to Mr. Wallace, who thought the risk too great to justify incurring so large an outlay. Sisson, however, took Koopmanschap to Charles Crocker, the president of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and introduced the subject of procuring men from China, and an arrangement was afterwards perfected under which a large number of Chinamen were imported. What this arrangement was, who were parties to it, and whether it constituted a contract under which Sisson, Wallace & Co. had a right to supply the Chinamen for any definite time, or while they should labor for the construction company, are the principal questions involved in the appeal.

Mr. Wallace left surviving him, Emeline, his widow, Cora, his daughter, (the plaintiffs,) and a minor son. Mrs. Wallace was appointed administratrix of his estate and the guardian of the minor. Early in January, 1882, negotiations were commenced by the surviving partners for the purchase of the interest of the estate in the partnership, the offer being that they would pay the value of that interest as shown by the annual statement of the assets and liabilities, as of January 1, 1882. Mrs. Wallace insisted that she should be allowed the proportionate part of the value of the good will of the business, which was long established, and large and valuable, and also claimed, while admitting her inability to establish the fact that the Chinamen imported from China were so imported under a contract made before Mr. Wallace died, by which the firm had a vested right to furnish them supplies, that the profits which would accrue to the firm during the time they were to labor would amount to a very large sum, and that the estate should have its interest in these profits, or be compensated for them in the settlement. On the other hand, Sisson and Crocker insisted that there was no contract right; that all they had was a mere privilege of furnishing supplies, which the corporations could revoke at any moment; and refused to allow anything for the good will, or for any profits to be realized from supplies to be furnished the Chinamen; that, if their offer was not accepted, they would proceed to liquidate the affairs of the partnership. Mrs. Wallace, admitting her inability to establish the fact at that time, and protesting that if she should ever be able to establish it, she would enforce her rights, accepted the offer made, and, in order to consummate the arrangement, gave bonds for the payment of the debts of the estate and procured a distribution, the sale of the interest of the minor being effected through the probate court. Plaintiffs, claiming to have discovered facts establishing a contract right to the said profits, brought this action for an accounting, alleging that 1,800 Chinamen were so imported; that the profits arising therefrom were $450,000, of which one-third belonged to the estate; that other contracts and rights were secured by said firm shortly before the death of said Wallace of the value of $50,000, charging fraud and concealment in relation to those contracts, and praying for a disclosure and accounting, and for judgment for the sum of $180,000, and for general relief.

The court, after finding the uncontroverted facts, and some controverted facts which do not require special notice, upon the principal questions at issue found, in substance, that there was no fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment on the part of defendants; that they informed the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs well knew, that defendants believed that said business was becoming very lucrative, and that during the years succeeding would yield large and increased profits; that the firm of Sisson, Wallace & Co. did not enter into any contract, nor was there any contract or agreement whatever between said firm and any of said corporations for the importation of Chinamen, or for the securing such men in China, or the forwarding of them to San Francisco, or the collection or payment of their wages, or the reimbursement of any sums advanced to pay passage money or other expenses, of collecting or forwarding men, or giving to Sisson, Wallace & Co. the exclusive right or any right to furnish said or any Chinamen with supplies, or with the privilege of deducting the accounts of said firm therefrom from the wages of such laborers; that the exclusive privilege which the firm had enjoyed for many years of furnishing supplies to the Chinese laborers was by mere sufferance upon a parol understanding with certain stockholders and officers of the railroad companies; that for the purpose of enabling the firm to protect itself against loss, and to collect the money due them, the pay rolls were placed in their hands with funds to pay the laborers; that there was no contract giving to said firm any fixed or vested right to the privilege thus enjoyed, or giving any assurance to said firm that such privilege would be accorded to them for any time in the future. These findings are not justified by the evidence.

Before discussing the circumstances under which these importations of Chinamen were made, it is necessary to understand the previous relation of the parties concerned. It is quite true that Sisson, Wallace & Co. did not have a contract by which they were to furnish all the labor for the construction of these roads, nor any particular number of men. These corporations were at all times at liberty to procure men through others, and, according to the testimony of Mr. Charles Crocker, did obtain men through others; but he further testified (and as to this there is no conflict) that whoever furnished men for the work had the exclusive right to furnish the supplies for them. F. S. Douty, the secretary of the Pacific Improvement and Southern Development Companies, testified: "We looked to them (Sisson, Wallace & Co.) to get Chinamen. They employed Chinamen for us, and sent them down there, and we paid them the proceeds of the Chinese labor. Some one connected with the company would give them an order for whatever men we wanted." Mr. Charles Crocker testified that this mode of transacting the business dated back to 1864. No exception to it is shown to have occurred. Mr. Douty testified that it had been the custom since he knew anything about the business; that it was a great convenience to them, and enabled them to perform their business with one person instead of a large number of Chinamen who would be employed. This arrangement was, in substance and effect, that Sisson, Wallace & Co. hired the Chinamen to work for them under the direction of the construction companies, at wages agreed upon, and Sisson, Wallace & Co. were paid the whole amount of their wages. There was no contract relation between the Chinamen and the construction companies; the contract was with Sisson, Wallace & Co. There was, however, no contract with Sisson, Wallace & Co. that they should furnish all the labor required until the roads should be completed, nor for any definite length of time. Each order constituted a contract for the men furnished under it, and the men so furnished were the employes of Sisson, Wallace & Co. so long as they remained upon the work. This, I think, was clearly the effect of the arrangement. But, if I am wrong in this conclusion, it was a custom, uniform and without exception, that they should have the right to furnish them supplies so long as they worked upon the road; and this custom became a term of the contract between Sisson, Wallace & Co. and the railroad and construction companies attached to every order to the firm to furnish men, as fully as though it had been incorporated in each order given. "Any local or special custom or usage upon the subject will govern as an implied term in the contract between the parties." Hayes v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 23 Cal. 189. See also, Taylor v. Castle, 42 Cal. 367, 371.

"Every legal contract is to be interpreted in accordance with the intention of the parties making it. And usage, when it is reasonable, uniform, well settled, not in opposition to fixed rules of law, not in contradiction of the express terms of the contract, is deemed to form part of the contract, and to enter into the intention of the parties."

Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 464, and cases there cited. If it be said that the railroad and construction companies could not prevent others from coming into competition with Sisson, Wallace & Co. in furnishing supplies to their Chinamen, it is sufficient to reply that during construction, at least, the railroad was not open to business, and could refuse to allow their construction trains to forward supplies for laborers, except for those who had a contract right to do so. Prior to the importation of men from China, procuring Chinamen was always attended with some expense, and sometimes Chinese labor was scarce, and at such times Sisson, Wallace & Co. were compelled to pay a bonus; but when the importation of men from China, which would require the payment of the passage money and the expenses, was suggested to Wallace, he objected that the risk was too great, and hence the special arrangement afterwards made. That a written contract was made between one of the construction companies, Koopmanschap, and Sisson, Wallace & Co., concerning such importation, is clear, though such written contract was not produced on the trial, nor shown to be then in existence.

F. S. Douty testified that in 1881 and 1882 he was secretary and treasurer of the Pacific Improvement Company and of the Southern Development Company; that he remembered something of an instrument purporting to be a contract between one of those companies and Koopmanschap, and he thought Sisson, Wallace & Co., "by which Koopmanschap was to go to China, and get a thousand Chinamen; that he was to have $15 a head, to be used as compensation for his services, and the Pacific Improvement Company or Southern Development Company were to pay this $15 a head, which was to constitute his consideration. * * * Neither of the companies would recover any portion of it again, and these companies were to pay the transportation of the Chinamen from Hongkong, or the shipping point, to San Francisco, and Sisson, Wallace & Co. were to advance $15 a head. This $50 (transportation) and this last $15 I have mentioned, were to be collected back from the Chinamen. That was the sum and substance of the thing that was to be carried out as far as it could be." He further testified that the Chinamen were guarantied work for a stated time,—he thought one year,—and were to receive $30 per month; that he signed it as secretary, and affixed the seal of the corporation; that his recollection was that it had been signed by Koopmanschap and Sisson,

Wallace & Co., before he signed, but he was positive as to Koopmanschap's signature, and that Koopmanschap and Wallace were both present when he signed it; that he signed it by direction of Mr. Charles Crocker, and that he last saw it in the hands of Mr. Wallace, and his best recollection was that it was signed by Sisson, Wallace & Co. Koopmanschap was to act ostensibly for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, as that corporation was better known in China than the construction companies, and was furnished with blank contracts to be executed by him as agent, and by the Chinamen. By this contract the Chinamen agreed to labor for the railroad company for 18 months from the date of the commencement of labor, at $30 per month, they to provide their own food and lodging, but to be furnished transportation and provisions from China to the place of destination, and in this contract the Chinamen acknowledged the receipt of $65 each as an advancement to be deducted from their wages. For the information of the agent of the Occidental & Oriental Steamship Company at Hongkong, a copy of the above-mentioned contract was sent to said agent with the following letter: "Per Gaelic. Occidental and Oriental Steamship Company. General Office. San Francisco, July 7, 1881. Mr. C. H. Haswell, Jr., Agent, Hongkong—Dear Sir: Mr. Koopmanschap goes to Hongkong by Oceanic, which follows the bearer, to arrange for the hiring of about 1,000 Chinamen for labor on the Southern Pacific Railroad. They are to be forwarded in two lots by our steamers, and contracts will be made by Mr. Koopmanschap, as per copy inclosed. The object of this letter is to make the following authorizations to you: First, advance to Mr. Koopmanschap the sum of fifteen dollars ($15) per head, to cover expenses in Hongkong; second, advance to the agent of the Chinamen fifteen dollars ($15) for each man as a bonus to him; third, issue tickets for the Chinese at the regular rates, taking the acknowledgment of the proper person. These advances are, of course, not to be made until the Chinamen go on board. You will then send me a draft on Messrs. Sisson, Wallace & Co., of San Francisco, for the entire expense, namely, passage money and $30 each extra in U. S. gold coin by the steamers bringing the men. In order that you may have sufficient funds to cover the advances referred to, we have cabled you to make no remittances to us at present. Very truly yours, Charles F. Crocker, Vice President." The first shipment of the Chinamen arrived at San Francisco, September 29 or 30, 1881, two or three days before the death of Mr. Wallace, whose condition had not permitted his presence at the office of Sisson, Wallace & Co. for some weeks, and whose illness had lasted for several months. Mr. Sisson testified that before the arrival of the steamer he had arranged with the Merchants' Exchange to notify Sisson, Wallace & Co. of the approach of the steamer; that he met the steamer in the bay with a lighter, received the lists of the Chinamen, and the contracts they had executed with Koopmanschap, took the Chinamen on the barge to the Oakland wharf, put them on the cars, and went with them to the places at which they were to labor. On September 30th the draft drawn by Haswell, the agent of the steamship company at Hongkong, for $22,560, pursuant to the above letter from Charles F. Crocker, was presented to Mr. Scott, the head man of Sisson, Wallace & Co., Mr. Wallace being then on his deathbed, Mr. Crocker absent in Europe, and Mr. Sisson absent with the Chinamen on their way to the front. Concerning the payment of this draft, Mr. Douty testified that he had some conversation with Scott by telephone to the effect that Scott contended that he should not pay it; that witness told him to look at his contract, and Scott replied that he had no contract. "Well," I said, "then find it, because you are to handle this; but, whatever there is, if it is not perfectly understood, we will make you good in that matter." This draft was for $80 per man, ($22,560,) and was afterwards repaid by the Southern Development Company, except the $15 per man advanced by Sisson, Wallace & Co., and which they were to collect from the Chinamen.

The foregoing conversation between Douty and Scott, in reference to the contract and payment of the draft, occurring while the matter was still fresh in Mr. Douty's recollection, is strong evidence, not only that the contract was made and signed by Sisson, Wallace & Co., but that it provided for the payment of these drafts by them. Besides, the letter of Charles F. Crocker to Haswell not only corroborates Mr. Douty as to the terms of the contract, but it is inconceivable that he would direct the agent of the steamship company to draw drafts upon Sisson, Wallace & Co. for each of the two contemplated shipments, amounting to $40,000 each, without a contract right so to do. If further corroboration were needed, it would be found in the fact testified to by Mr. Douty that Mr. Charles Crocker sent for him; that he found Koopmanschap and Wallace there; that Mr. Crocker directed him to execute the contract; that Koopmanschap and Wallace were both present when he signed it; that he last saw it in the hands of Wallace, and that the importations were in fact conducted in the manner and according to the terms of the contract, as narrated by him. It is true it is not stated by Mr. Douty, nor by any witness, that the written contract provided in terms that Sisson, Wallace & Co. were to have the right to supply these Chinamen during their term of labor, nor was it necessary that it should, in view of the long-continued custom or usage existing in that regard. Sisson, Wallace & Co. advanced $15 per man, and took their chances of collecting it from the wages of the men. They had no recourse to the development company in any event. If the steamer and all the Chinamen had gone to the bottom of the ocean, they would have been liable for the $15 per man advanced for them by the steamship company, and this was a good consideration for the contract. Nor was their connection with the matter to end with the collection of this $15 out of the wages of the Chinamen. They were to collect the $50 passage money for the development company by keeping out of their wages "as much as they could stand" until it was repaid, as appears by the testimony of Mr. Crocker, who made the arrangement. Mr. Horn, a witness for plaintiffs, testified that he copied a contract relating to the importation of those Chinamen, in the office of Sisson, Wallace & Co., and, while he is clearly in error in some particulars, and inconsistent in others, it is apparent that he had a knowledge of facts that he could not have known unless he had seen such a contract, or learned them in some manner in Sisson, Wallace & Co.'s office; and, if the firm and its other employes had no knowledge of such contract or agreement, he could not well have learned it from them.

Respondents contend that, however the fact may be in regard to a contract of the character above stated, there was such a conflict of evidence as will not permit the finding to be disturbed. It is true Mr. Crocker testified, as did other witnesses, that under the prior course of business Sisson, Wallace & Co. had a mere privilege of supplying the men which they procured; that there never was any contract; that it was simply an understanding. But that is a conclusion erroneously drawn from the facts to which they testify; and as to the imported men Mr. Crocker did not remember that there was a contract, and the defendants and their employes testified that they never knew of such, or any, contract. A careful reading of the testimony, however, will show that these witnesses also testify to conclusions, rather than to the facts which constituted the terms of the contract, and they especially emphasize their denial that there was any contract giving them the right to supply the imported men with food and other merchandise. These denials are not sufficient, in view of the whole evidence, to create a doubt that there was a contract or agreement for the importation of these Chinamen to which Sisson, Wallace & Co. was a party, and which, at least by force of usage, gave them an exclusive contract right to supply them during the term of their employment; and evidence not sufficient to create a doubt cannot be held sufficient to raise a material conflict.

It is further contended that plaintiffs had as full knowledge of all the facts at the time of the settlement as the defendants. Mrs. Wallace admitted that she had known for 10 years the general course of the business, and expressed her belief that there must have been a contract relating to the importation of these Chinamen; but defendants denied that there was such a contract, and this they still deny. They cannot, therefore, contend that she knew of a contract which they say never existed, for to do so would be to admit what they deny. Nor does it appear that they ever informed her of the existence or contents of the letter to Haswell, which had been copied in their office; nor that the drafts had been drawn upon and were paid by them; nor that the firm advanced $15 to each Chinaman, and which they were to collect from his wages; nor that they were to collect and pay to the construction company the $50 passage money; nor that, so far as the evidence discloses, all the communications sent by Koopmanschap while he was in China, in relation to this business, were addressed to Sisson, Wallace & Co., all of which were known to defendants before the settlement. The finding, therefore, that they did not conceal from plaintiffs, "or fail to disclose to them, any fact within their knowledge concerning the same," cannot be sustained.

Respondents further contend that, if the contract of settlement was procured by fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment, plaintiffs' only remedy is by rescission; that they cannot affirm in part and reject in part, and are, therefore, not entitled to recover on their complaint. It is true, as a general rule, that a rescission must be entire; that a party to a contract, who desires to rescind it, must surrender up everything he has received under it; and these rules apply generally to contracts of purchase and sale. They do not apply, however, to all cases of contracts. In this case Wallace's heirs could not become partners in the firm without the consent of the survivors. Mrs. Wallace testified that Sisson proposed to her to permit the interest of the estate to remain in the business at least for a year; that it would be profitable, and that she understood until about January 3, 1882, that it would so remain, when she was informed that such an arrangement would not be made; that it was proposed to take into the firm four of their employees; that they would pay the estate what the annual statement would show they were entitled to, viz. $153,748.20; that she insisted the estate should be allowed for the good will of the business, and for the profits which would accrue from supplies furnished the imported Chinamen, and that she had been offered by a business man $25,000 more than the sum they offered. Plaintiffs could not retain their interest in the firm, nor sell to a stranger, without defendants' consent. The sum offered she was at least entitled to. It did not belong to the surviving partners. In paying that sum they did not part with their own money or property. It was a settlement of the partnership affairs. It was not a voluntary transaction in the broad sense of an ordinary contract. She (and we use the term as representing the heirs) had her choice of two alternatives; to take what was offered, or submit to a liquidation, and to this extent only was it voluntary. If it be true that there was concealment or misrepresentation, that all that was valuable was not brought into the transaction, that something was withheld that should have been estimated, can it be said that before she can have the wrong corrected she must refund to the defendants all that she has received, when she could not receive, hold, own, and control that she had parted with, and which defendants retained, and that a court of equity cannot compel them, without such rescission and surrender, to account for that in which she had an interest, and which was not brought into the accounting upon which the settlement was had? Even if it were necessary to set aside the agreement, it could not be necessary that the money paid should be refunded. It is not claimed that defendants were in any manner deceived or wronged, or that they have paid money that plaintiffs were not in any event entitled to. The law does not require idle or unnecessary acts to be performed, and surely it cannot be necessary that plaintiffs should put back in defendants' hands the money they have in order that they may recover it back with other moneys in addition thereto. These views are fully sustained by the authorities. See Watts v. White, 13 Cal. 321; 2 Pars. Cont. 1, *p. 277, and note R; Pierce v. Wood, 3 Fost. (N. H.) 519; Elfelt v. Hart, 1 McCrary, 11, 1 Fed. Rep. 264. But in strictness this is not an action for rescission, nor is a rescission necessary. The surviving partners have the legal right to the possession of the partnership property and assets, but for which they are required to account. The settlement had was but an accounting, and this action is only for an accounting of a matter not taken into the former accounting. The conclusion to which we have arrived renders it unnecessary to consider alleged omissions to find, and exceptions to evidence, none of which seem to cover any vital point. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

for such appointment, must be taken within 60 days after such judgment or order is entered.

2. Where two petitioners for letters of administration on the estate of a deceased are heard together, under Code Civil Proc. § 1374, but no issue is joined as to any fact alleged in either petition, and no objection is made as to the competency of either party, a motion for a new trial is unauthorized, and no appeal will lie from an order denying the same.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; Robert McGarvey, Judge.

Petitions by R. B. Markle and another for letters of administration on the estate of Frederick Heldt, deceased. The petitions were heard together, under Code Civil Proc. § 1374, and letters of administration were granted to Markle. From the order granting such letters, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the other petitioner appeals. A motion was made to dismiss the appeals. Appeals dismissed.

J. H. Seawell, for appellant. J. A. Cooper, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. There are two appeals in this case. The first is from a judgment or order of the superior court granting letters of administration upon the estate of Frederick Heldt, deceased, to R. B. Markle, and refusing appellant's application for such letters; and the other is an appeal from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial in the same matter. The respondent moves to dismiss both appeals, and we think the motion should be granted.

1. The appeal from the judgment or order appointing an administrator, and denying appellant's application for such appointment, was not taken within 60 days after the same was entered, and therefore was not taken in time. Code Civil Proc. § 1715; Estate of Harland, 64 Cal. 379, 1 Pac. Rep. 159; Estate of Burton, 64 Cal. 428, 1 Pac. Rep. 702; Estate of Fisher, 75 Cal. 523, 17 Pac. Rep. 640; Estate of Wiard, 83 Cal. 619, 24 Pac. Rep. 45; Estate of Backus, 95 Cal. 671, 30 Pac. Rep. 796.

2. In this case both the appellant and respondent filed a petition asking for the issuance of letters of administration upon the estate of the deceased, in each of which petitions the applicant stated that he had been requested to act as such administrator by the widow of the deceased, and both of the petitions were heard together, as provided by section 1374 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But no issue was joined as to any fact alleged in either petition, nor any objection made as to the competency of either of the parties. In such a proceeding, when no issues of fact are made by the pleadings, a motion for a new trial is not authorized; and if such a motion is made, and not entertained, or is denied by the court, no appeal will lie from such an order. This is not in conflict with what was decided by us in Estate of Bauquier, 88 Cal. 313, 26 Pac. Rep.

178, 532. In that case the right of an executrix named in a will to letters testamentary was contested upon certain alleged grounds of incompetency. In such a contest the Code expressly provides that the objections shall be in writing and that they shall be heard and determined by the court, (Code Civil Proc. § 1351,) and in that case it was held that when a trial of such a contest had been had, and findings of fact made by the court, a motion for a new trial was proper, and that the party against whom the decree was made might ask the court to re-examine the questions of facts involved, and that an appeal would lie from an order denying a new trial of such a contest. But in that case the court very clearly intimated that a new trial in a probate proceeding was only proper in cases where there are issues arising upon pleadings authorized by the Code. We there said: "It would be impracticable to enumerate the cases in which a motion for a new trial is appropriate in probate proceeding, but it may be stated generally that whenever the action of the court which is invoked is dependent upon the existence of certain extrinsic facts which are presented to it for determination in the form of pleadings, and are to be decided by it in conformity with the preponderance of the evidence offered thereon, an issue of fact arises which, after its decision, may be re-examined by the court upon a motion for a new trial." And these views were reaffirmed in the later case of Leach v. Pierce, 93 Cal. 615, 29 Pac. Rep. 235, in which it was held that a motion for a new trial was not authorized in the matter of an application for a family allowance. In 1 Hayne on New Trial (section 5) it is said: "It may sometimes be difficult to decide what determinations in probate proceedings amount to orders merely, and what to decisions which are subject to re-examination on motion for a new trial. In Estate of Crosby, 55 Cal. 576, it was held that, whenever 'issues of fact' are tried in probate proceedings, findings are proper. Perhaps it may be said that, wherever findings are proper, a motion for a new trial may be made." We are clearly of the opinion that no findings were necessary in this case, and that the Code does not contemplate a motion for a new trial in a case where ex parte applications for letters of administration are heard together, and no issues joined as to the right or competency of either of the parties to act as such administrator. Appeals dismissed. Remittitur stayed 30 days.

TOBY v. OREGON PAC. R. CO. et al.
(Nos. 14,225, 14,979.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)
FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—SALE BY RECEIVER—DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT—FRAUD AS DEFENSE—DEPOSITIONS AND EXHIBITS.

1. In an action to foreclose a mortgage on a steamer a receiver was appointed for defendant corporation, and subsequently, on a showing that the steamer was deteriorating in value, the receiver was authorized to sell the vessel, which he did. The sale was confirmed, judgment was given for the amount of the mortgage, and execution awarded against defendant corporation for the deficiency. Held, that a personal judgment for the deficiency was properly entered, though Code, § 726, provides in terms for such judgment only "if it appears from the sheriff's return that the proceeds are insufficient."

2. A trustee to whom a chose in action has been transferred for collection is, in contemplation of law, so far the owner as to be entitled to sue in his own name.

3. Where a purchaser retains the article without any offer to rescind, and does not plead failure of consideration in an action on the purchase-money notes, he cannot set up, as a defense to such action, fraudulent representations by the seller in making the sale.

4. In the absence of a positive statutory provision, exhibits properly identified need not be attached to the depositions in connection with which they are offered in evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeals from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Simeon B. Toby against the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company and the Oregon Development Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Milton Andros and Jas. L. Crittenden, for appellants. Page & Eels, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. There are two separate appeals in this cause by the defendants,—one from the final judgment, and the other from an order denying a motion for a new trial. As they depend to some extent upon the same statement, they will be considered together.

The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage upon the steamer Eastern Oregon, executed at the city of New York by the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation, on the 10th day of February, 1887, to the Florida Steamship Company, to secure the sum of $115,000, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, evidenced by 12 promissory notes of even date with the mortgage, 11 of which were for $10,000 each, and one for $5,000, and all payable 12 months after date. The Oregon Development Company, a corporation, was made a party defendant, upon the averment that it had, or claimed to have, some interest in the steamship, etc. Both the defendants are corporations organized and existing under the laws of the state of Oregon. The steamship in question was purchased for the trade between San Francisco and Southern Oregon, was brought from New York to this coast, and was within the jurisdiction of the courts of this state. The complaint averred the mortgagor defendant to be insolvent, and a receiver was appointed February 17, 1888, who took possession of the steamship, and continued in charge of her until sold, as hereinafter stated, on the 26th day of April, 1890, for the sum of $80,030.

The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, and written findings filed April 11, 1890, in which, upon the facts as found, the court ordered judgment in favor of plaintiff for $115,000 and interest, and a decree of foreclosure and a sale of said steamship, as prayed in the complaint. On the 14th day of April, 1890, plaintiff filed a petition and affidavit showing that the steamship was deteriorating in value; that the expense of her maintenance, repairs, taxes, etc., amounted to about $300 per month, etc.,—and asked that the receiver be authorized to sell her. Such proceedings were thereupon had that the steamship was, by order of the court, sold at public auction on the 26th day of April, 1890, subject to the confirmation of the court. The sale was confirmed by the court April 29, 1890. Thereafter, and on the 22d day of May, 1890, the court entered a decree in the cause, in which, after reciting the filing of its findings and decision; that the court had ordered the receiver to sell the mortgaged property at public auction, pendente lite, to prevent further deterioration in its value, (the same being perishable,) and to pay the expenses and disbursements of said receiver, etc.,—the decree further recites the sale for $80,030; the confirmation thereof; the settlement of the receiver's accounts, leaving a balance of $70,224.62 in his hands. The decree then proceeds to award judgment in favor of plaintiff, and against the mortgagor defendant, for $137,655, (being the amount of the principal of said promissory notes, $115,000, and interest due thereon,) and costs of suit. The decree requires the receiver to pay the plaintiff the amount in his hands, ($70,224.62,) and awards execution in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendant the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company, for the balance remaining unpaid after crediting the judgment as aforesaid.

The first point by appellants, in the appeal from the judgment, is that the court had no jurisdiction or authority to enter a personal judgment for a deficiency until after a sale of the mortgaged property by the sheriff, and a sheriff's return showing a deficiency. This theory proceeds upon the basis that the mode of procedure provided by section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure is exclusive. That section is as follows: "There can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real estate or personal property, which action must be in accordance with the provisions of this chapter. In such action the court may, by its judgment, direct a sale of the incumbered property, * * * and the application of the proceeds of the sale to the payment of the costs of the court, and the expenses of the sale, and the amount due to the plaintiff; and if it appears from the sheriff's return that the proceeds are insufficient, and a balance still remains due, judgment can then be docketed for such balance against the defendant," etc. The contention is that a foreclosure and order of sale are essential to authorize the sheriff to sell, and a sale by him, and a return showing a deficiency, are prerequisite to a personal judgment; that it is the return of the sheriff, showing a deficiency, which operates to crystallize the personal liability of the mortgagor, and to assess the amount for which the court is authorized to decree that a personal judgment may be docketed. A glance at the law, as it existed prior to the adoption of our statutes in relation to mortgages, will tend to make manifest the evils sought to be obviated by those enactments. At common law a mortgage was regarded as a conveyance upon condition, to become absolute upon nonperformance of the condition. Upon such nonperformance the courts of law held the estate to be vested in the mortgagee, and refused to recognize the right of redemption. They conceded the jurisdiction of courts of equity to grant relief from the forfeiture, but that was the extent of the mitigation permitted until the passage of the judicature act of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, §§ 24, 25, which provide that when the rules of law and equity are in conflict those of equity shall prevail in all the courts. In the United States there has been no uniform doctrine in respect to mortgages. A majority of the states adopted the English doctrine. In Delaware, Mississippi, and Missouri the doctrine is that before default the title remains in the mortgagor, but passes to the mortgagee upon his taking possession after default, subject to be defeated upon payment of the debt. Another hardship upon the mortgagor needed a remedy. The mortgagee could bring an action at law to recover the mortgage debt, and although he obtained judgment, and (where permitted so to do by law) imprisoned the mortgagor, it did not, without payment, impair his mortgage. The first of the hardships indicated was remedied by section 744 of our Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "a mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance, whatever its terms, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession of the property without a foreclosure and sale." The right to a personal action to recover a debt secured by a mortgage is inhibited by section 726, Code Civil Proc., hereinbefore quoted. Under that section there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, etc., which must be in accordance with the provisions of that chapter. It further provides that a personal judgment may be entered for a balance remaining due, if the proceeds of the incumbered property shall be insufficient, etc. To confine a recovery in such classes to one action, to make the mortgaged property the primary fund out of which satisfaction is to be had, and to give the plaintiff a personal judgment for such balance as may remain due after the exhaustion of the mortgaged property, are the three essential things provided for.

The contention of appellant that there can be no deficiency judgment without a sale, and formal return by the sheriff, seems to me too technical to give effect to the evident intent of the lawmakers in many cases. Suppose, in the present case, the steamship mortgaged had been lost by perils of the sea, pendente lite. Would the plaintiff have been without remedy? Or can it be claimed that the court would have been forced to the useless expedient of foreclosing the mortgage, ordering a sale, and awaiting the return of the sheriff, before a deficiency judgment could be docketed? Would it not rather be said that the court, having obtained jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, would, under the rules of equity, proceed, under the altered circumstances, and in view of the fact that the security was exhausted, to do justice by the entry of judgment for what would then become the deficiency, viz. the full amount due? Again, suppose the ship had been insured in favor of the plaintiff against the perils of the sea, and lost. Can it be doubted that the insurance money, if paid into court, could be applied to the satisfaction of the mortgage without a judgment over for the balance, if any, due? I think not. It is true the statute provides for docketing a personal judgment for the balance shown to be due by the return of the sheriff. Doubtless this language is used because it is the usual manner by which the application of the primary fund and a deficit remaining are ascertained, but after all it is the existence of these facts which entitles the plaintiff to a personal judgment against the defendant; and where they exist, and can only reasonably be ascertained by other means, they are not to be ignored because made apparent in a different way.

The court was authorized, in a proper case, to appoint a receiver of the mortgaged property. Code Civil Proc. § 564. That the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and was authorized to foreclose the mortgage, will not be disputed. Section 187 of our Code of Civil Procedure provides for cases of this character. It is as follows: "Whenever jurisdiction is, by the constitution or this Code, or by any other statute, conferred on a court or judicial officer, all the means necessary to carry it into effect are also given; and in the exercise of this jurisdiction, if the course of proceeding be not specifically pointed out by this Code or statute, any suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may appear most conformable to the spirit of this Code." The mode of proceeding adopted by the court was a suitable one, under the circumstances. Mawson v. Mawson, 50 Cal. 539.

I am of opinion that a sale of the whole of the mortgaged property under the interlocutory decree of the court, pendente lite, by a receiver, and the application of the proceeds to the extinguishment of the amount found due the plaintiff, were such an ascertainment of the balance as warranted the court in rendering judgment therefor. I have examined Biddel v. Brizzolaro, 64 Cal. 362, 30 Pac. Rep. 609, and Brown v. Willis, 67 Cal. 235, 236, 7 Pac. Rep. 682, and find nothing in them in conflict with the views herein expressed.

It is objected that the decision of the court called for the entry of a decree of foreclosure. Subsequent to the decision, and prior to the entry of the decree, the mortgaged property had been sold by the receiver under order of the court. The decree recites these facts which show the changed conditions, and rendered the decree of foreclosure and order of sale unnecessary. It dealt with the property in its altered form, as money, and decreed that it be applied upon the amount found due. If the court had a right, at that stage of the proceedings, to order that property to be sold as perishable, it certainly possessed the power of applying the proceeds as would have been done by the sheriff had the sale taken place under a final decree.

The second point made by appellant, that "the said judgment is against law," is supported by the same argument made in favor of the first point, and need not receive further elaboration.

The further objection that the judgment is not in accordance with the findings in which the difference is between the decision ordering a decree of foreclosure and sale, and the decree finally entered, has also been referred to. It is also urged that the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment upon the findings, for the reason that the plaintiff, in his complaint, avers that the Florida Steamship Company assigned to him the mortgage and 12 promissory notes, and that he is estopped to prove that he holds the notes or mortgage as a trustee. The allegation of the complaint is "that on the 27th day of January, 1887, the said corporation, the Florida Steamship Company, assigned, transferred, and set over to this plaintiff the said mortgage, and the said promissory notes thereby secured, and this plaintiff is now the holder of said notes and mortgage." Defendant does not deny, in its answer, that the notes and mortgage were assigned to the plaintiff, or that he now holds them. It does aver that he is not a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, and that he holds them for collection, without consideration, and as the agent of said steamship company, which is the real owner thereof, and that the action is prosecuted for the use and benefit of the steamship company. It will be seen that the issue is not as to the fact of the transfer, but the character of it, which defendant attacks. The court finds that the plaintiff is not a bona fide holder, in his own right, or for a valuable consideration, of the notes and mortgage, but that he holds the same for collection, and as the trustee of the real owners, and that the action is being prosecuted by said plaintiff for the use and benefit of the real owners of said notes. The finding then proceeds to set out the real owners of the notes, who are parties other than the mortgagee, and, except the Quintard Iron Works, a copartnership owning two of the $10,000 notes, the owners are found to have taken the notes in the regular course of business, before maturity, and for a valuable consideration, without notice, etc. Now, a trustee to whom a chose in action had been transferred for collection is, in contemplation of law, so far the owner that he may sue on it in his own name. Goodnow v. Litchfield, 63 Iowa, 275, 19 N. W. Rep. 226; Logan v. Cassell, 88 Pa. St. 288; Code Civil Proc. § 369; McPherson v. Weston, 64 Cal. 275, 30 Pac. Rep. 842; Wetmore v. San Francisco, 44 Cal. 294; Poorman v. D. O. Mills & Co., 35 Cal. 118; Wedderspoon v. Rogers, 32 Cal. 569. In such a case the defendant may urge any defense which he could have interposed against the beneficiary, had the suit been brought in his name. That is what the defendant sought to do in the case at bar, by averring the Florida Steamship Company to be the beneficiary, and urging a defense against that company. Proof that such company was the beneficiary, or that other persons occupied that relation, was an element going to the defense, but not touching plaintiff's abstract right to maintain the action in his own name under the pleadings. The legal title to the notes and mortgage was admitted by the pleadings to be in plaintiff, and there is nothing in the findings, or in the fact that it was taken in trust for collection, which impairs the validity of such title, except as against it; and, in plaintiff's hands, defendants could, as before stated, urge any defense good against the beneficiaries. The finding of the court that the notes were transferred by the Florida Steamship Company, at the dates specified, to the several parties designated, was simply another method of traversing the averment of defendant that the Florida Steamship Company was the holder and owner thereof, and that the action was prosecuted for its benefit.

The more serious question under this branch of the case relates to the right of the plaintiff to recover upon the two promissory notes of $10,000 each, held by the Quintard Iron Works. The Quintard Iron Works is a copartnership composed of Nicholas F. Palmer and George W. Quintard, the latter of whom, at the time of the sale of the steamship and execution of the notes in suit, was an officer of the Florida Steamship Company, and made the false and fraudulent representations in regard to the speed, capacity, etc., of the steamship, as found by the court. He stands charged with notice of the misrepresentations, and his copartnership is in no better position. Upon the pleadings and findings, can a recovery be had upon these two notes? There are three methods by which, in cases like the present, a party defrauded may obtain relief: (1) Cancellation or revision, whereby the defrauded party procures an instrument, obligation, or other matter affecting his rights and liabilities to be set aside and annulled, and be restored to his original position; (2) affirmative relief, by an action to recover a pecuniary compensation for the injury sustained by the fraud of the defendant, where no cancellation is necessary as to the basis of such recovery; (3) defensive relief, whereby the fraud is set up by way of defense to defeat an action brought to enforce an apparent obligation or liability. Defendant pleaded an offer, upon discovery of the fraud, to return the steamship, and a demand of the return to it of the notes and mortgage made by it, etc. The finding of the court was against defendant on this issue. There is nothing in the record to indicate that any attempt was made to set up a claim for damages, by way of recoupment, to reduce the amount of the recovery. The whole effort of defendant, so far as this record shows, was directed to a cancellation or rescission of the contract. It had retained the consideration of the notes, viz. the steamship, and, according to the finding, had not offered to reconvey it, and had not "rescinded the notes or mortgage, or the said sale of said steamship," and therefore failed in its defense.

The evidence is not before us on the appeal from the judgment, and there is nothing to show that any specific damage was established, or that defendant sought to amend its pleadings so as to permit such defense. This court, in the absence of such a showing, can only guess how much the defendant was damaged by the fraud of the Florida Steamship Company. In other words, there was no basis whatever established, upon which a reduction can be had. The notes were not void, but voidable, and as defendant elected to retain the consideration, and has not pleaded a failure of consideration, it must be held to pay the notes. Sections 3406-3408, Civil Code, which provide for rescinding written contracts by the judgment of the court in any of the cases mentioned in section 1689, do not authorize a rescission where the party seeking it had not exercised reasonable diligence, as provided in section 1691. The findings support the judgment, and the appeal from such judgment should be affirmed.

Appeal from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial: The point is made that the twelfth finding of the court, to the effect that defendant never, before the commencement of the action, demanded the return of the notes, mortgage, etc., and never offered to reconvey the steamship, etc., is not supported by the evidence, and is contrary thereto. The testimony upon the question solved by this finding was conflicting. T. E. Hagg, the president of the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company, testified that in New York city, in June, July, and August, 1887, he had, as well as before that time he had had, numerous conversations with Quintard, in some of which, soon after the arrival of the steamship at San Francisco, he had called upon the latter (then president of the Florida Company) to take back the steamship, and that later, on learning that Talmadge had become president of the Florida Company, he demanded of him, as president, the return of the notes, and that the steamship be taken back. The reply of Talmadge was that Quintard had charge of the matter. Talmadge was not called on as a witness, and it is claimed by appellant that this testimony is not contradicted. It is true Talmadge was not called as a witness in rebuttal to contradict the statement, but his deposition had been previously taken in New York; and in it he says he became president of the Florida Company in July, 1887, and that he "never heard of any objection to the steamship by Col. Hagg's company until they brought suit against the Florida S. S. Co.;" and again, "I never heard or knew of any proposition to return the ship to the Florida Steamship Company on any terms." This testimony is emphatic, and negatives the statement of the witness Hagg. This witness was contradicted by other witnesses in important particulars relating to the same subject. The steamship had been chartered by the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company, before she left New York, to the Oregon Development Company, and was thence, until taken into possession by the receiver in this action, in the possession of, and under the control of, the last-named company; a fact which may have led the court, in connection with the other evidence, to conclude that no offer of rescission was made. He who would rescind a sale for fraud must act diligently upon discovering such fraud, and must show himself not only willing, but able, to return the property received by him, if any, by virtue of such sale. The evidence is sufficient to support the finding.

The third and fourth points made by appellant relate to five depositions taken by stipulation in New York city. These depositions relate to the indorsement of the several notes by the Florida Company for a valuable consideration, and without notice, to sundry parties, and by the latter to plaintiff for collection. The notes were produced before the referee, and marked for identification from A to L inclusive, by the commissioner. When the depositions were offered in evidence it was objected "that the exhibits which were put in evidence are not annexed to it, [the deposition,] and the commission had not been properly executed." Counsel for respondent replied to the objection by saying: "There is no reason why they should be attached. They are identified." And the court overruled the objection, and admitted the depositions, to which ruling defendants excepted. There was not at the trial any suggestion or objection by appellant that the exhibits were not sufficiently identified. The objection was, as above stated, that they were not attached to the several depositions. Our Code is silent upon this question, and, in the absence of a positive statute, exhibits properly identified need not be attached, and, if proven, may be identified by parol. Dailey v. Green, 15 Pa. St. 118; Weeks, Dep. §§ 527, 358, 194, and cases there cited. The objection that the exhibits were not properly identified is made here for the first time, and cannot be considered.

The objection to the admission in evidence of the certificate of W. L. Criglar is without merit. Criglar was a witness for the defendant, and had testified that he was a mechanical engineer employed by the Oregon Development Company as their port engineer; that he had regulated the quantity of coal taken on the steamship in question during each trip, amount used by her, the kind and character of coal used, etc.—and on cross-examination said: "Cumberland or anthracite is about twenty per cent. better for steaming purposes than Wellington or Sidney." The certificate was identified by the witness as being in his handwriting, and signed by him, directed to his company, and certified as to the quantity of Sidney coal the ship consumed ordinarily in a passage from San Francisco to Baquina, and that "the best quality of Sidney coal is at no time equal, for steaming purposes, to within twenty per cent. of best quality of George's creek Cumberland coal." The certificate was offered while the witness was on the stand, and we may suppose for the purpose of contradicting what he had just said as to the relative value of two kinds of coal. It was competent for that purpose, although there was no material contradiction. The finding on the question involved was in favor of defendant, and, had the admission of the certificate been erroneous, defendant could not have been injured by its admission. The proofs were sufficient to warrant the findings.

The other errors assigned are either unimportant, or are in substance the same as urged upon the appeal from the judgment, and have been noticed elsewhere. Sections 3406, 3408, of the Civil Code, authorizing courts to rescind contracts upon the application of a party aggrieved, give no rights to the parties in cases of this character, not accorded by courts of equity prior to their adoption. It is recommended that the judgment in case No. 14,225, and the order appealed from in case No. 14,979, be affirmed.

the face of such notes on the attorney for the executor of a certain estate; that such attorney accepted the order, reciting in the acceptance that "certain moneys will in the future, in all probability, become due and payable to" defendant out of the income from certain real estate belonging to such estate, and that the order was payable only out of moneys coming from such estate, "and not claimed or affected by attachments or other claims." Held that, though an accord and satisfaction was pleaded, it was not error to exclude such account, order, and acceptance from the evidence, in the absence of any offer to show by other evidence that they were intended or accepted as satisfaction of either of the notes, or that either the account or order had been paid.

Charles F. Hanlon, for appellant. John H. Dickinson, (Henry E. Monroe, of counsel,) for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action on twelve promissory notes,—two for $80 each, eight for $75 each, and two for $60 each. The answer of defendant admits the making of the notes, but alleges that each note "was without good or valid or legal consideration; that the only consideration therefor was an account for the sale and delivery by plaintiff to defendant by retail, or by the drink, of spirituous and malt liquors, wine, and cider; and that the amount of said account exceeded the sum of five dollars, but did not exceed the sum of twenty-five dollars; and that such an account constituted the only consideration for each of said notes." Further answering, the defendant denies that the first four of said notes had not been paid, but alleges that they have been "satisfied and discharged." The court found as follows: "All the allegations of the complaint are true. Each of the promissory notes set forth in said complaint was made to plaintiff by the defendant upon valuable consideration therefor. No part of the consideration for either of said promissory notes was the sale or delivery by plaintiff to the defendant of any liquor, spirituous or malt, or of any wine or cider, and neither one of said promissory notes has been paid, satisfied, or discharged in whole or in part;" and thereupon rendered judgment for the full amount of principal and interest of all the notes. The defendant has appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The appellant contends that the findings of fact are not justified by the evidence. There is no merit in this point. The plaintiff and defendant were the principal witnesses, and their testimony was directly in conflict upon all material issues; and no reason appears why the court should have believed the defendant, rather than the plaintiff.

2. Appellant claims that the court erred in rejecting the following papers offered as evidence for the defendant:

"San Francisco, May 1, 1887. Joseph T. Burns, to James Hogan, Dr. For board, lodging, goods furnished, services rendered, and in full of all claims to date, $200.

"The above is correct. James Hogan.

"I have personally examined all items in the above bill, and find them correct. J. T. Burns."

"Charles F. Hanlon, Esq. Dear Sir: Please pay out of any moneys coming to me out of the estate of J. H. Burns, deceased, after payment of debts, expenses of administration, and claims against the estate, the above bill of two hundred dollars ($200) to James Hogan, and out of moneys coming to me which are not attached or claimed or interfered with by other parties. June 24, 1887. J. T. Burns."

"Whereas, certain moneys will in the future, in all probability, become due and payable to Joseph T. Burns out of the income of certain real estate now belonging to the estate of James H. Burns, deceased, and whereas, it is now difficult to state exactly at what time or when such moneys will be due or paid: Now, therefore, I certify that the foregoing bill of two hundred dollars ($200.00) having been agreed upon as being correct by both James Hogan and J. T. Burns, that I will accept the foregoing order of J. T. Burns to pay such moneys out of said moneys coming to him in the regular way, after paying the expenses of the administration, commissions advanced or paid, and other claims against the estate, and other moneys required by law and the order of court. The acceptance of said order is understood not to be holden against the undersigned personally in any way, shape, or manner, the order being accepted payable out of the moneys coming to J. T. Burns in said J. H. Burns' estate, and not claimed or affected by attachments or other claims. Dated San Francisco, June 24, 1887. Charles F. Hanlon, Attorney for Executor."

The date of the stated account (May 1, 1887) is between the date of the fourth note and that of the fifth, and counsel for appellant contends that the rejected papers tend to prove an accord and satisfaction of the first four notes, which amounted to $270, besides interest. While I think an accord and satisfaction was not pleaded by defendant, (Sweet v. Burdett, 40 Cal. 97; Coles v. Soulsby, 21 Cal. 47,) yet, conceding that they were, there is nothing on the face of the rejected papers tending to prove that they were intended or accepted as satisfaction of any one of the notes; and there was no offer to prove by other evidence any such agreement or understanding, nor any offer to prove that either the stated account or the order on Hanlon had been paid, (Holton v. Noble, 83 Cal. 7, 23 Pac. Rep. 58;) nor is it pretended that any such payment was ever made. Indeed, Mr. Hanlon testified that "there was no money coming to Burns. He is executor of his brother's estate." So that the condition upon which Hanlon accepted the order might never happen, and, if it should, it is not apparent that Hanlon was authorized to pay the money from the estate of James H. Burns, to which he appears to have borne no other relation than that of counsel for the executor. As the papers offered had no apparent tendency to prove either accord and satisfaction or payment, they were properly rejected. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

STOCKTON COMBINED HARVESTER & AGRICULTURAL WORKS v. GLENS FALLS INS. CO. OF NEW YORK. (No. 14,685.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1893.)

INSURANCE—ARBITRATION—MISREPRESENTATIONS —PLEADING—JUDGMENT—APPEAL.

1. A complaint alleging the issue of a fire policy, a loss, the submission of the amount thereof to arbitration, and a promise made after the determination of the arbitrators to pay the amount found by them, states an action on the final agreement.

2. The submission to the arbitrators being merely the amount of the loss, and not a general one of liability, it is necessary to a recovery that an express promise be found.

3. In such case the allegation as to a promise cannot be disregarded, and the action treated as based on the policy.

4. An award made not as the result of the judgment of the arbitrators, but on an agreement between one party and the arbitrators authorized by the other party, is not binding where the consent of a party was obtained by fraudulent means.

5. A policy of insurance on goods manufactured by insured provided that insured be indemnified for actual loss, not exceeding the cost of replacement; and further provided that in case of loss insured would produce for the inspection of insurer its books of account and other vouchers. On demand of insurer the board of directors of insured directed its chief bookkeeper to allow an examination of all its books. He, however, withheld a book containing an estimate of the cost of the destroyed articles, made by him by order of the directors. Held, that this amounted to a representation that there was no such book, and that the insurer, having been induced thereby to agree that arbitrators as to the amount of the loss should make an award of a certain amount, would be released from its agreement.

6. Insured's chief bookkeeper having been acting within the scope of his authority when he withheld the book after being directed by the directors to exhibit all in his possession, insured would be bound by his acts, and it was unnecessary that the directors should have made or known of any concealment.

7. A decree merely disposing of defendant's cross complaint, and not purporting to dispose of all his defenses, is not a final judgment from which an appeal will lie.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. Swinnerton, Judge.

Action by the Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works against the Glens Falls Insurance Company of New York. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Haggin & Van Ness, (Paul W. Bennett and Jas. H. Budd, of counsel,) for appellant. W. L. Dudlen and Baldwin & Campbell, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The complaint in this case alleges, in substance, the issuance of a policy by the defendant insuring plaintiff in an amount not exceeding $2,500 against loss by fire upon certain described property, and that plaintiff had other insurance upon said property and upon other property, all of which insurance aggregated $127,000; that during the term of such insurance the said insured property was greatly damaged and partially destroyed by fire, and immediately after such fire plaintiff, in accordance with the terms of its policies, presented to defendant and all its other insurers, jointly, proofs of its loss, and claim for damages sustained thereby. The complaint further alleges that plaintiff and its insurers were unable to agree upon the amount of plaintiff's damage, "and under and in accordance with the terms and conditions of said policies" the question of the amount of such loss was submitted to the arbitrament of two persons, who, being unable to agree, selected an umpire, as they were authorized to do, and that said arbitrators investigated plaintiff's claim of loss, and decided and reported to plaintiff and its insurers that the amount of plaintiff's loss was $90,000, "and thereupon said loss was adjusted at $90,000, and the said defendant and the said other insurers agreed to pay, and plaintiff herein agreed to accept, said sum of $90,000 in full settlement of said loss." The complaint then alleges that the proportionate amount of that sum to be paid by defendant was $1,859.25, and that defendant promised and agreed to pay the same to plaintiff on or before December 31, 1888, and demands judgment against defendant for that sum and costs. The defendant answered, and also filed what it termed a "cross complaint," in which cross complaint defendant asked, upon grounds which will be hereafter noticed, that the award or decision of the arbitrators should be annulled, and the issues arising upon this cross complaint and plaintiff's answer thereto were tried first; and the court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, denying the prayer of defendant's cross complaint, and thereupon, on December 19, 1890, the other issues in the case being undisposed of, entered a decree to the effect that defendant take nothing by reason of the matters alleged in its cross complaint, "and that the cause proceed to trial upon the complaint and answer thereto." Thereafter the defendant filed an amended answer in which it denied, among other things, the appointment of the umpire named in the complaint; and further denied that any of the arbitrators named in the complaint investigated, determined, or reported the amount of plaintiff's loss to be $90,000, or any other sum; and denied that plaintiff's insurers ever agreed jointly to pay plaintiff $90,000, or any other sum, or that defendant ever agreed to pay plaintiff $1,859.20, or any other sum, as its proportion of plaintiff's loss. The court found all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint to be true, except those relating to the promise of defendant and the other insurers to pay the amount of the award referred to in the complaint, and in relation to this the court found: "(9) That, after said awards were rendered, neither the defendant nor the other insurers ever expressly covenanted, agreed, or promised with the plaintiff, as an adjustment of said loss, to pay to said plaintiff the sum of $90,000, or any other sum;" and "(11) that after said award had been made defendant never expressly promised or agreed to pay to plaintiff $1,859.25, or any other sum." Upon these findings the court, on January 7, 1891, entered a judgment for plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of its complaint. The defendant appeals both from this judgment and the so-called decree of December 19, 1890, denying to defendant the relief demanded in its cross complaint.

1. The judgment cannot be sustained upon the findings. The cause of action stated in the complaint is not upon the policy of insurance issued by defendant to plaintiff, nor upon an award in the nature of a judgment fixing the liability of defendant upon such policy, but is upon an agreement alleged to have been made by defendant with plaintiff after the amount of plaintiff's entire loss had been appraised by arbitrators, and by which agreement it is alleged that defendant promised to pay to plaintiff a certain proportionate share of such appraised loss. Saville v. Insurance Co., 8 Mont. 419, 20 Pac. Rep. 646; Wagner v. Insurance Co., 143 Pa. St. 338, 22 Atl. Rep. 885. The finding of the court that such alleged agreement was never made is fatal to the judgment upon this appeal. The distinction between the cause of action stated in this complaint and one upon a policy of insurance, or an action upon an award fixing the liability of an insurer thereon, is marked and important, not only by reason of the difference in the facts required to be shown in order to maintain the different actions, but also because of the fact that in an action like this the defendant is cut off from defenses which might be interposed to an action upon the policy. "Where an insurance company, after the loss, has adjusted the claim therefor, and has agreed to pay a certain sum in liquidation of the claim, it cannot, in an action setting forth such facts, object that the action was not brought within the time limited in the policy. In such a case the action is not upon the policy, but upon the agreement to pay. Neither, in such a case, can it set up a breach of warranty, or of any of the conditions of the policy in defense, for adjusting the loss and promising to pay it is a waiver of all breaches on the part of the assured, and of all defenses which might have been made, except for such waiver." 2 Wood, Ins. § 450; Smith v. Insurance Co., 62 N. Y. 85; Saville v. Insurance Co., 8 Mont. 419, 20 Pac. Rep. 646; Stache v. Insurance Co., 49 Wis. 89, 5 N. W. Rep. 36; Wagner v. Insurance Co., 143 Pa. St. 338, 22 Atl. Rep. 885.

The plaintiff claims, however, that it was not necessary for the court to find an express promise on the part of defendant to pay the award referred to in the complaint, because such promise is implied as a matter of law; but this is only true in the case of an award following a general submission of some controversy. In an action upon such an award, which is in the nature of an adjudication of the rights and liabilities of the parties thereto, it is not necessary to allege or prove that the defendant expressly promised to perform the award, for the law implies the promise to perform from the fact of such general submission. Robinson v. Templar Lodge, (Cal.) 31 Pac. Rep. 609; Valentine v. Valentine, 2 Barb. Ch. 430. But this is not such a case. The complaint does not allege any such general submission for the purpose of determining the liability of defendant upon the policy issued by it, nor does the court find the fact of any such submission or award. On the contrary, the complaint alleges that the matter submitted to the arbitrators was the question of the amount of the loss sustained by plaintiff, and the court so finds. In addition to this, the record shows that in the submission itself there was an express provision to the effect that the appraisal or award to be made thereunder should not operate or be taken as a waiver by the insurance companies, or any of them, of any provision or condition of their policies. An award in pursuance of such submission does not fix the liability of the insurer to pay under a policy, but only determines the amount to be paid in the event that there is any liability at all; and no action can be maintained upon an award of this character standing alone. Soars v. Insurance Co., 140 Mass. 343, 5 N. E. Rep. 149; Whipple v. Insurance Co., 11 R. I. 139; 2 Wood, Ins. § 450. After an award of this nature has been made, and the insurer has expressly promised to pay it, the insured may maintain an action either upon the policy, alleging the fact of the award for the purpose of fixing the amount of the recovery, or he may sue upon the new or subsequent agreement to pay it, in which latter case the fact of the agreement is material, and must be proven. It is urged, however, in one of the briefs filed in behalf of plaintiff, that this action can be treated, not only as based upon the award, but "also upon the policy, so far as the policy forms the foundation and basis of the award." The argument is, in effect, that the allegation of the complaint regarding defendant's express promise to pay its proportion of the award may be disregarded, and in that event the finding of the court that such agreement was not made would not be material. But we are not at liberty to construe the complaint as if this allegation did not appear therein. The matter alleged is not superfluous, and without any relation to other parts of the complaint, but it is material, giving precision to the cause of action alleged, and showing that the complaint states a cause of action upon the new agreement, and not upon the policy.

2. The real question in the case, and which may become important upon another trial, if the complaint should be so amended as to state a cause of action upon the policy of insurance, and the evidence should be in accordance with the special findings contained in this record, relates to the binding force of the award given by the arbitrators selected to appraise the amount of plaintiff's loss. The defendant alleges in its cross complaint that this award was not the result of the judgment of the arbitrators, but was based solely upon the consent or agreement of the insurance company to the effect that the arbitrators might fix the amount of plaintiff's loss, as stated in such award, without any examination, and without the exercise of any judgment of their own. The defendant further alleges that such consent was obtained by reason of plaintiff's fraudulent concealment of certain books and inventories in its possession, and which would have shown the amount of its loss to have been much less than the sum fixed in the award. The submission to arbitration grew out of the fact that plaintiff and the insurance companies were unable to agree upon the amount of damage sustained by plaintiff, and undoubtedly contemplated that the award when made should be the result of the honest judgment of the arbitrators, after a full examination and investigation of the matters upon which the award was to be made, and after due consideration of all the proofs which should be submitted to them by the parties to the submission. The court does find that after such submission the arbitrators proceeded to make such investigation, and made their decision and award under oath, as required by the terms of the submission; but the court also made special findings in conflict with this general finding, and to the effect that the arbitrators did not hear the proofs or appoint any time for the parties to be heard in relation to the matters submitted, and that in making the award they did not exercise any independent judgment of their own, and that the award was made under an agreement between the insurance companies and one of the arbitrators, who represented that he had authority to act for the plaintiff in the matter, and by which agreement the loss of plaintiff was fixed at $30,000, and the arbitrators were authorized to render an award for that amount. If the facts are as stated in these specific findings, it is clear that the award can have no greater force than the agreement upon which it is based; and, if the consent of defendant and the other insurers to such agreement was not fairly obtained, then the award is not binding upon defendant.

The policy issued by defendant was upon a stock of agricultural implements manufactured and in process of construction by plaintiff, and the agreement of defendant was to make good to plaintiff such immediate damage to the property insured as might be caused by fire, the loss or damage to be estimated according to the actual cash value of the property, not exceeding the cost of replacement; and it was further agreed that in case of loss the plaintiff would, if required, produce and exhibit for examination by defendant its books of accounts and other vouchers. It will be easily perceived that this provision of the policy in relation to the production of books and vouchers was one of very great importance to the defendant, and was intended to aid the defendant in ascertaining the cost or value of the property insured in case of its destruction by fire; and the court below found that after the plaintiff had made its claim for the loss alleged to have been sustained by it the defendant and the other insurance companies "requested an inspection of the books of the corporation plaintiff, for the alleged and avowed purpose of ascertaining the amount of plaintiff's loss and damage by said fire;" and thereupon one Shippee, a director of plaintiff, who had been appointed as its agent to effect a settlement of plaintiff's loss with defendant and the other insurance companies, gave directions to one Palmer, the principal bookkeeper of plaintiff, and in charge of its business office and books of account, to permit the defendant and other insurers to examine all books of plaintiff. In accordance with this direction, certain books were produced by Palmer for the inspection of defendant and the other insurers, but none of them showed the cost of construction or value of the property destroyed. Upon being informed of this fact, Shippee stated to defendant and the other insurance companies that neither he nor any of plaintiff's officers knew of any books showing the cost of construction, or had ever been able to ascertain the cost of construction, of the property insured. This statement was made before the submission to arbitration, but was substantially repeated to the arbitrators at the time of their selection,—that is, they were informed in the presence of Shippee that such statement had been made by Shippee, and that they must look elsewhere than to plaintiff for information as to the cost of constructing the property insured; and the court finds that "Shippee did not, nor did any of the officers of said plaintiff, know the cost of construction or value of said implements, * * * nor did they, or any of them, know of the existence of any books showing such cost of construction or value," and that such representations were not falsely or fraudulently made for the purpose of defrauding or deceiving defendant or any of the other insurers. But in this connection the court below also found that prior to the destruction of plaintiff's property by fire, Palmer, by direction of plaintiff's board of directors, had caused to be prepared inventories of the amount of material in the various harvester machines destroyed by fire, and had caused "estimates of the cost of said machines to be made, all for the purpose of informing the directors of plaintiff of the cost of construction of said machines; and the said estimates, as aforesaid, had been written out in the books of plaintiff, * * * and said books containing said estimates were in said office, and in the care and custody of said Palmer, at the time that he was directed to show to the defendant and plaintiff's other insurers all the books as aforesaid;" and that Palmer had also, prior to the fire, caused to be made and recorded in the books of plaintiff inventories purporting to show the value of plaintiff's stock on hand, and the said books were in the office of plaintiff in the custody of Palmer when he was directed to show to defendant and the other insurers the books of plaintiff, but that "said Palmer did not exhibit or produce for the examination and inspection of the defendant, or any of the said other insurers, any of the books containing the estimates of the cost of construction or inventories purporting to show values as aforesaid, but expressly and intentionally withheld the same from their inspection and examination, for the purpose and with the intention that they should not see that the cost of construction and value of the said machines above mentioned, as shown by said books, was less than the cost of construction and value of the same as stated in the claim of loss by plaintiff presented to defendant, as hereinbefore found." The court below also found that defendant and the other insurers consented that the arbitrators might find the amount of plaintiff's loss to be $90,000, "because of the absence of any book or books of account kept by plaintiff showing the cost of construction or value, and the previous inability of the arbitrators * * * to agree upon an umpire, and of the inability of the insurance companies to establish a less amount than $90,000 as the loss, and rather than go to a lawsuit, and acting upon the statements theretofore made to them that there were no books showing cost of construction or value;" and "that, if defendant and plaintiff's other insurers had known of the books in the possession of plaintiff showing cost of construction and value," they would not have given such consent. We think also the findings show that the actual value of the property destroyed and which was insured by defendant was very much less than the amount fixed by the award.

It would seem very clear from these facts that the conduct of Palmer in concealing from defendant the books and inventories referred to, and which conduct was the same in effect as a representation that there were no such books and inventories in existence, was a substantial inducement to the action of defendant in waiving its right to have an appraisal of plaintiff's loss in accordance with the terms of its policy, and in consenting that such loss might be fixed at $90,000, without any examination or exercise of judgment upon the part of the arbitrators. In determining whether fraudulent representations or concealments are material to the contract sought to be avoided therefor, the supreme court of Maryland, in the case of McAleer v. Horsey, 35 Md. 439, says: "No better rule can be given for deciding the question than this: If the fraud be such that, had it not been practiced, the contract could not have been made, or the transaction completed, then it is material to it; but if it be shown or made probable that the same thing would have been done in the same way if the fraud had not been practiced, it cannot be deemed material." This same rule is also embodied in section 1569 of the Civil Code of this state. Nor is it necessary, in order to avoid a contract for false representations, that such representations should have been the sole inducement to the contract. Others may have concurred, and yet the party upon whom the deceit was practiced be entitled to relief. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.) § 890; Addington v. Allen, 11 Wend. 375; Reynell v. Sprye, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 660; Safford v. Grout, 120 Mass. 20; James v. Hodsden, 47 Vt. 127; Bigelow, Frauds, p. 6. The facts as found by the court below stated, and hereinbefore stated, bring this case squarely within the rule of the foregoing cases, and entitle the defendant to be released from its consent to the formal award if plaintiff is affected by the fraudulent conduct of Palmer. The plaintiff insists that the fraudulent concealment of which defendant complains was the unauthorized and willful act of Palmer alone, and in violation of the instructions given him by plaintiff in the matter of exhibiting its books, and that for this reason the plaintiff should not be held responsible for such concealment. In support of this contention cases are cited to the effect that where the acts of an agent are willful, and beyond the scope or limit of his employment, the principal is not bound thereby; but this case does not fall within the principle thus invoked. Palmer was the agent and representative of plaintiff. He was plaintiff's chief bookkeeper, in charge of its office and books, and was the person to whom defendant was referred by plaintiff when a demand was made for an inspection of the books. The plaintiff could only act in the matter through the agency of some living person, and Palmer was the person selected for that purpose, and in all that he did or omitted to do in the matter thus referred to him he was acting within the scope of his employment; and the plaintiff, as his principal, is bound by his acts and omissions in the performance of the duty intrusted to him, notwithstanding he may have disobeyed the instructions which he received. Story, Ag. p. 452; Mechem, Ag. § 743; Wolfe v. Pugh, 101 Ind. 293. And most certainly the plaintiff cannot be permitted to derive any advantage from the fraud of its agent in the manner of transacting its business, upon the claim that such conduct was not authorized by it. Bennett v. Judson, 21 N. Y. 239; Mechem, Ag. § 148. The finding of the court below, therefore, that Shippee and the other directors of plaintiff were innocent of any personal participation in the fraud of Palmer, and did not themselves make any representations or concealments with intent to deceive and defraud defendant and the other insurers, is immaterial, and does not give to plaintiff the right to enforce an agreement which the court finds would not have been made but for the fraud of Palmer.

It is lastly claimed by plaintiff that the books and inventories concealed were only the estimates of Palmer, and were incorrect, and had never been approved by plaintiff, and that for this reason the defendant was not injured by their nonproduction. The court below found "that the estimates of the cost of construction of the said machines as entered in said books did not include an allowance for interest upon investment in the plant of plaintiff, nor for salaries paid to its superintendent and other principal employes, nor for power, wastage, or tools, but did include an allowance of 10 per cent. over and above estimated cost, intended to cover the wear and tear upon the plant of plaintiff." It is not material to the question under consideration to determine whether any or all of the matters referred to in this finding would properly enter into the cost of the construction of the property destroyed, although it is plain that some of them would not. It is sufficient to say that the estimate of such cost was made by the person selected by the plaintiff for that purpose, and the court finds that such estimate was made pursuant to the directions of its directors, and was entered in the books of plaintiff, and kept and retained by it in its business office. This being so, it was the duty of the plaintiff to exhibit the books containing such inventories and estimates, when requested by defendant, and it could then have accompanied the same with such explanation as it deemed necessary in regard to the method adopted in arriving at such estimated cost, and it would then have been a matter for the consideration of the parties whether or not such estimate was based upon all the items of cost which should have been included therein. The books would have afforded some information to the defendant, and to that information it was entitled, not only under the terms of the policy issued by it, but also upon the plainest principles of right and fair dealing; and the plaintiff cannot be permitted to enforce an agreement which the court found would never have been made but for the fraud of plaintiff's agent in withholding such information from the defendant,—an agreement by which, under the findings of the court, as we construe them, the defendant agreed to pay more than the value of the property destroyed.

3. The judgment or decree of December 19, 1890, denying to defendant the relief demanded in what is termed its "cross complaint," was not a final judgment, and the attempted separate appeal therefrom must be dismissed. There can be but one final judgment in an action, and that is one which in effect ends the suit in the court in which it is entered, and finally determines the rights of the parties in relation to the matter in controversy. Elliott, App. Proc. §§ 90, 91; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Locke, 107 Ind. 9, 7 N. E. Rep. 579. This the decree of December 19, 1890, did not attempt to do, but only purported to dispose of one of the defenses to the action. Such a judgment is, to say the least, irregular; but, as it is merged in the final judgment, the reversal of the latter will also operate to vacate the former. The appeal from the so-called decree of December 19, 1890, is dismissed, and the appeal from the final judgment in the action entered on January 7, 1891, will be reversed. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO
v. KIERNAN et al. (No. 15,014.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1893.)

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—WIDENING STREETS —STATUTES—TITLE OF—REPEAL—EVIDENCE.

1. Act April 25, 1863, (St. 560,) authorizes the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to widen streets, and to provide compensation for land taken by agreement with the owner, but does not authorize condemnation proceedings. Act April 4, 1864, substantially covered the provisions of the 1863 act, and, in addition, provided for condemnation proceedings. Section 21 expressly declared that "this act shall not be construed to repeal" the act of 1863. Held, that neither the passage of the 1864 act, nor its subsequent repeal, affected the operation of Act 1863.

2. Act April 25, 1863, providing for widening streets, being "An act to confer further powers on the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco," is amendatory of the consolidation act, and hence is not repealed by Pol. Code, § 4372, providing for condemnation of private property for city use, as section 19 of that Code provides that "nothing in either of the four Codes affects any of the provisions of the following statutes: * * * (2) All acts consolidating cities and counties, and acts amendatory, or supplementing such acts."

3. Act March 6, 1883, (St. 32,) being an act merely to provide for the "improvement of streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places, and sidewalks, and the construction of sewers within municipalities," and not providing for extending or widening any street, nor for the acquisition of land for such purpose, does not conflict with, or repeal by implication, Act April 25, 1863, which authorizes the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to widen streets, and provide for the payment of land acquired for such purpose.

4. Act April 25, 1863, authorizing the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to widen any street, provides that, before the board proceed to exercise any power thereby conferred, "30 days notice shall be given of any application which may be made for the passage of any order." Held that, where an application to widen a certain street was made to the board in June, 1887, and a second application for the same purpose was made on October 31st following, and the 30-days notice was given on the second application alone, the action on the second application was a commencement of the proceedings, within the meaning of Act March 6, 1889, § 24, providing that any work or improvement commenced within 18 months before its passage may be continued under this act.

5. Act March 6, 1889, § 24, provides that "the proceedings in any work or improvement, such as is provided for in this act, already commenced and now progressing under any other act * * * may from any stage of such proceedings * * * be continued under this act, by resolution" declaring "an election or intention to have said work or improvement cease under such other act * * * and continue under this." Held, that it was not necessary to, immediately on the passage of the act, declare the intention of proceeding thereunder, but discretion might be used in determining the stage at which the change should be made.

6. Act March 6, 1889, is entitled "An act to provide for laying out, opening, extending, widening * * * any street * * * in municipalities, and to condemn and acquire any and all land and property necessary or convenient for that purpose." Held, that the subject of section 24, providing that "the proceedings in any work or improvement, such as is provided for in this act, already commenced and now progressing under any other act * * * may from any stage of such proceedings * * * be continued under this act," is sufficiently expressed in the title to render the same valid.

7. Act April 25, 1863, authorized the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to widen streets, and to provide compensation to owners of land taken or damaged, but did not authorize condemnation of land for that purpose. Held, that after the board had, by proper proceedings, determined to widen a street, it could acquire the land therefor by condemnation pursuant to Code Civil

Proc. § 1238, providing that the "right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following public uses: * * * (3) roads, streets, and alleys, * * * but the mode of apportioning and collecting the costs of such improvements shall be such as may be provided in the statutes by which the same may be authorized."

8. In an action by a city to condemn land for a street, and to determine the damages to the landowners, evidence that the assessment of other property for the expense of the improvement was irregular is inadmissible.

9. Act March 6, 1889, § 18, providing that "the complaint [in an action to condemn] may aver that it is necessary for the city to take or damage and condemn the said land, * * * without setting forth the proceedings herein provided for," is constitutional.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the city and county of San Francisco against Annie Kiernan and others. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry E. Highton, for appellants. John H. Durst, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to condemn land for the purpose of widening Mission street, in the city and county of San Francisco, in which judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff. Six of the nine defendants have appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The action was commenced April 1, 1890, and the complaint conforms to the act of March 6, 1889, entitled "An act to provide for laying out, opening, extending, widening * * * any street * * * within municipalities, and to condemn and acquire any and all land and property necessary or convenient for that purpose." St. 1889, p. 70. But the order of the board of supervisors for the widening of Mission street, on which the proceeding to condemn is alleged to depend, was made on April 7, 1883, pursuant to a previous resolution of the board, passed November 14, 1887, declaring the intention of the board to make such order according to the provisions of "An act to confer further powers upon the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco," approved April 25, 1863, (St. 1863, p. 560.)

1. The principal point made by counsel for appellants is that the act of April 25, 1863, had been superseded and wholly repealed before the board declared its intention to widen Mission street; that there was no other law in force, during these proceedings, authorizing the board to widen a street, until the passage of the aforesaid act of March 6, 1889; and, therefore, that the order to widen Mission street was without authority, and void.

First, it is claimed that the act of April 25, 1863, was impliedly repealed by the act of April 4, 1864, (St. 1863-64, p. 347,) which was itself repealed by the act of March 30, 1868, (St. 1867-68, p. 555.) It is to be observed that while the act of April 25, 1863, authorized the board to widen streets, and to provide compensation to owners of land taken or damaged, it did not authorize the condemnation of land for that purpose. The act of April 4, 1864, substantially covered all the ground occupied by the act of April 25, 1863, and, in addition thereto, authorized the condemnation of land, and provided the mode of making compensation therefor; but by section 21 it expressly declared: "This act shall not be construed to repeal an act to confer further powers upon the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, passed April 25, 1863, but the provisions of that act shall be held not to apply to the proceedings provided for in this act." I think the effect of this section was to leave the act of April 25, 1863, in force, and available for the purpose of providing compensation, and acquiring the necessary land by agreement with the owners. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 248, and authorities there cited.

Second, it is claimed that the act of April 25, 1863, was repealed by section 4,372¹ of the Political Code. Section 19 of that Code, however, declares: "Nothing in either of the four Codes affects any of the provisions of the following statutes, but such statutes are recognized as continuing in force notwithstanding the provisions of the Codes, except so far as they have been repealed or affected by subsequent laws. 2. All acts consolidating cities and counties, and acts amendatory or supplementing such acts." The act of April 25, 1863, being "An act to confer further powers upon the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco," must be regarded as an act amendatory of the consolidation act, and consequently not repealed by any provision of the Political Code. In Ex parte Simpson, 47 Cal. 127, it was held that title 3, pt. 4, of the Political Code, in which the foregoing section is found, was intended as a system or plan under which cities might be organized and governed, and that it is not applicable to any existing city and county. See, also, County of Merced v. Regents of University, 66 Cal. 25, 4 Pac. Rep. 780.

Third, it is contended that the act of 1863 is repealed by section 14, art. 1, of the constitution. This point, however, is grounded on the unwarrantable assumptions that the act of 1863 provides for condemnation of land, and that this action is to condemn by authority of that act, whereas nothing in this action depends upon the act of 1863, except the authority of the board of supervisors to order the widening of Mission street. In this action the defendants were not deprived of any right or privilege guaranteed by section 14, art. 1, of the constitution.

Fourth, it is claimed that the act of 1863 is repugnant to the original section 19 of article 11 of the constitution of 1879, which prohibited public work or improvement upon the streets of a city, the expense of which was to be specially assessed upon private property, unless an estimate of such expense be made and levied, collected, and paid into the city treasury, "before such work or improvement shall be commenced or any contract for letting or doing the same authorized or performed." It is not perceived that the act of 1863 authorized any act prohibited by this section of the constitution. Nor does it appear that any such prohibited act was done, in the matter of widening Mission street. The order to widen, the estimates, the assessment and the collection, authorized by the act of 1863, and actually made or attempted, in the case of Mission street, seem to have been in strict accord with section 19 of article 11 of the constitution, as originally adopted. As that section was amended in 1884, the original section has no application to this case, unless the original adoption of it repealed the act of April 25, 1863, by implication.

Fifth, counsel for appellants contends that the act of 1863 was repealed by the act of March 6, 1883, (St. 1883, p. 32,) because inconsistent with the first section of the latter act, which is as follows: "No public work or improvement of any description whatsoever shall be done or made within any municipality organized and existing for municipal purposes, or hereafter organized in, upon or about the streets thereof, the cost or expense of which is made chargeable or may be assessed upon private property by special assessment, except as in this act provided." The act of 1883 is entitled "An act to provide for the improvement of streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places and sidewalks, and the construction of sewers within municipalities." The second section authorizes the city council "to order the whole or any portion of the streets, sidewalks, lanes, alleys, courts, or places of any such city graded or regraded to the official grade, planked or replanked, paved or repaved, macadamized or remacadamized, graveled or regraveled, piled or repiled, capped or recapped, and to order sidewalks, sewers, manholes, culverts, curbing and crosswalks to be constructed therein, and to order any other work to be done which shall be necessary to make and complete the whole or any portion of said streets, sidewalks, lanes, alleys, courts or places," but does not authorize the city council to open, extend, widen, or close any street, nor does it authorize the acquisition of land for these purposes by any method, and consequently does not authorize assessments to pay for such lands, or for any other purpose than to pay for the work and improvements authorized by the second section. It therefore follows that the act of 1883 is not inconsistent with the act of 1863, in so far as the latter act authorized the board of supervisors to widen streets, and to provide the means of payment for such lands as it might be necessary to acquire for that purpose. The act of 1883, neither expressly nor by implication, prohibits the widening of streets, nor any act necessarily implied or involved therein; and the acquisition and payment for the requisite land are necessarily involved in the widening of a street. No work or improvement, in the sense of the act of 1883, could be done or made on the addition to the street made by the widening, until after the widening. All the work and improvements authorized by the act of 1883 are to be done upon existing streets. Work and improvements upon existing streets constitute the whole subject-matter of the act, and therefore the prohibition in the first section cannot extend to the subject of creating, or partially creating, streets. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 256; Knowles v. Muscatine, 20 Iowa, 248. In this connection it should be observed that heretofore it seems to have been the policy of the legislature to provide for improvements upon existing streets by acts entirely distinct from acts providing for opening, extending, and widening streets. Examples of the former are the acts of 1856, (page 156,) of April, 1872, (page 804,) of March 6, 1883, (page 35,) and of March 18, 1885, (page 147,) amended in 1889 and 1891. Examples of the latter are the acts of April 25, 1863, (page 560,) of 1889, (page 70,) and numerous other more special acts.

Sixth, and finally, it is claimed that the act of 1863 was repealed by the act of March 6, 1889, (page 70.) This is answered by section 24 of the act of 1889, as follows: "The proceedings in any work or improvement, such as is provided for in this act, already commenced and now progressing under any other act now in force, or by virtue of any ordinance passed by any city council or board of supervisors of any city, county, or city and county, by virtue of any other act now in force, may, from any stage of such proceedings already commenced and now progressing, be continued under this act by resolution of the city council. The said work or improvement may then be conducted under the provisions of this act with full force and effect in all respects, from the stage of such proceedings under such other acts or ordinances at and from which such resolution shall declare an election or intention to have said work or improvement cease under such other act or ordinance and continue under this act; and from such election so made, all proceedings theretofore had under such other act or ordinance are hereby ratified, confirmed, and made valid, and it shall be unnecessary to renew or conduct over again proceedings had under such other act or ordinance. This section shall not apply to any work or improvement proceedings in which were commenced more than eighteen months prior to the passage of this act." On May 10, 1889, the board of supervisors, in accordance with section 24 of the act of 1889, passed a resolution electing to continue the proceeding to widen Mission street, under the act of 1889, from and after the filing of the report of the commissioners who had theretofore been appointed and acting under the act of April 25, 1863. The report of the commissioners was filed June 15, 1889, from and after which date the proceedings were conducted under the act of 1889. It is claimed by appellants that section 24 of the act of 1889 has no proper application to this case, because, it is said, the proceeding to widen Mission street was commenced more than 18 months before the passage of the act of 1889. This point raises the single question as to when the proceeding under the act of 1863 was commenced. The act of 1863 provides that, before the board proceed to execute any power thereby vested in them, "thirty days notice shall be given of any application which may be made for the passage of any order." It appears that only two applications were made for the widening of Mission street,—the first, on June 20, 1887, by 20 property owners; and the second, by 9 additional property owners, made October 31, 1887, and within 18 months before the passage of the act of 1889. It would appear by the second application that, for some reason not disclosed by the record, the board had not acted on the first, and the record shows no action by the board until after the filing of the second, to wit, November 14, 1887, when the board ordered the publication of the 30-days notice required by the act of 1863. This order of publication of notice was the first action of the board in regard to the widening of Mission street, and I think it was the commencement of the proceeding, in the sense of section 24 of the act of 1889. The act of 1863 does not require the board to act upon the first, or upon any particular, application, but does require 30 days' notice of the application on which the board proposes to act, before it proceeds to execute any power conferred by that act.

Again, counsel for appellants contend that, in order to continue the proceeding under the act of 1889, the board must have elected and resolved to do so immediately after the passage of this act, and was not at liberty to continue the proceeding from that stage thereof at which the commissioners, under the act of 1863, filed their report on June 15, 1889. I think a careful reading of section 24 will be convincing that the proceeding was properly connected with, and continued under, the act of 1889. The language of the section is, "from the stage of such proceedings * * * at and from which such resolution [of the board] shall declare an election or intention to have said work or improvement cease under such other act or ordinance, and continue under this act." This clearly implies the discretion of the board to elect a stage of the proceeding after the passage of the act of 1889. The resolution of the board declared that the proceeding under the act of 1863 should cease at the stage thereof at which the report of the commissioners should be filed, and thence be continued under the act of 1889.

It is further claimed that the part of section 24 of the act of 1889 which purports to validate former proceedings is unconstitutional, because this subject or purpose is not expressed in the title of the act. I do not think it necessary, for the purpose of sustaining the judgment in this case, that any former proceeding therein should have been ratified or validated by the act of 1889, for the reason that, so far as relates to the action to condemn the lands of the appellants, all the essential proceedings affecting appellants appear to have been valid and regular, as will more fully appear hereafter. Nevertheless, I think the subject of validating irregular proceedings to acquire land for the purpose of widening streets in municipalities is sufficiently expressed in the title of the act. The act is entitled "An act to provide for laying out, opening, extending, widening * * * any street * * * in municipalities, and to condemn and acquire any and all land and property necessary or convenient for that purpose." Surely, the ratification of proceedings to widen streets, and to condemn land for that purpose, is embraced in the subjects expressed in the title of the act, and directly operates as means to promote the objects of the act expressed in the title. Davies v. City of Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 43, 24 Pac. Rep. 771.

2. If the foregoing views are correct, it is unnecessary to inquire whether the board of supervisors was authorized by any other act of the legislature than that of April 25, 1863, to widen streets, and to provide means for the payment of all expenses of the improvement. After the respondent had, by proper proceedings thereunder, determined to widen Mission street, it was competent for it, under the principles laid down in City of Santa Cruz v. Enright, 95 Cal. 105, 30 Pac. Rep. 197, to acquire by condemnation the lands of the appellants in the manner prescribed in the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1238 of that Code provides that the right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following public uses: "* * * 3. Roads, streets and alleys * * * but the mode of apportioning and collecting the costs of such improvements shall be such as may be provided in the statutes by which the same may be authorized."

3. Numerous objections were made by counsel for appellants on the ground of defects and irregularities in the proceedings taken to assess property for the costs and expenses of the improvement, which were overruled by the court below, and the rulings upon such objections are here assigned as errors. The most that could have been properly claimed was that evidence of those proceedings to assess property was totally irrelevant to any issue in this action to condemn appellants' lands which were not assessed. There is neither allegation nor evidence that any property of the appellants was assessed, and whether the property of others was lawfully assessed or not had no possible bearing or effect upon any material issue in this action. The verdict of the jury, according to a form stipulated by the parties, found (1) generally, for the plaintiff; (2) specially, the value of the property of each defendant sought to be condemned; and (3) the damage which will accrue to the portion not sought to be condemned by reason of its severance from the portion condemned, and by the construction of the improvement. There is no exception to the verdict on the ground that it is not justified by the evidence. The court first rendered an interlocutory judgment, requiring the plaintiff, within 30 days, to pay to each defendant, or to the clerk of the court for his use, the sums of money awarded to him by the jury for the value of his land condemned, and for damages to his land not condemned. After plaintiff's compliance with the interlocutory order, by paying into court the money awarded to each defendant, the court rendered final judgment of condemnation. Whether the money thus tendered and paid into court for their use had been obtained by plaintiff through regular or irregular assessments on the property of others, did not concern the appellants, nor affect the right of the plaintiff to condemn their lands which had not been assessed. The proceedings to assess, and to enforce the payment of assessments, are entirely distinct from actions to condemn land. There is no pretense that the money tendered was not the property of the plaintiff, nor that it did not amount to just compensation. Therefore the rights of the appellants in this action could not have been prejudiced by defects in proceedings to assess the property of others.

4. Section 18 of the act of 1889 provides that "the complaint [in an action to condemn] may aver that it is necessary for the city to take or damage and condemn the said lands, or an easement therein, as the case may be, without setting forth the proceedings herein provided for, and the resolution and ordinance ordering said work to be done shall be conclusive evidence of such necessity." It is contended that this provision is unconstitutional, both as to the form of the complaint, and as to the conclusiveness of the evidence. As to the form of the complaint, in an action merely to condemn, I think the provision unobjectionable. Whether such a complaint, in an action to enforce an assessment, would be subject to the objection here made, is a question not involved in this action. Nor does the record on this appeal raise any question as to whether the resolution or ordinance of the board is conclusive evidence of the necessity for taking or damaging appellants' lands, since it does not appear that any evidence upon this issue was offered by appellants, or rejected by the court; and, since it is not claimed nor specified that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict in any particular, it cannot be presumed that the bill of exceptions contains the evidence applicable to this issue.

5. It is contended that the court erred in excluding proffered evidence of damage to the business of three of the appellants,—Reilly, Matthai, and Collins,—which had already accrued, and which would still further accrue, “by reason of said proposed widening;” it appearing that Reilly kept a saloon, Matthai, a blacksmith shop, and Collins, a bakery, “on the line of the proposed improvement.” The offer to prove such damage was as general as above stated. It did not specify the nature of the alleged damages. Nor does it appear that such business was done on the land taken, or on the land damaged, for which compensation was awarded by the jury. The general rule is that, in actions to condemn land for public use, no damages can be allowed for injury to business caused merely by the improvement, and not by the taking of property. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 487. If there is any exception to this general rule, it must depend upon the specific nature of the injury, which should have been stated, in order to enable the court to determine whether it was within the exception. All that was stated was that the damage was such as had accrued, and would accrue, to particular kinds of business carried on somewhere on the line of the improvement, not by reason of the taking of appellants' lands, but “by reason of the said proposed widening.” To say the least, the record does not show that the proffered testimony was competent, and therefore does not show that the court erred in excluding it. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

GRAY v. GALPIN et al. (No. 15,028.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 10, 1893.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE.

1. The mere fact that the person to whom an assignee of a mortgage assigned it was the father of the mortgagee is no evidence that he was not a bona fide purchaser, but was participating in a fraud, by which the property should be gotten out of the reach of the mortgagee's creditors.

2. The father paid his assignor for the mortgage a certain amount in cash, giving his notes for the balance. To raise the money, he gave a mortgage on his homestead. When this became due, he was unable to pay it, for the reason that the notes and mortgage assigned him had not been paid. Held, that the fact that the father's assignor paid the mortgage on the homestead, and took an assignment thereof to himself, was not evidence that the assignment of the other mortgage to the father had been fraudulent.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco. John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Sheldon Gray against Philip G. Galpin, executor of Helen F. Gleason, deceased, and others, to foreclose a chattel mortgage. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

P. Reddy and W. H. Metson, for appellant. W. E. Zeigler, J. B. Casserly, and H. Eickhoff, (Philip G. Galpin, of counsel,) for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to foreclose a chattel mortgage on the furniture of a lodging house in the city of San Francisco. On the 19th of May, 1886, Mrs. Laura Brotherton was the owner of the property, and on that day sold it to Helen F. Gleason for the sum of $5,500, $2,500 of which was paid in cash, and the balance in three promissory notes for $1,000 each, and payable, respectively, in two, four, and six months after date. On May 19, 1886, the mortgage and notes were transferred to C. K. Goodwin, and on July 3, 1886, he transferred the same to the plaintiff, Gray, for the consideration of $2,800, $1,300 of which was paid in cash, and the balance in three notes for $500 each, payable one year after date. The defendant Helm is an attaching and judgment creditor of Mrs. Brotherton, his attachment having been levied on June 4th, and judgment entered December 6, 1886. Mrs. Brotherton filed her petition of insolvency on January 3, 1887, and on February 7th the defendant Seligman was elected an assignee of her estate. The court found—the facts being within the issues raised by the answers—that Mrs. Brotherton “did not indorse or deliver the notes hereinabove set forth, or either or any of them, to C. K.

Goodwin, for a good, valuable, or other or any valid, consideration, and that the C. K. Goodwin aforesaid did not indorse or deliver the same to the plaintiff herein for a good, valuable, or any valid, consideration; * * * and the indorsement of said notes by her to said Goodwin, and by said Goodwin to said plaintiff, was sham and fraudulent, not made bona fide, but made for the purpose of defeating defendant Gleason's cause of action, by reason of her counterclaim set forth in said answer. * * * Said transfer was made by said C. K. Goodwin, and received by said plaintiff, for the purpose and with the intent, by each of them, of thereby hindering, delaying, and defrauding defendant J. H. Helm, and the sundry other creditors of said Laura Brotherton aforesaid, and the transfer last aforesaid was made by the parties thereto collusively, for the purpose of placing the said notes and mortgage beyond the reach of the aforesaid creditors of said Laura Brotherton."

So far as these facts connect the plaintiff with any bad faith or fraudulent purpose in the transaction, they are utterly unsupported by the evidence. There is no circumstance shown in the evidence upon which a suspicion of fraud can be founded, unless it be the fact that the plaintiff is the father of Mrs. Brotherton, and that the latter and Goodwin were visiting the former when the assignment was made to the plaintiff, but the mere fact of relationship cannot be resorted to as a badge of fraud. Fraud must be specifically charged. It cannot be presumed, and the burden of proof is upon him who alleges it. The conduct of the plaintiff was in all respects entirely consistent with fairness and honesty. The evidence shows, without contradiction, that the plaintiff purchased the notes and mortgage before maturity for a valuable consideration, and that the same were immediately delivered to him. He paid to Goodwin $1,300 in coin, and gave him three notes of $500 each, payable in one year, and no part of this consideration has ever been returned to him. In order to raise the $1,300 cash which he paid to Goodwin, he mortgaged his homestead to Mr. Crew, cashier of the Bank of Chico. When this mortgage became due, the plaintiff was unable to pay it, for the reason that Mrs. Gleason had not paid the notes and mortgage which had been assigned to him. Thereupon, Goodwin—to protect himself, doubtless—paid Mr. Crew the amount of the debt, and took an assignment of the note and mortgage. We see no evidence of fraud in this. It was a simple business transaction, by which Goodwin protected himself, in preventing a foreclosure sale of his debtor's property. The order appealed from is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

In re LEVINSON'S ESTATE. (No. 15,200.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1893.)
EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—DISTRIBUTION —PETITION—BONDS.

1. Testator gave his interest in a firm to one of the partners in trust, to retain half the profits for his services, and to pay $200 per month to his mother; the trust to continue for the life of his mother, or, if she died before he did, for five years; $3,000 to be paid S. on the death of the mother, and the balance to be then paid his sisters. The partners having refused to allow testator's capital to remain in the firm, and the trust having been renounced, testator's mother and sisters petitioned for a partial distribution, stipulating that $3,000 should be paid S., and the balance distributed equally among them. Held that, having thereby obtained an order of distribution, neither they nor the executor could object to the payment of the $3,000 to S. on the ground that she was not entitled to the income thereof during the life of the mother, or for five years after testator's death.

2. Such distribution to S. will not be denied on the possibility that testator's sisters may have issue who may become entitled to the income.

3. The petition for distribution stated that a year had elapsed from the issue of letters testamentary; that notice had been given creditors; that the time for presenting claims had expired; that all claims had been paid; that testator had bequeathed to petitioner $3,000; that the other legatees had agreed to a distribution by which this amount should be paid petitioner, and that the legacy could be paid without loss to the creditors or any person interested in the estate. Held, that this was sufficient, as the court could properly take judicial notice of other matters.

4. Whether a bond shall be required of any of the parties to a partial distribution is a question for the court making the distribution.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Sallie Levinstone petitioned for partial distribution of the estate of John Levinson, deceased. From an order granting the petition, James W. Goodwin, administrator with the will annexed, appeals. Affirmed.

Horace W. Philbrook, for appellant. A. H. Loughborough, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an appeal by the administrator with the will annexed from an order of partial distribution requiring the appellant to pay to Sallie Levinstone the sum of $3,000. By the terms of the will of the decedent his interest in the copartnership of Newman & Levinson was given to Benjamin Newman, one of his copartners, in trust, to retain one-half of the annual profits for his services during the life of the testator's mother, and out of the other half of the profits to pay her $200 per month, and the surplus of the profits, if there should be any, to be left in the business of the firm as a portion of his share of the capital. The testator directed that upon the death of his mother there should be paid to Sallie Levinstone $3,000 out of the copartnership interest, and that the remainder should be paid over to his sisters, Julia and Ada. Newman renounced the trust on July 10, 1890. The inventory filed July 16, 1890, shows that the estate consisted of wearing apparel of the decedent, gold watch and chain, diamond ring, and the interest of the testator in the partnership of Newman & Levinson. It was shown that the surviving partners refused to allow the capital of the testator to remain in the firm. On September 18, 1891, Fannie, (the mother,) Julia, and Ada Levinson applied for an order of partial distribution to them upon the stipulation made between themselves. This stipulation recited the fact that the provision of the will was based upon an expectation that the interest of the testator in the firm would continue, and that the profits coming to the estate from his interest in the firm would be sufficient to pay the annuity given to his mother, but that such expectation had not been realized. The petitioners had therefore agreed that the estate might be distributed as follows: First, to Sallie Levinstone, $3,000, and the diamond ring; second, the residue of the estate to Fannie, Julia, and Ada Levinson in equal shares. The court found that the facts stated in the petition were true. It further found that, after reserving sufficient money to pay Sallie Levinstone and the executor's commissions, and a sum sufficient to cover all future expenses, there remained in the hands of the executor $9,000, which could be distributed without injury to the petitioners. An order was made distributing $9,000 to the petitioners without bonds. The final account of the executor was filed December 22, 1891, showing that he had received $20,965.78, and, after paying $9,000, distributed to the mother and sisters of the testator, he had in his hands the sum of $5,523.80. Sallie Levinstone did not join in the petition of Fannie, Julia, and Ada Levinson, but after the settlement of the executor's account she made an application for distribution to her in accordance with the agreement made by the other legatees.

It is claimed that by the terms of the will the $3,000 should not be given to Sallie Levinstone until after the death of Fannie Levinson; that until that time the income thereof is to go to other persons, some of whom may be born hereafter. We think this contention is unsound. Neither the mother nor the sisters certainly could raise such an objection after having procured an order of distribution upon the faith of their consent to an immediate distribution of the legacy of this respondent, and certainly the executor stands in no better position than they would under the same circumstances. The supposition that the sister may marry, and die, leaving issue entitled to the income, is a contingency too remote to be considered. Furthermore, the contention assumes that under no circumstances can there be any payment of the $3,000 legacy until after the expiration of five years. It is true the testator contemplated the continuance of the trust for the term of five years, expecting that the trustee would carry out his wishes. This expectation has not been fulfilled; the trust cannot be executed. A fair construction of the various provisions of the will we think supports the view taken by the court below. The testator's chief concern was for the care and support of his mother during her lifetime. If she did not survive him, it was provided that the one-half of the profits set aside for her should go to his sisters "during the continuance of this trust." It is expressly provided that "upon the termination of said trust said Benjamin Newman shall transfer * * * the sum of three thousand dollars to Miss Sallie Levinstone, * * * the rest and residue of said partnership interest and share to be transferred * * * and paid over to * * * Julia and Ada Levinson." There being no trust to carry out, time does not enter into the question to be considered, except for the protection of the mother. So long as she is willing to accept a sum certain, instead of a monthly allowance of $200, and the other legatees are willing that she should be paid that amount, there is no ground of complaint.

The objections to the sufficiency of the petition for distribution are not well taken. It shows that a year had elapsed from the date of the letters; that due notice to creditors had been published; that the time for presenting claims had expired; that all claims had been paid; that the testator had bequeathed to the petitioner the sum of $3,000; that Fannie, Julia, and Ada had agreed to a distribution as above stated, and that the legacy could be paid over to petitioner without loss to the creditors or any person interested in the estate. Other matters the court properly took judicial notice of.

The question whether a bond should be given by any of the parties to a partial distribution is one entirely within the discretion of the court below. The order appealed from is affirmed.

STREET-PAVING CONTRACT—PROVISION FOR REPAIRS BY CONTRACTOR.

1. A requirement in a street-paving contract that a contractor shall keep the street in repair for five years imposes an additional burden on the property owners, and therefore vitiates the assessment made under it, unless such requirement is authorized by the statute providing for the letting of contracts for street improvements.

2. The objection as to the additional burden is not removed by testimony of the contractor that the requirement did not enhance the amount of his bid, as others might have bid a less sum if the contract had not contained such requirement.

PEOPLE ex rel. FIELD v. EEL RIVER & E. R. CO. (No. 14,977.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1893.) HIGHWAY—DEDICATION OF LAND BY RAILROAD COMPANY—WHEN ULTRA VIRES—EVIDENCE.

1. Where the owner of land opens a road thereon, and the public use it uninterruptedly for some five years, the placing of a gate across it at one end, which is left open during the day and closed only at night, and which was placed there to prevent injury to those using the road, or to prevent the public from driving on the owner's wharf, is not inconsistent with an intention to dedicate the road to public use.

2. Where such owner is a corporation it is not necessary that its intention to dedicate the road to public use should be shown by the records of its proceedings, but such intention may be shown by its acts and the testimony of its directors.

3. The dedication by a railroad company of a portion of its land as a public highway is not ultra vires.

4. The fact that in the resolution of such company authorizing the purchase of such land no authority was given its representatives to agree that it should be used as a highway, does not render inadmissible evidence that its representatives made such agreement, where there is evidence that such agreement was afterwards ratified.

5. Nor is such evidence inadmissible on the ground that it is contradictory of the instrument of conveyance, where it is not offered for such purpose, but to show the intention of the company to dedicate the road to the public.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California by George A. Johnson, attorney general, on the relation of Waterman Field, against the Eel River & Eureka Railroad Company to obtain a judgment declaring a certain strip of land to be a public highway, and to compel the removal of certain obstructions therefrom. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Horace L. Smith, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and J. F. Coonan, Chamberlin & Wheeler, and D. Sevier, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Plaintiff seeks by this action a judgment that a certain strip of land 60 feet in width by 1,500 feet in length, extending from the defendant's station at Field's Landing, in Humboldt county, to the county road, is a public highway, and to compel the removal of certain obstructions thereon. Judgment was rendered in its favor, and the defendant has appealed.

In November, 1882, the land in question was owned by one Waterman Field, and was by him conveyed to the defendant. Field was also the owner of a tract of land which the defendant purchased from him for its use as a station, and this strip of land, extending from the main tract of land to the county road, was included in the same conveyance. In the early part of 1883 the defendant constructed a road over this strip of land, opening into the county road at one extremity, and connecting at the other extremity with the other tract of land, and this road was thereafter used by the public as a highway without interruption until 1887, when the defendant erected a gate near the western end of the road, to prevent driving onto its wharf in the night. This gate was left open during the daytime, but was closed at night. In 1890 the defendant built a warehouse directly across the road near its station, and placed a permanent gate at the extremity, near the county road, which it kept securely locked, and thereupon this action was brought. The court found that in July, 1883, the defendant dedicated this strip of land for the use of the public as a public highway, and that the public accepted such dedication by user, and had used the same as a highway continuously from that time until its obstruction by the defendant in 1890. There is ample evidence in the record in support of these findings, and, although there is also much contrary evidence, yet, as it was the function of the trial court to determine what consideration it should receive both in weight and character, we must accept its conclusion as determinative of the issue. That the road had been used by the public without interruption from the time of its construction in 1883 until the gate was erected in 1887 was not seriously controverted by the defendant, and there was testimony before the court to the effect that this gate was not placed there to prevent the public from using the road as a highway, but as a protection against danger in its use. While the placing of a gate across a road may be evidence of an intention not to dedicate the road to public use, yet it is not conclusive, and the act itself is consistent with an intention to dedicate the road as a public highway. The fact that the gate was left open during the day, and only closed at night for the purpose of preventing injury to those who use it, or of preventing the public from driving upon the defendant's wharf, is not inconsistent with its dedication to the public. So, too, the inference that the placing of the gates across the road evidenced a permissive user is impaired by the fact that such use had been uninterrupted for several years prior thereto. If the road was dedicated when it was first opened in 1883, such dedication could not be revoked in 1887 by placing gates across it. It was also shown by the testimony of persons who were the directors of the defendant, and acting in its behalf at the time the road was constructed, that it was the intention of the company to make it a public road, and that the land was purchased from Field for that purpose. This testimony was competent in support of the proposition that it was the intention of the defendant to dedicate the land as a highway when it constructed the same. It was not necessary that a formal resolution of its intention should be entered upon its records. A corporation as well as an individual may dedicate a portion of its land as a highway by its acts, and it is no more necessary that it should have a formal resolution of dedication upon its records than that an individual should execute a written declaration of his purpose to make a dedication. The objection that it is ultra vires for a railroad corporation to dedicate a portion of its land as a highway for the public is not tenable. Green v. Town of Canaan, 29 Conn. 166. See Los Angeles Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Los Angeles, (Cal.) 30 Pac. Rep. 523.

The defendant objected to the introduction of certain evidence on the part of the plaintiff, to the effect that when its representatives were negotiating with Field for the purchase it was agreed between them that it should be used for a public highway. The reasons presented in support of this objection are that in the resolution of the defendant authorizing the purchase, no authority was given to make such an agreement; and also that all the negotiations respecting the purchase were merged in the instrument of conveyance. The fact that the resolution under which the defendant's agents acted only authorized them to purchase the land does not of itself impair any agreement that might have been made with Field if the defendant subsequently approved such agreement and ratified their action. It was competent for the defendant to ratify the act of any one of its directors without having given him previous authority by a resolution in writing, and it was equally competent for it to ratify any act that the director might have done in excess of the authority conferred by resolution. The evidence referred to was not offered for the purpose of varying or contradicting the terms of the instrument by which the land was conveyed to the defendant. It was, however, admissible for the purpose of showing the intention of the defendant to dedicate the road which it should construct upon the land conveyed. Upon the issue whether the road that it constructed was intended to be a private or a public road, evidence that at the time it purchased the land declarations were made on its behalf that it intended to construct a public highway would be relevant and pertinent. If such an agreement had been made there would be an inference that its subsequent act in constructing the road was in pursuance thereof, and would corroborate the testimony of those who declared that at the time of its construction it was intended for a public highway.

There are other assignments of error in the admission of certain evidence, but none of them need any special attention.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

McKISSICK v. ASHBY. (No. 18,069.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1893.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—UNLAWFUL DETAINER—EJECTMENT—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 1161, provides that a tenant of real estate for a term less than life is guilty of unlawful detainer where he remains in possession after the expiration of his term without permission, but in the case of tenancy at will it must first be terminated by notice. Held that, where a tenant from year to year is notified before the termination of his lease that it will not be renewed, an action for possession can be maintained without previous notice or demand.

2. A complaint in ejectment alleging the leasing of the premises to defendant; that the lease had expired; and that defendant refused to vacate the premises, and "has withheld, and still withholds, the possession thereof from the plaintiff,"—sufficiently avers that defendant is in possession.

3. Though a tenant remained in possession without renewing his lease, he cannot deny his landlord's title without first surrendering to him the possession.

4. In ejectment to recover possession of premises from a tenant, it was proper to show that defendant had continued in the occupancy of the land, and was withholding possession.

5. As such action can be maintained without plaintiff's showing privity with the government, the admission of improper evidence to show such privity is harmless error.

Spencer & Raker, for appellant. Goodwin & Goodwin, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This action is in the nature of ejectment, and was commenced April 22, 1889. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff now owns, and for more than eight years he and his grantors have owned, certain described lands in Lassen county; that defendant leased the said lands of plaintiff from year to year, commencing on the 1st day of March, 1886, down to the 1st day of March, 1889, for the sum of $180 rent, which defendant agreed and promised to pay plaintiff annually thereafter; that on the 27th day of February, 1889, plaintiff duly notified defendant that he would not renew the lease, and requested him to vacate and surrender the premises; that defendant refused, and still refuses, to vacate the premises, or to deliver the same to the plaintiff, and has withheld, and still withholds, the possession thereof from the plaintiff, and has ousted and ejected plaintiff therefrom, to his damage in the sum of $50; that defendant has failed and refused to pay to plaintiff the said rent for the year next before the 1st day of March, 1889, amounting to $180; and that the whole of that sum is due and owing to plaintiff from defendant. Wherefore judgment is asked that defendant be ejected from the said lands, and the plaintiff restored to the possession thereof, and also for damages in the sum of $50, and for rents due in the sum of $180, with costs. A general and special demurrer to the complaint was interposed by the defendant, but what ruling, if any, was made upon it does not appear from the record. An answer was also filed by defendant, denying all the averments of the complaint. The case was tried by the court, without a jury, and the findings upon all the issues were in favor of the plaintiff, except that the damages were fixed at one dollar. Judgment was then entered in accordance with the findings, from which, and from an order denying his motion for new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. Appellant contends that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because—First, if it is regarded as a complaint for unlawful detainer, then, in order to maintain the action, it was necessary that a demand for the possession of the premises should have been made after the expiration of the term, and no such demand is alleged to have been made; and, second, if it is regarded as an ordinary complaint in ejectment, then an averment that defendant was in possession of the demanded premises, or of some part thereof, at the time of the commencement of the action, was necessary, and that no such averment was made. Section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure, cited by appellant, provides as follows: "A tenant of real property for a term less than life is guilty of unlawful detainer (1) when he continues in possession, in person or by subtenant, of the property or any part thereof, after the expiration of the term for which it is let to him, without the permission of his landlord, or the successor in estate of his landlord, if any there be: but in case of a tenancy at will, it must first be terminated by notice as prescribed in the Civil Code." Here the defendant was not a tenant at will, but for a fixed term, which expired March 1, 1889. The hiring of a thing terminates at the end of the term agreed upon. Section 1933, Civil Code. The notice served was only to the effect that plaintiff would not renew the lease, and that defendant must give up possession of the property. Such a notice was not necessary, but it served to inform defendant that, if he continued in possession of the property after the expiration of the term for which it was let to him, he would do so without the permission of his landlord, and would be guilty of unlawful detainer. Under the facts stated, we think the plaintiff had a right to re-enter when the term expired, and to maintain an action for possession without previous notice or demand. Section 793, Civil Code; Canning v. Fibush, 77 Cal. 196, 19 Pac. Rep. 376. And, if the complaint is regarded as an ordinary one in ejectment, we think the same conclusions must follow. It alleges, in substance, that plaintiff leased the demanded premises to the defendant; that the lease had expired; and that defendant refuses to vacate the premises, and "has withheld, and still withholds, the possession thereof from the plaintiff." This clearly implies that defendant is in possession; and it must be held a sufficient averment of that fact, certainly, in the absence of a demurrer that the complaint is ambiguous or uncertain in that regard. But no such objection was taken.

2. Appellant also contends that the findings were all contrary to the evidence, and not justified thereby. There was, however, evidence tending to support the findings, and, under the well-settled rule as to conflicting evidence, we think it must be held sufficient here. The defendant did not, in giving his testimony, deny, so far as we can discover, that he held the land in controversy during the years 1886 and 1887 under leases from the plaintiff, but he claimed that the lease was not renewed for the year 1888. Admitting this to be so, still he could not deny the plaintiff's title without first surrendering to him the possession, and this he had evidently failed and refused to do.

3. When the plaintiff was upon the stand as a witness in his own behalf, his attorney asked him the following questions: "State whether or not, since he went on it, in 1886, up to the time you made the demand on him, he continues to occupy and use the land. State whether or not the defendant still occupies this disputed tract of land." The questions were objected to as irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and the objections were overruled, and exceptions taken. It is urged that these rulings were erroneous, but we see no error in them. It was entirely proper for the plaintiff to show that defendant continued in the occupancy of the land, and was withholding its possession from him.

4. The plaintiff was permitted, over the objections of defendant, to read in evidence a copy of the record in the United States land office at Susanville, certified by the register of the office to be a true and correct copy, showing that on May 15, 1880, one John P. McKissick had entered the lands in question as desert lands; and also a deed executed by the said McKissick on December 9, 1881, conveying the said lands to the plaintiff. It is urged now that the copy offered was not competent evidence to show the entry; that the only competent evidence for that purpose would have been a certified copy of the certificate of purchase or receiver's receipt, the original of which was in the general land office at Washington; and that the deed was not admissible, for the reason that the plaintiff failed to connect himself with the government title, or show that the title had passed from the government. We see no prejudicial error in the rulings complained of under this head. The object undoubtedly was to show privity with the government, but, without such showing, the action might be maintained. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

WOOLVERTON v. BAKER et al. (No. 15,156.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1893.)

JUDGMENT — RES JUDICATA — NEW CAUSE OF ACTION — WHAT CONSTITUTES — ACTS SUBSEQUENT TO JUDGMENT.

1. A judgment in an action by plaintiff to compel a reconveyance to her of certain land, on the ground that she had conveyed it to defendant B. in trust to apply the proceeds to her support, and that he had failed to execute the trust, is a bar to a subsequent action by her against the same defendants, in which she alleges that defendant B. had failed to perform a contract to apply a sufficient portion of the rents for her support, solely in consideration of which she had conveyed it to him, and asks that defendants be directed to reconvey it.

2. The failure of B. to apply any of the rents to plaintiff's support subsequent to the judgment in the first action gave plaintiff no new cause of action.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by Elvira B. Woolverton against Erastus J. Baker and others to compel a reconveyance to plaintiff of certain land. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. G. Weaver and E. W. Wilson, for appellant. Buck & Cutler and Chamberlin & Wheeler, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff alleged in her complaint that on December 3, 1878, she was the owner of certain land in Humboldt county, which on that day she conveyed to the defendant Erastus J. Baker, upon the consideration and condition that he would henceforth apply a sufficient portion of the rents thereof for her support and maintenance during the remainder of her natural life; that this was the only consideration for the said conveyance; and that the said defendant accepted the same upon the said consideration and condition; and that he has not since the 1st of July, 1890, applied any portion of the rents to her support, or performed any of the conditions expressed in said conveyance; and the plaintiff prayed the judgment of the court that the defendants be directed to reconvey the lands to her. The defendants answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and set up as a special defense that in a former action between the same parties, involving the same cause of action, judgment had been rendered in their favor, and against the plaintiff. Upon the trial the court sustained this defense, and judgment was entered in their favor, from which the plaintiff has appealed. The question presented for determination on this appeal is whether the plaintiff is estopped by the former judgment. In the former action the plaintiff sought a judgment that she was the owner of the lands and premises, as against the defendants, and that they be directed to reconvey them to her. In her complaint she set up the same conveyance that is averred in the present action, and alleged that the same had been made by her upon the sole consideration that the defendant should hold the same in trust for her, and that the rents, issues, and profits thereof should be applied in providing for and maintaining her during her natural life, and alleged that the defendant had not in any manner, or at all, provided for or maintained her. Upon the trial of the issues therein the court rendered its judgment that the plaintiff was not the owner of the lands, but that the defendants, as against the plaintiff, were the owners in fee simple thereof, free and clear of any and all trusts, exceptions, limitations, and conditions set forth and alleged in said complaint. By that action the plaintiff brought into judicature the title to the land as between herself and the defendants, so far as the same depended upon the conveyance made by her to Erastus J. Baker. She challenged their title by impeaching the transaction out of which the conveyance had been made, and the judgment which she sought was the cancellation of her deed, and the destruction thereby of the title claimed thereunder by the defendants. Whether she averred as the ground of the relief sought that the consideration for the conveyance was the agreement of the defendant that he would hold the land upon a trust for her, which he had violated, or that the conveyance was made by her and accepted by him upon the condition, subsequently broken by him, that he would thereafter support her, and would apply the whole or a portion of the rents to her support, was immaterial. The real issue which she brought before the court for its judgment was the sufficiency of the defendants' title to the land, under the deed which she had executed to Erastus J. Baker. Her cause of action was the breach of the agreement under which she alleged that this conveyance had been made, and involved the determination of the rights of the parties flowing from that transaction, and it was incumbent upon her to set out in her complaint all the facts which constituted this cause of action. She is estopped by the judgment therein rendered from thereafter asserting any cause of action depending upon the facts so omitted, as fully as she would be if at the trial she had omitted to introduce evidence in support of her averments or present argument to satisfy the court of the justice of her claim. A party cannot litigate his cause of action by piecemeal, and, after a judgment against him, seek in another action to obtain relief dependent upon the transaction therein adjudged, by bringing forward claims and demands properly belonging to the first action. The judgment against him is conclusive, not only of what was in fact determined, but also of all matters which might have been presented in support of his cause of action, and litigated therein. The rule is stated by Vice Chancellor Wigram in Henderson v. Henderson, 3 Hare, 115: "Where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in, and of adjudication by, a court of competent jurisdiction, the court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not, except under special circumstances, permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as a part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward only because they have, from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case. The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time." See, also, Whart. Ev. § 717; 2 Black, Judgm. § 729; Rogers v. Higgins, 57 Ill. 244; Stockton v. Ford, 18 How. 418; Sullivan v. Mining Co., 39 Cal. 464; Taylor v. Castle, 42 Cal. 367; Parnell v. Hahn, 61 Cal. 131.

The plaintiff has no new cause of action by reason of the failure of the defendant, subsequent to that judgment, to apply any portion of the rents to her support. That issue—the breach of this condition—was presented in the former action, and, as the judgment makes no mention thereof, is presumed to have been included therein. Code Civil Proc. § 1963, subd. 18; Stickney v. Goudy, 132 Ill. 231, 23 N. E. Rep. 1034. "The dismissal of a bill in chancery will be presumed to be a final and conclusive adjudication on the merits, whether they were or were not heard and determined, unless the contrary is apparent on the face of the pleadings, or in the decree of the court." Freem. Judgm. § 270. The judgment was that the defendants, as against the plaintiff, were the owners in fee simple of the land described, free of all the conditions set forth in the complaint. If the defendants held the land freed from the conditions set forth in her complaint, that a portion of the rents should be applied to the support of the plaintiff, any subsequent failure to so apply the rents would not impair their tenure.

The judgment is affirmed.

(No. 14,874.)

NOTICE OF APPEAL -- ADVERSE PARTY -- APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT--JUDGES -- TERMS OF OFFICE--DE FACTO JUDGE--MORTGAGE OF HOMESTEAD.

1. Where a defendant is not served with summons, and makes no appearance, and no judgment is entered against him, and judgment is entered against the other defendants, who are served and appear, the defendant not served is not an "adverse party," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 940, requiring in case of appeal an undertaking to be filed unless the same be waived "by the adverse party, in writing."

2. Where a proceeding is in form a judgment, which, although void, is entered of record, so that it might be made oppressive by the issue of final process thereon, it constitutes a grievance, which may be remedied on appeal to a tribunal for the correction of errors.

3. Const. art. 6, § 6, provides that "the term of office of judges of the superior courts shall be six years from and after the first Monday of January next succeeding their elections." Article 20, § 20, provides that the terms of officers provided for by the constitution "shall commence on the first Monday after the 1st day of January next following their election." Held, that article 20 applies to superior judges, and controls, it being intended to provide generally the exact date of commencement, so that all officers of the state should take office on the same day.

4. Where the judge elect was attorney in a proceeding pending, and his predecessor in office assumed jurisdiction by the entry of judgment on the first Monday of January, which was also the first Monday after the 1st day of January, both judges acting in good faith, and believing that the term of the judge elect did not commence till Tuesday, the judge acting was a de facto judge.

5. Const. art. 17, § 1, requires the legislature to protect by law the homestead from forced sale. Civil Code, § 1241, declares a mortgage foreclosure sale a "forced sale." Section 1242 provides that "the homestead of a married person cannot be conveyed or incumbered unless the instrument is executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife." Held, where a husband and wife conveyed their homestead by a deed, absolute on its face, and by a contemporaneous oral agreement made the conveyance a mortgage for an existing indebtedness and for future advances to the husband, that the premises retained their homestead character; and the incumbrance for future advances being a mere oral agreement, constituting power in another to incumber at will, and not executed and acknowledged by husband and wife, it was not enforceable. Bull v. Coe, 18 Pac. Rep. 808, 77 Cal. 54, distinguished.

PER CURIAM. Upon due consideration of this cause, after hearing in bank, we are satisfied with the conclusion reached and the opinion rendered in department, (31 Pac. Rep. 849;) and, for the reasons therein given, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the court below is directed to enter judgment for the defendants on the findings.

STRONG v. GRANT, Judge. (No. 15,255.)

MANDAMUS — WHEN LIES — DISMISSING CRIMINAL INFORMATION.

Pen. Code, § 1382, subd. 2, provides that "if a defendant whose trial has not been postponed upon his application is not brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the indictment or information," the court must order the prosecution to be dismissed, unless good cause to the contrary is shown. Held, that mandamus does not lie to compel such dismissal. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank.

Original petition by John B. Strong for mandamus to W. H. Grant, judge of the superior court of Yolo county. Petition denied.

C. W. Thomas, J. Craig, and J. E. Strong, for petitioner. Wm. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an original proceeding, in which this court is asked to issue a writ of mandamus commanding the judge of the superior court of Yolo county to dismiss a certain criminal action pending in that court against the petitioner, John B. Strong. It appears that on September 8, 1892, an information was filed in that court charging the petitioner with the crime of assault with intent to commit murder, but he was not arraigned thereon until the 26th day of November following. The petitioner neither applied for nor consented to this delay, and upon his arraignment moved the court to dismiss the prosecution, upon the ground that he had not been brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information. The superior court, after listening to an oral statement of the district attorney, in which that officer gave his reasons for not moving in the matter of the petitioner's arraignment and trial at an earlier date, denied the motion. In passing upon the motion the court also took judicial notice of the fact that in the arrangement of business upon its calendar the trial of jury cases had been fixed to commence on October 7, 1892, and that the jury appearing on that day was excused from attendance upon the court until November 15, 1892, at which time the trial of criminal cases, having precedence over that against the petitioner, was proceeded with, and not concluded until the date when the petitioner was called for arraignment. It also appears that the reason for the postponement of the trial of the cases referred to from October 7th to November 15th, and the dismissal of the trial jury until the latter day, was because of the election campaign then in progress, and the fact that the district attorney was engaged in such campaign as a candidate for re-election.

In the view we take of the matter, it is unnecessary to determine whether the ruling of the superior court in denying the motion of petitioner was correct or not. Even if it should be conceded that the motion was improperly denied, the error is one which cannot be corrected in this proceeding. Section 1382 of the Penal Code provides: "The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: (1) * * * (2) If a defendant whose trial has not been postponed upon his application is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment or filing of the information." When a motion is made for the discharge of a defendant under this section, the question presented is a judicial question, involving in its decision the exercise of judicial discretion; and when such motion has been submitted to the court in which the prosecution is pending, and denied, such judgment or determination cannot be reversed by a proceeding in mandamus. The rule is so well established that it may be said to be universal that the writ of mandate cannot be used to correct the errors of a court in passing upon questions regularly submitted to it in the course of a judicial proceeding, or to control the exercise of its discretion. High, Extr. Rem. §§ 24, 149, 152; Merrill, Mand. § 187. See, also, the following cases which illustrate and declare the same principle: State v. Court of Common Pleas of Passaic, 38 N. J. Law, 132; Mooney v. Edwards, 51 N. J. Law, 479, 17 Atl. Rep. 973; Davis v. Commissioners, 63 Me. 396; Judges of Oneida Common Pleas v. People, 18 Wend. 79; Ex parte Johnson, 25 Ark. 614; State v. Norton, 20 Kan. 506; Ex parte Koon, 1 Denio, 644; People v. Weston, 28 Cal. 640; People v. Pratt, Id. 166; Smith v. Judge, 17 Cal. 548; Lewis v. Barclay, 35 Cal. 213. In this last case the application was for a writ of mandamus to compel the county judge of Calaveras county to reinstate an appeal which it was claimed he had wrongfully dismissed, and in denying the application this court said: "Mandamus lies to compel an inferior tribunal to perform a duty enjoined by law, if it refuses to do so; but, if the duty is judicial, the writ cannot prescribe what the decision of the inferior tribunal shall be. The duty to be performed by the respondent in this case was strictly judicial, and there was no refusal on his part to perform it. He may or may not have erred in the disposition of the case, but, whether he did or not, his action cannot be reviewed by mandamus, nor, indeed, by any other means, for the case is one in which the county court had final jurisdiction, and, if error was committed, there is no remedy." So in this case the petitioner invoked a judicial decision when he submitted his motion to the superior court for a dismissal of the prosecution there pending against him, and, although the judge may have erred in the decision of the question thus submitted, the error cannot be corrected by mandamus.

It follows, from these views, that the petitioner is not entitled to the relief demanded in the petition, and judgment must be ordered in favor of the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

BEATTY, C. J., (concurring.) A person charged with a criminal offense has a right to a speedy trial, in order that if innocent he may go free. To detain him in custody, or to compel him by the exaction of bail to dance attendance upon a court while his trial is arbitrarily postponed without his consent, is not only a wrong and injustice to him, but is a detriment to the public. The design of the statute, quoted in the opinion of the court, is to prevent these evils. The effect of that opinion, however, coupled with other decisions in similar cases, is to deprive the statute of its intended operation,—so far, at least, as its enforcement by this court is concerned,—and to pervert it to a use wholly foreign and inimical to its purpose. In effect, it has been held that, no matter how unjustifiably the right secured by the statute has been disregarded by the superior court, the party injured has no remedy except by an appeal to this court; and this obviously is no remedy at all for an innocent man whose trial has been unreasonably delayed, because upon his acquittal he has nothing to appeal from. The only persons who can appeal are those who have been found guilty, and they, if their convictions are otherwise illegal, have no occasion to resort to this statute for their deliverance. The only person, therefore, who can secure its benefits through the intervention of this court is one who stands convicted under a judgment in all other respects free from error, or, in other words, one who is actually guilty of the crime charged against him. People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. Rep. 892. It is very safe to say that the legislature would never have enacted such a law if this were the only case in which it could be made effective. The truth is, the law was enacted, like all similar provisions relating to criminal procedure, for the benefit of the innocent, and not for the sake of screening the guilty. It is true, with respect to this, as with respect to all rules of procedure deemed necessary for the security of innocent men, unjustly accused, guilty men, also, being deemed innocent until proved guilty, may take advantage of it; but it is a most extraordinary result that for the wanton and deliberate violation of this rule an innocent man has no remedy, while one justly convicted of a crime may by means of it evade the penalty. To me it seems there must be a mistake somewhere in the decisions that lead to such a result, and I think the mistake consists either in holding that the injured party cannot resort to a mandamus, as this opinion holds, or in holding that he cannot resort to habeas corpus, as was held upon a former proceeding by this petitioner. 31 Pac. Rep. 574. If an innocent man, who is kept in jail month after month, while his trial is arbitrarily postponed, cannot resort to this court for relief, either by habeas corpus or by mandamus, I know of no other remedy he has. Appeal, as above stated, is no remedy, for he cannot appeal until after a trial, and the refusal to bring him to trial is the very wrong of which he complains; and, moreover, being innocent, it is to be presumed he will be acquitted if he ever is brought to trial, and that he will have nothing to appeal from. I cannot bring myself to admit that for such a wrong there is no remedy, and consequently I feel satisfied that either habeas corpus or mandamus must lie. In either case, however, I concede that the petitioner ought not to be discharged unless it should appear that the superior court had abused its discretion in postponing the trial. In this case I think there were some circumstances, in addition to those mentioned in the above opinion,—more especially the facts that the petitioner was on bail, that he was in no wise harmed by the delay, and that material witnesses for the prosecution could not be found,—upon which the court could, without an abuse of its discretion, hold that there was cause for the delay in proceeding against the petitioner. On this ground I concur in the judgment.

SPRING VAL. WATERWORKS v. BARBER, Tax Collector. (No. 15,015.)

TAXATION—FRANCHISE OF WATER COMPANY.

Where a water company is chartered to supply a certain county and city therein with water, the mere fact that the pipes of the company pass through the adjoining county does not make the company's franchise taxable there.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Application by the Spring Valley Waterworks against James B. Barber, as tax collector, for an injunction. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Fox, Kellogg & King, (Wm. F. Herrin, of counsel,) for appellant. Geo. W. Reed, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to restrain the defendant, as tax collector of Alameda county, from making a sale for alleged delinquent taxes upon the assessment of a "franchise" for the fiscal year 1889-90. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. No question as to proper remedy is raised, and the case is submitted upon the sole question of the legality of the assessment and tax.

As appears from the complaint, the plaintiff is a corporation organized under a general law approved April 22, 1858, entitled "An act for the incorporation of water companies," (St. 1858, p. 218,) for the purpose of supplying the city and county of San Francisco, and the inhabitants thereof, with pure, fresh water; and ever since its incorporation, on June 10, 1858, its principal place of business has been in said city and county, where its works furnish the main supply of water to said city and county, and the inhabitants thereof. It further appears that its "franchise" was assessed for said fiscal year, in said city and county, for a large sum, and the tax levied thereon paid by appellant. The complaint further shows that the board of supervisors of Alameda county, on March 26, 1888, passed a general ordinance giving to "any person, firm, association, or corporation engaged in the business of supplying fresh water to any city or town, or any city and county, in the state" the privilege of laying and maintaining pipes as conduits therefor, in or through any of the roads and highways of said county, subject to certain conditions stated in the ordinance; and afterwards the appellant, being desirous of bringing a part of its supply of water for San Francisco across said adjoining county of Alameda, laid a part of its pipe used for that purpose along portions of certain roads in said county. Taxes were assessed and levied in said county upon said pipe and pipe line, and upon other property owned by appellant in said county, and were paid; but, in addition to these taxes, said county is endeavoring to collect further taxes upon an assessment of its "franchise." The only franchise asserted rests upon the pipe for carrying water to San Francisco, before mentioned.

While all ordinary real and personal property owned by appellant in Alameda county, and used in connection with its business of supplying San Francisco with water, is to be taxed in Alameda county, in common with other property, we do not think that its mere ownership of water pipe there, as aforesaid, creates a "franchise" assessable in that county. It had a mere right of way in common with all other persons, entirely unconnected with any privilege granted by the county to take tolls, collect water rates, or enjoy any other special prerogative or advantage. Such a right was certainly not, at common law, a franchise. Blackstone makes a clear distinction between franchises and ways. In the cases cited by respondent it was held that, in determining the assessable value of the franchise of a water company in the city which it supplies with water, its right to run pipes through the streets might be considered in connection with its other corporate rights, and particularly in connection with its franchise to collect water rates. In Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 109, the court say: "A franchise conferred on an individual, to lay down pipes in the streets of a city, and to collect rates for water furnished a city or its inhabitants, is to be taxed," etc. In Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614, the plaintiff was a corporation "engaged in the manufacture and selling of gas to the city and inhabitants of the city of San Jose," and its entire "franchise" was assessed as a whole. In that case the court held that a proper method of arriving at the assessable value of the franchise was to deduct the cash value of all the real and personal property of the corporation from the market value of its capital stock, which, of course, could not have been done in the case at bar; and it may be presumed that, when the franchise of the appellant was assessed in San Francisco, everything was included which the county of Alameda undertook to assess under the head of "franchise." In none of the other cases cited was there any question about a mere right of way in an adjoining county, entirely unconnected with any franchise granted by that county to collect tolls or water rates. We think that whatever franchise the appellant has came from its charter, and is assessable at San Francisco, its principal place of business, under section 3628 of the Political Code. Indeed, it is difficult to see how the respondent can claim that the general right given to lay pipes is a franchise, for the board of supervisors have power to grant franchises only as follows: "To grant licenses and franchises, as provided by law, for constructing, keeping and taking tolls on roads, bridges, fences, wharves, chutes and piers." Pol. Code, § 4046. Our conclusion is that, under the circumstances here disclosed, the appellant had no franchise assessable in Alameda county, and the demurrer should have been overruled. The judgment must be reversed, and, if respondent shall present no other defense than the one involved in the demurrer, a decree should be entered in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

DE HAVEN, J., did not participate in the foregoing decision.

D'OYLY v. CAPP et al. (No. 15,125.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1893.)

MORTGAGE—MISSTATEMENT AS TO DEBT—EFFECT.

A mortgage in terms given as security for the payment of $2,500, and "of such additional sums as may be loaned by said mortgagee to said mortgagor before the discharge" thereof, is effective to secure notes afterwards given for loans made before the execution of the mortgage, as against a subsequent judgment creditor, who is not prejudiced by such misstatement on the face of the mortgage.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Nigel D'Oyly against James B. Capp and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John H. Yoell, for appellants. H. V. Morehouse and Hiram D. Tuttle, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. On March 1, 1890, the defendants J. B. and A. B. Capp were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $11,000, and on that day executed and delivered to him their promissory note for the sum of $2,500, secured by a mortgage on certain real property. The mortgage provided that it should stand as security for the payment of said $2,500, and "of such additional sums as may be loaned by said mortgagee to said mortgagor before the discharge hereof, and the interest thereon; each additional loan to be evidenced by the promissory note of said mortgagor." On March 10, 1890, the Capps gave another note to the plaintiff for $5,000, which recited that it was given to evidence advances made in accordance with the mortgage, and on the same day executed and delivered another note for the balance of the $11,000 they were owing plaintiff, ($3,500,) which contains the same recital. All of these notes came due on March 1, 1891. On December 21, 1881, the defendant Houghton filed in the recorder's office of Santa Clara county, where the mortgaged property is situated, a transcript of a deficiency judgment on foreclosure, docketed in the superior court of Monterey county on that day. Appellant Houghton contends that his judgment is superior to the lien of the mortgage for the payment of the $5,000 and $3,500 notes. His claim is, as we understand it, that, as neither the $5,000 nor the $3,500 note represented an additional sum advanced by the mortgagee to the mortgagor after the execution of the mortgage, they cannot be included in the amount for which the mortgage was given as security.

We do not think there is any merit in the contention. The mortgage, it is true, ought to have stated the true consideration for which it was given, "but the omission to disclose the real transaction on the face of the mortgage will not make it invalid, unless some one has been prejudiced by the misrepresentation." Collins v. Carlile, 13 Ill. 259. Where the mortgage is given in good faith, to secure a present indebtedness and future advance, whether the true object be stated in the mortgage or not, it is valid as between the parties, and as against any subsequent lienholder not prejudiced by the misstatement. Hendrix v. Gore, 8 Or. 408. In Bell v. Fleming's Ex'rs, 12 N. J. Eq. 16, the court said: "It was insisted as an objection to its validity that this mortgage was false on its face; that, while it purports to be a security for a debt of $100,000 actually due, the debt really existing was but little over one-third of that amount. In Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, 34, it was part of the argument of counsel that the mortgage untrue recited the whole transaction, and that the mortgage was made only to cover future contingent responsibilities. Chief Justice Marshall, in his opinion, says: 'It is true the real transaction does not appear on the face of the mortgage. The deed purports to secure a debt of £30,000, 6s., sterling, due to all the mortgagees. It was really intended to secure different sums due at the time from particular mortgagees, advances afterwards to be made, and liabilities to be incurred to an uncertain amount. It is not to be denied that a deed which misrepresents the transaction it recites and the consideration on which it is executed is liable to suspicion. It must sustain a rigorous examination. It is certainly always advisable fairly and plainly to state the truth. But if, upon investigation, the real transaction shall appear fair, though somewhat variant from that which is described, it would seem to be unjust and unprecedented to deprive the person claiming under the deed of his real equitable rights, unless it be in favor of a person who has been in fact injured and deceived by the misrepresentation.' * * * The incumbrance can never stand for a larger amount than the record calls for. * * * If the transaction is a fair one, there can be no objection to state it as it really exists. * * * The bona fides of the transaction is apparent from the manner and promptness with which the advances were made. There is no one before the court who makes any complaint that he has been misled or been placed in a worse position in consequence of the character of the mortgage." The mortgage must always give the requisite information, so that a junior creditor may, by inspection of the record, and by the exercise of common prudence and ordinary diligence, ascertain with certainty the extent of the incumbrance. When this is done, although the instrument may not truthfully state its object on its face, if the transaction is otherwise fair, there is nothing inequitable in enforcing it. Bank v. Finch, 3 Barb. Ch. 303; Craig v. Tappin, 2 Sandf. Ch. 78; Hall v. Crouse, 13 Hun, 560. For the reasons given, the variance between the allegations and the proof is immaterial. The judgment is affirmed.

BORLAND v. NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 14,213.)

LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS—PLEDGE OF STOCK—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A debtor of defendant bank, who contemplated going into bankruptcy, was told by defendant that if he would turn over all his property to the bank it would carry him through, and he accordingly turned over various properties. Three years later the bank, having learned that he had corporate stock which had not been turned over, demanded it, whereupon he had the stock transferred on the books to a trustee for the bank, and delivered the stock certificate to the bank. Nothing was said at the time of this last transfer as to the value of the stock, or as to crediting him with anything on his notes, which were still held by the bank to a large amount, and no credit was given him for any of the securities transferred by him, except as they were disposed of. Held, that the bank held the stock last transferred as collateral security, only, and hence, under Civil Code, § 322, was not liable, as a stockholder, for the debts of the corporation.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by Agnes Borland, executrix, against the Nevada Bank of San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lloyd & Wood, R. S. Mesick, and Wm. F. Herrin, (H. L. Gear, of counsel,) for appellant. McKoon & Towle and Geo. W. Towle, Jr., (Warren Olney, of counsel,) for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff seeks to recover from the defendant, as a stockholder in the Wyoming & Dakota Water Company, its proportionate liability of certain indebtedness of that corporation to the plaintiff. The case was tried in the court below without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

In 1877, August Hemme, being heavily indebted, contemplated going into bankruptcy, and as the defendant was one of his creditors, to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars, Mr. Flood, who was its vice president, proposed to him that, if he would turn over to the bank what property and securities he held, it would carry him through. Hemme's indebtedness to the bank was evidenced by several promissory notes, upon which he had given collateral security, and, in response to this proposition of Mr. Flood, he turned over to the bank various properties, upon which the bank thereafter, from time to time, realized by sales, and applied the amounts to his credit. In March, 1880, Flood, having learned that Hemme had certain shares of stock in the above-named corporation, which he had not turned over to the bank, sent for him; and, upon his demand that this stock should be given up to the bank, Hemme caused the same to be transferred on the books of the corporation from the name of his wife into that of George B. Bailey, trustee, and delivered the certificate therefor to Flood. Bailey was an employe in the bank, in whose name all securities held by the bank, whether as proprietor or collateral, were placed and held by him, as trustee for the bank. It does not appear that any entry of the transaction was made upon the books of the bank, and the certificates for the stock were themselves placed by one of the employes of the bank in an envelope, and marked as held as security against Hemme's account. At this time the bank still held some of the other property which had been turned over to it in 1877, undisposed of, and disposals thereof were thereafter made from time to time, and the proceeds placed to the credit of Hemme's account. This stock, however, was never disposed of by the bank, but diminished in value so that it was regarded of no value whatever, and the notes themselves became outlawed, and in 1882 were surrendered to Hemme, at which time he made a written assignment of the stock to the bank. It is contended by the plaintiff that the transaction between Hemme and Flood was an absolute transfer of the stock, by which the entire title thereto was vested in the bank, while the defendant contends that the stock was received and held by it only as a collateral security for the indebtedness of Hemme; and upon the determination of this disputed point hinges the liability of the defendant, for if it took the stock as security, merely, it was not a stockholder, liable for the debts of the corporation, while, if it became the absolute owner thereof, it is chargeable with its proportionate liability of the corporate debts.

Section 322 of the Civil Code declares: "Each stockholder of a corporation is individually and personally liable for such portions of its debts and liabilities as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation. * * * The term 'stockholder,' as used in this section, shall apply not only to such persons as appear by the books of the corporation to be such, but also to every equitable owner of stock, although the same appear on the books in the name of another. * * * Stock held as collateral security, or by a trustee, or in any other representative capacity, does not make the holder thereof a stockholder within the meaning of this section, except in the cases above mentioned, so as to charge him with any proportion of the debts or liabilities of the corporation; but the pledgor or person or estate represented is to be deemed the stockholder as respects such liability." The parties to the transaction under consideration did not, by any words or instrument, attempt to define the relation which they should hold to the property after it had been delivered by Hemme to the bank, and the evidence relating to the transaction itself is exceedingly meager. There was no express agreement of any kind between them. Their relations at the time were evidently of an unfriendly character, and they were dealing with each other in the attitude of a creditor seeking to get from his debtor that which he had agreed to give him, and a debtor reluctantly parting with what he had agreed to give. Although Hemme, when asked at the trial whether he delivered that stock absolutely to Flood, or whether he retained an interest in it, stated that he delivered the stock absolutely to Mr. Flood, as the property of the bank, he did not testify that anything of that nature was said either by Flood or himself at the time it was delivered, or at any time, and his testimony cannot be considered as anything more than either his own opinion of the transaction, or as a purpose which he then had, but which he did not disclose. The transaction cannot be regarded as a sale of the stock from Hemme to the bank. There was nothing said by either party in reference to buying or selling the same, nor was the value of the stock agreed upon, or even discussed, nor was any price fixed at which Hemme would part with it, or Flood accept it. Story, in his Treatise on Sales, (section 1,) defines a sale to be "a transfer of the absolute title to property for a certain agreed price," and, in section 217 of the same treatise, states that the price required in a contract of sale must be: (1) Money or its negotiable representative; (2) certain and definite, or capable of being rendered definite; (3) an actual price seriously intended to be exacted. Section 1721, Civil Code, defines a sale to be "a contract by which, for a pecuniary consideration called a price, one transfers to another an interest in property." It is not necessary, however, that the price for which property is sold shall be money, only, or that it shall be actually delivered at the time of the transaction. The term, as here used, is equivalent to "compensation." Iron Co. v. Alger, 54 N. Y. 177. But, as values are expressed in money units, a sale implies a reciprocal transfer of this compensation, past, present, or future, of a value in money, agreed upon between the parties. It is, however, the agreement to pay a price, rather than the actual payment of the price, which is the essential element of a sale; but the price itself must be definite, or the agreement must contain such elements that the price can be ascertained therefrom. In addition to the necessity for a price, there must be the assent of the parties that the transaction shall be a sale. This must be an express agreement, or such an implication must follow from the nature of the transaction itself. The mere transfer of possession, without the agreement, express or implied, that such transfer is a sale, on the one hand, and a purchase, on the other, will not be a sale, or have the effect to transfer the title. The testimony of Grayson, that, at some time subsequent to the transfer of the stock, Flood spoke of the transaction as a "purchase," cannot be used to determine the nature of the transfer. Flood, as the agent of the defendant, could not bind it by any admissions or declarations respecting the character of the transaction which he might subsequently make in reference thereto. Beasley v. Fruit-Packing Co., 92 Cal. 388, 28 Pac. Rep. 485. Neither can the transaction be regarded as a payment by Hemme upon the amount of the indebtedness against him, held by the bank. Payment, like sale, can result only from the mutual agreement of the parties that the transaction shall have that effect, and without such consent the transaction cannot be treated by the court as a payment. Technically, payment can be made only in money. It is defined in the Civil Code to be "performance of an obligation for the delivery of money only." Section 1478. Payment may, however, be made in merchandise, or any commodity other than money which the parties to the transaction agree shall be accepted as payment, but the consent of the creditor to accept as payment the thing received is as essential as the purpose of the debtor that it shall have that effect. "The acceptance of any valuable thing in discharge of the debt amounts to payment, but it is the distinct agreement of the creditor to accept the thing in discharge of the debt that gives it the character of payment. Without this, the transaction is regarded either as furnishing matter of set-off, or as security collateral to the original debt, according as the subject received is in possession or in action." Covely v. Fox, 11 Pa. St. 174. But although the receipt of a commodity by a creditor from his debtor at an agreed valuation, with the agreement that the sale shall be applied in a credit upon the debt, is equivalent to a payment, both of these elements are wanting here. If it was the purpose of Hemme to transfer the stock in part satisfaction or in payment of his obligation to the bank, such purpose was ineffectual without the assent of the bank.

Inasmuch as no express agreement between the parties, relative to the character of the transaction, and no statement by them, or either of them, of the character in which it should be treated, was shown at the trial, we are compelled to determine their rights according to the principles of law applicable to such a transaction, in the absence of any agreement. In other words, we are to ascertain what legal presumption would arise from the transaction, in view of the circumstances under which it was had, having reference, also, to the relation which the parties held to each other. If there had been no previous relations between them, the deposit of the stock would constitute a mere bailment, for there is nothing indicative of a gift, and it is not pretended that such was the intention of either of the parties. The owner of property remains such until he is divested of his ownership by law, or by his voluntary act. The mere transfer of his property to another does not divest him of his ownership, unless such was his intent, and manifested by suitable acts. If the person to whom the transfer is made is his creditor, his ownership will none the less be retained, in the absence of any evidence respecting his motives in making the transfer; and even if it was his purpose to divest himself of his title thereto, or to make a transfer in satisfaction or payment of his obligation, either in whole or in part, such purpose would be ineffectual without the consent of the creditor to receive it therefor. Yet, as it must be presumed that the parties to such transaction made the transfer for some purpose, and as their act is entitled to receive consideration, the transaction will be regarded as having been made in accordance with their presumed motive. The law will make the inference therefrom that by the transaction they intended to effect that which would be of mutual benefit to each, without causing a loss to either, or giving to either an advantage which would not be presumed to have been within their contemplation. Hence, when a debtor deposits property with his creditor, in the absence of any showing as to the purpose with which the deposit is made or received, it is presumed that it was intended as a collateral security for the debt. Unless there is some evidence tending to show an intention on the part of the debtor to give, and also on the part of the creditor to receive, the property in satisfaction of the debt, either in whole or in part, the law presumes that it is given only as a collateral security. Especially does this presumption arise if the property given is itself a chose in action, or a security of a different nature from the debt, whose value is neither intrinsic nor apparent, and is not agreed upon by the parties, for the reason, as was said by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Leas v. James, 10 Serg. & R. 315: "Such assignment is not in its nature a payment. It puts no money in the hands of the creditor, but only gives him the means of collecting money from another." The duty of establishing the contrary is affirmative, and it rests upon the debtor. If he fails to perform this duty, the law makes the positive inference that the assignment is only as collateral security. Jones, Pledges, § 17; Colebrooke, Collat. Sec. § 29; Eby v. Hoopes, 1 Penny. 177; Bayard v. Shunk, 1 Watts & S. 94; Stone v. Miller, 16 Pa. St. 450; Perit v. Pittfield, 5 Rawle, 166; Caldwell v. Fifield, 24 N. J. Law, 150; Sutphen v. Cushman, 35 Ill. 186; Harris v. Lombard, 60 Miss. 29. The debtor cannot make his creditor a forced purchaser of the property, or compel him to exchange his obligation for the property transferred; and this is eminently the case where no value is agreed upon, or even spoken of, at the time of the transfer. The burden is always upon the debtor to show that a substituted performance of his obligation to pay money was accepted by the creditor as the equivalent of payment, or in satisfaction of the obligation. Taking the promissory note of a third party from the debtor will always be regarded as given for collateral security, unless proof is made that it was given and received as payment. Brown v. Olmsted, 50 Cal. 162. "The mere acceptance by the creditor of a negotiable note of a third person makes it but collateral security. When such note is given for a pre-existing debt, the presumption is that it was not the intention of the parties that it should operate as an immediate and absolute satisfaction and discharge of the debt; and nothing short of an actual agreement, or some evidence from which a positive inference of discharge can be made, will suffice to produce such effect." Wilhelm v. Schmidt, 84 Ill. 187.

There is no evidence in the record herein which tends to rebut this presumption that the stock of the water company was taken and held by the defendant as collateral security for the debt of Hemme. Hemme testified that in March, 1880, when Flood sent for him, and demanded the stock, he went out, and brought in a certificate for 24,000 shares, which stood in the name of his wife, and that at Flood's request he thereupon caused it to be transferred on the books of the corporation to the name of Bailey, and then delivered the certificate to Flood; that he estimated the stock to be of the value of from $2.50 to $3 per share; that nothing was said, either by Flood or himself, about the value of the stock, or concerning the amount with which he should be credited therefor, nor was anything said as to the amount of the purchase price, or any sum, fixed at which he should be allowed credit upon his account; that in June, 1880, Flood, having learned that he had 4,000 other shares of stock, again sent for him, and demanded this stock, also; and that, after having it transferred into the name of Bailey, he brought the certificates to the bank, and laid them down on the desk, in front of Flood, and walked out, without saying anything, and that no mention was then made of money or price to be allowed him therefor. This is, in substance, all the evidence of what was said by either Flood or Hemme at the time of the transaction, and in the absence of any statement or agreement by the parties concerning the relations thereafter to be held by them, respectively, to the stock, it becomes necessary to apply the foregoing principles of law to determine that relation. For this purpose it is also proper to consider the relations which Hemme and the bank held to each other, as well as any circumstances which would give to Flood a reason for demanding the stock, or to Hemme a reason for delivering it. Hemme was still heavily indebted to the bank upon the obligations for which he had given various collateral securities in 1877, many of which were still held by the bank, undisposed of. His indebtedness at that time amounted to several hundred thousand dollars, and Flood had said to him that, if he would give him what securities he had, he would carry him through. Accordingly, Hemme turned over to the bank a line of securities whose value was estimated to be nearly $400,000, and the bank thereafter proceeded to realize upon them, but they were insufficient to meet the amount of the indebtedness. In view of the fact that Flood's agreement with Hemme was based upon the implied promise of Hemme that he would turn over what he had, we find ample reason for Flood, when he learned that Hemme had this water stock, to demand that it should be turned over to him, and also for Hemme to comply therewith; and, even if there were no other evidence in the case, it would follow that the bank would be regarded as holding the stock in the same capacity as it held the property which was turned over to it in 1877. There is no evidence in the record tending to show that the transfer in 1877 had any other character or effect than to operate as a collateral security for the indebtedness, and the relation of the parties at the time it was made as well as the interview between Flood and Hemme prior thereto, and the subsequent dealings of the bank with the property, as well as the statement of some of the plaintiff's witnesses, are confirmatory of the presumption that it was held as collateral security for that debt. The notes of Hemme, by which that indebtedness was evidenced, were retained by the bank after the transfer was made, and it does not appear that any credit was indorsed thereon, or that any amount was placed to the credit of Hemme's account, except as the various securities were realized upon from time to time. In Sutphen v. Cushman, supra, the supreme court of Illinois said: "The appellant was indebted to the appellee at the time the conveyance was made, and there is no evidence whatever of the discharge of that indebtedness. The bond and note by which the greater portion of it was evidenced were retained by the appellee, as well as the Lighthall notes, which had been pledged as security, and the payment of the indebtedness might have been enforced at any time thereafter. Until the contrary is shown the presumption is that the indebtedness was not satisfied by the conveyance. And absolute certainty in regard to the facts takes the place of presumption, in case the creditor retains the evidences of the indebtedness, the securities pledged for its payment, and collects the money due upon such securities." In the present case the indebtedness of Hemme was retained upon the books of the bank as one of its assets, and the retention of the notes by the bank, without any indorsement of payment thereon, is persuasive evidence that it was the intention of the parties that the indebtedness should remain for its full amount until it should be reduced by the application of the proceeds resulting from the sale of the securities. In the absence of any evidence tending to show an agreement to reduce the indebtedness by any fixed amount, this is the necessary presumption, for it is not to be supposed that the bank became the owner of the property turned over to it, and at the same time held the indebtedness against Hemme for its full amount; and, in the absence of any agreement regarding the amount for which the property had been accepted by the bank, there would be no means of determining that the indebtedness had been reduced in any amount. In any attempt to enforce the indebtedness against Hemme, he could have compelled the bank to first exhaust these securities before calling upon him for any deficiency, whereas, if the bank was the owner of the securities, he would have had no such right, and the bank could enforce its indebtedness for the full amount, and still remain entitled to the property turned over to it by him. We have carefully examined the record, and are satisfied that there was no evidence before the court to sustain its finding that the defendant was the owner of the stock in question, and for that reason its judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

KOHLER v. AGASSIZ et al. (No. 14,197.)

ATTACHMENT AGAINST NONRESIDENT—SUBSCRIPTION TO CORPORATE STOCK—PROCEDURE.

1. A complaint in an action by the assignee of an insolvent corporation alleged that defendants subscribed for 500 shares of capital stock of $100 each, and agreed to pay the par value thereof at such times as, under the laws of the state, they might be called upon to pay the same; that they received the stock; that the corporation had been adjudged an insolvent; and that the full amount of the stock subscription would be insufficient to pay the debts. The prayer was for an account of the debts of the corporation; that it be decreed that the whole amount of the subscriptions were necessary to pay the debts; and that judgment be rendered against defendants for the sum owing by them. Held, that the complaint showed the action to be "upon a contract, express or implied," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 537, providing for an attachment against a nonresident defendant in such an action.

2. In such a case it is not necessary that the specific amount claimed to be due be shown by the complaint, nor by the contract itself, but, under Code Civil Proc. § 538, it must appear from the affidavit for attachment.

3. A motion to dissolve an attachment does not reach defects in the complaint.

4. Where persons subscribe for a certain number of shares of stock in a corporation, and agree to pay $100 for each share, in such installments and at such times as, under the laws of the state, they may be required to pay the same, a decree in chancery or an assessment by the board of directors is not necessary in order to sustain an attachment against such persons as nonresidents in an action to recover on the contract of subscription.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by Charles Kohler, assignee, against A. E. R. Agassiz, Quincy A. Shaw, and others. From an order refusing to dissolve an attachment issued against said Agassiz and Shaw, they appeal. Affirmed.

Edward J. Pringle, for appellants. Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court refusing to dissolve an attachment. The action is brought by the assignee of an insolvent corporation, organized under the laws of the state of California, against Agassiz, Shaw, and a number of others, to recover the balance due from them severally upon their subscriptions to the capital stock of the company.

The point made by appellants (Agassiz and Shaw) is "that the cause of action is not an attachable cause of action." So much of the affidavit of the plaintiff upon which the writ of attachment issued, as is essential here, is as follows: "Defendants A. E. Agassiz and Quincy A. Shaw in the said action are indebted to him in the sum of thirty-five thousand dollars, lawful money of the United States, over and above all legal set-offs and counterclaims, upon an express contract, for the direct payment of money, to wit, a subscription by said defendants to the capital stock of said California Land and Timber Company, which said subscription has been duly assigned in the matter of said corporation in insolvency to plaintiff, and that such contract was made and is payable in this state, and that the payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property, or any pledge upon personal property. That both said defendants reside in the state of Massachusetts, and neither of them resides in the state of California. That the said attachment is not sought, and the said action is not prosecuted, to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or creditors of the said defendant." The statements of the affidavit are more ample than are required by statute in support of an attachment against a nonresident of the state.

The several subdivisions of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure provide that the plaintiff may have the property of the defendant attached "in an action upon a contract, express or implied, against a defendant not residing in this state." In the case of resident defendants, the right to the writ is only given in cases of contract made or payable in this state, and other limitations are prescribed, not mentioned as necessary in the case of nonresident defendants. There is also a marked difference in the requirement of the affidavit as between resident and nonresident defendants. As to the latter, it is only required to show "that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff, (specifying the amount of such indebtedness over and above all legal set-offs or counterclaims,) and that the defendant is a nonresident of the state; and (3) that the attachment is not sought, and the action is not prosecuted, to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor of the defendant." As against a nonresident defendant, the affidavit is not required to show that the payment of the claim is not secured by mortgage lien or pledge, or that it is upon a contract made or payable in this state, or upon a contract for the direct payment of money, or even upon a contract at all. The right to an attachment is only given by the statute quoted, supra, "in an action upon a contract, express or implied;" hence it can only properly issue in such an action, but that fact is not required to be shown by the affidavit. The right to an attachment, and the mode of procedure for obtaining it, are the creatures of statute, depending for their existence and regularity upon the terms of the Code.

The attachment laws of the several states differ each from the other in so many particulars that without the utmost caution in comparing their provisions with our own we are in constant danger of being led astray or unduly influenced by decisions apparently in point, but in reality resting upon a different basis. Even our own adjudicated cases, many of them growing out of questions applicable to resident debtors, have no proper application to the different status occupied by nonresidents. An attachment may be said to have been properly issued when so issued in a case provided for by section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is regularly issued when the requirements of sections 538 and 539 are complied with. The right to an attachment being given, and the mode of its exercise prescribed by the statute, and the latter being exclusive, must be held to so far limit the right that it can only be enjoyed in the manner and to the extent provided for its enforcement. The Code provides that a writ of attachment may be discharged by giving a bond on behalf of the defendant. It also gives him the right to apply to the court or judge for a discharge of the writ, upon the ground that the same was improperly or irregularly issued. The irregularities which will warrant the discharge of the writ will usually appear upon the face of the affidavit or undertaking, or, where properly but prematurely issued, by a comparison with the summons and complaint. Where, however, the attachment has improperly issued,—that is to say, in a case not provided for by the statute,—the evidence must usually be sought dehors the papers upon which it is evidently founded. It is not understood that the appellants here base their contention on any alleged irregularities in the mode of procuring the attachment, but rather that it was improperly issued,—that it issued in a case not provided for by law. For evidence in support of this contention we are referred to the complaint on file. The complaint shows that the California Land & Timber Company is, and since 1885 has been, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California for the purpose of carrying on a general lumber business, etc., having a capital stock of $1,000,000, divided into 10,000 shares of the par value of $100 each; that defendants Agassiz and Shaw jointly subscribed for 500 shares of said capital stock, and then and thereby agreed and promised to receive the same from the corporation, and to pay therefor the par value thereof, to wit, $100 for each and every share thereof, "in such installments, and at such times, as said defendants might, under and according to the laws of the said state of California, be lawfully called upon and required by said corporation to pay the same, and then and there did pay said corporation the sum of $15,000 on account of and in part payment of said 500 shares;" that defendants still own and hold the stock, and that no part of the sum agreed by them to be paid has been so paid except $15,000, as aforesaid, and that $35,000 is due and owing and unpaid by defendants; that in November, 1887, the corporation became and was duly adjudged an insolvent, and plaintiff was duly appointed the assignee of the company, and duly qualified as such. The property of the corporation is incumbered by mortgages, judgments, attachment liens, etc., in excess of its value, and owes $295,000 of unsecured debts in addition. Some of the defendants are insolvent, and, as plaintiff believes, the full amount of the subscriptions of the defendants will be insufficient to pay the debts of the corporation. The prayer is that an account may be had of the debts and liabilities of the corporation, and that it be decreed that the whole amount of the subscriptions is necessary to pay the debts and liabilities of the corporation, and that plaintiff have judgment against the defendants for the sum owing by them, and for such other and further relief as may be proper, etc.

It will be observed that the action is not brought to recover an assessment eo nomine, levied by the corporation upon the stock of the company, but counts upon a contract by which they agree to pay for their stock in such installments and at such times as said defendants might under the laws of California be lawfully called upon and required by said corporation to pay the same. Under the laws of California a stockholder may be lawfully called upon and required to pay assessments upon his stock to the extent of 10 per cent. of the par value thereof, except where the whole capital is not paid up, in which case he may be required, if the liabilities of the company demand it, to pay by way of assessment the full amount unpaid upon the capital stock. Civil Code, § 332. A stockholder may expressly agree to pay the amount of his subscription immediately, or at stated times, and thus relieve the corporation of the duty of making calls. He will be liable to pay upon such contract according to its terms. Phoenix Warehousing Co. v. Badger, 67 N. Y. 296-300; Spel. Corp. § 555. It is matter of common knowledge that in this state corporations, and especially mining corporations, are in the habit of setting aside for sale at some established price a portion of their capital stock for the purpose of raising what is termed "working capital," or a fund to be devoted to the development of their property. Assessments must be uniform, and under our laws must be levied upon all the capital stock. By this method of selling a portion of their stock companies may make such contracts with purchasers as to price, time, and manner of payment, etc., as may be agreed upon, and for nonpayment of the agreed price for stock in such cases an action at law may be maintained. So an agreement to take stock in a corporation to be organized presently may be enforced by the corporation after its organization. Electric Light, etc., Co. v. Johnson, 93 Cal. 538, 29 Pac. Rep. 126; West v. Crawford, 80 Cal. 19, 21 Pac. Rep. 1123. The allegation of the complaint in reference to payment for the shares "in such installments, and at such times, as said defendants might, under the laws of the state of California, be lawfully called upon and required by said corporation to pay the same," is simply a limitation as to the amount which defendants could be called upon to pay at a single payment, and as to the time at which such payments might lawfully be demanded, and did not prescribe the manner of its collection.

We are not called to turn this inquiry into a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that it is ambiguous, unintelligible, or uncertain, but simply to determine whether (1) the complaint showed the action to be founded upon contract, express or implied; (2) whether it states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants; and, if not, (3) does it appear therefrom that it can be so amended as to state a cause of action upon contract? As against a nonresident debtor, these questions being answered in the affirmative, we must not concern ourselves further with the complaint. We are of opinion that the complaint is sufficient in these respects, and that the affidavit is ample to warrant the writ. The affidavit for the attachment shows the specific amount claimed to be due. It is unnecessary that the complaint should show this amount; there is no such requirement in the statute. Nor is it necessary that the contract itself should show the amount due. Dunn v. Mackey, 80 Cal. 107, 22 Pac. Rep. 64. A statement in the complaint, therefore, as to the specific amount claimed to be due, would not aid the attachment. Such a statement in the complaint would be of no greater weight than the statement in the affidavit. It would be as much a matter of opinion or conclusion in the one case as in the other. The complaint does show that the action is upon contract, and not in tort. It shows that the defendants received the stock, for which they promised to pay. This being the case, it is immaterial that the prayer of the complaint is for an accounting. Even on demurrer to the complaint the defendants cannot object to the prayer, and certainly, so long as the complaint contains every essential of an action upon contract, they cannot, upon motion for an attachment, accomplish what they could not upon demurrer. A motion to dissolve the attachment cannot reach defects in the complaint. But it is claimed that there can be no attachable cause of action until after a decree in chancery, or an assessment by the board of directors; that an assessment is a necessary element of an attachable cause of action upon a subscription like the one in the case at bar. We do not think the terms of the agreement warrant this contention. The defendants agreed to pay $100 for each and every share of stock, in such installments, and at such times, as they might, under the laws of this state, be lawfully called upon by the corporation to pay. This provision does not say anything about the manner in which the corporation should call upon them; it simply provides for the times and amounts of payments. It is provided in the Code that, where it is necessary to pay the debts, the full amounts of the subscriptions may be called for; and the complaint here shows that this condition exists,—that the whole amount is necessary. In Hotel Co. v. Calender, 94 Cal. 120, 29 Pac. Rep. 859, the contract was to pay "at such times, and in such manner, as may be determined by the board of directors of said corporation, to be hereafter chosen." The court held that it was not necessary to a recovery on the contract of subscription that the directors of the corporation should have levied assessments upon the stock in the mode prescribed by the Civil Code. Glenn v. Saxton, 68 Cal. 353, 9 Pac. Rep. 420, cited by appellants, was an action to recover an assessment. The court cannot assume that the corporation may turn out not to be insolvent. That question has been conclusively adjudicated by the judgment of a competent court. Furthermore, it is expressly alleged that more than all the solvent subscriptions will be needed to enable the assignee to pay the debts and liabilities of the corporation. Under the laws of this state, we think there can be no serious question as to the right of the assignee who succeeds to all the rights of the insolvent to enforce them as fully as the insolvent could have done before the insolvency. If there had been no insolvency, the corporation could have maintained the suit, if we are right in the views above expressed, without levying an assessment. Sections 17, 18, 21, Insolvent Act.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re SMITH'S ESTATE. (No. 15,198.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 11, 1893.)
APPEALABLE ORDERS — PERMITTING AMENDMENT OF STATEMENT ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL — NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. An appeal does not lie from an order permitting the amendment of a statement used on motion for a new trial from a judgment refusing the probate of a will, as such judgment is not a "final judgment," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 963, subd. 2, providing that an appeal will lie "from any special order made after final judgment."

2. Where, in a contest over the probate of a will on the ground that the testator was of unsound mind at the time of making it, the evidence is in substantial conflict as to such issue, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting a new trial from a judgment refusing the probate.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Proceeding by Harry R. Smith and Allie W. Plumb against Octavia S. Smith to contest the probate of the will of John B. Smith, deceased, on the ground of mental incapacity of the testator. There was judgment refusing the probate. From an order permitting proponent to amend her statement used on motion for a new trial, and from an order granting a new trial, contestants appeal. Dismissed as to order permitting amendment. Affirmed as to order granting a new trial.

James W. Oates, Emmet Seawell, and J. P. Rogers, for appellants. Lippitt & Lippitt and A. B. Ware, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This was a contest in the court below over the probate of the alleged will of John B. Smith. The contest was inaugurated by Harry R. Smith and Allie W. Plumb, son and daughter of deceased, upon the grounds that at the date of the execution of the will (December 28, 1878) said testator was not of sound and disposing mind and memory. There were other objections to the will, but the evidence was confined to the one above stated, upon which the contest was determined; hence the others are unimportant here. Upon the objection stated, the following issue or question was submitted to the jury: "Was John B. Smith of sound and disposing mind and memory when he made the proposed will, to wit, on December 28, 1878?" To this the jury returned for answer, "No." A decree was entered January 27, 1892, (the day the verdict was filed,) adjudicating that said John B. Smith, at the date of the execution of the will, (December 28, 1878,) was not of sound and disposing mind and memory, and refusing to admit the alleged will to probate. Octavia Susie Smith, the proponent, in due time gave notice of a motion for a new trial, upon the grounds: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (2) errors of law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the proponents of the will. A statement in support of the motion was settled and allowed by the judge, and filed June 13, 1892, and, on the 24th day of June following, the motion for a new trial was argued, and taken under advisement by the court. On the 9th day of July thereafter, the attorneys for proponent gave notice of a motion to amend the specifications of error and insufficiency of the evidence in their statement on motion in important particulars, whereupon, on motion, the court set aside the order of submission of the motion for a new trial, and on the 25th day of July, 1892, granted the motion to amend the specifications, against numerous objections on the part of plaintiffs, (contestants,) among which objections were: (1) That no affidavit or evidence of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, excusable neglect, or fraud was furnished to the court; (2) because it was not proposed to set aside the certificate of the judge settling the statement; (3) because the statement had been settled by the judge, and there was no motion to set aside or cancel the same; (4) because the several proposed amendments raise new questions not raised by the original specifications. The action of the court in the several steps was objected to in ample form, and the rulings duly excepted to. The motion for a new trial was again submitted under the statement as amended, and a new trial was granted. This appeal is from the order granting a new trial, and from the order amending the statement on motion for a new trial. Virtually, there are two appeals,—one from the order amending the statement; the other from the order granting a new trial.

The first question presented is as to the right of appeal from the order amending the statement. Counsel for appellants contend that the appeal is properly taken from both orders under subdivision 2, § 963, Code Civil Proc. The subdivision of section 963 referred to provides for an appeal from various enumerated orders, among which are "from an order granting or refusing a new trial," and "from any special order made after final judgment." It is urged that the judgment refusing to admit the will to probate is a final judgment, within the purview of the Code, and, as the order permitting the amendment to the statement was subsequent thereto in point of time, it is "a special order made after final judgment," and hence appealable. In Estate of Calahan, 60 Cal. 232, which was an appeal from an order of the superior court vacating a decree of distribution and settlement of the final account of the executor, this court, in determining whether or not the order was appealable, held that the orders in probate proceedings from which an appeal would lie were only those enumerated in the third subdivision of section 963, Code Civil Proc., and in referring to the provision in subdivision 2 of the section, which gives an appeal from "a special order made after final judgment," said: "But we think that the final judgment there referred to is the one mentioned in subdivision 1, viz. a final judgment in an action or special proceeding commenced in a superior court, or brought into a superior court from another court. It seems to us quite clear that the appealable judgments and orders made in probate proceedings are all enumerated in subdivision 3, and, as this order is not therein mentioned, it is not an appealable order." In Estate of Walkerly, 94 Cal. 352, 29 Pac. Rep. 719, the court, through McFarland, J., said: "The general rule is well established that appeals can only be taken from such judgments or orders in probate proceedings as are mentioned in subdivision 3 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure." The court further added as follows: "And that the order here appealed from is not a 'special order made after final judgment,' within the meaning of the second subdivision of said section 963, is also settled by the authorities first above cited. Estate of Dean, 62 Cal. 613; In re Moore's Estate, 86 Cal. 58, 24 Pac. Rep. 816; Estate of Wiard, 83 Cal. 619, 24 Pac. Rep. 45; Estate of Calahan, 60 Cal. 232. If it were otherwise, the third subdivision of said section could be entirely disregarded by simply assuming that a probate order not therein mentioned was a final judgment, and that an order refusing to vacate it was a "special order made after final judgment." In Estate of Bauquier, 88 Cal. 302, 26 Pac. Rep. 178, 532, this court held that "the provisions in subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes an appeal to be taken to the supreme court 'from an order granting or refusing a new trial,' embraces all such orders, whether made in probate proceedings or in civil actions." The reasons for the opinion are given therein, and need not be repeated here. The later case of Estate of Walkerly, cited supra, plainly indicates an intention in cases like the present to adhere to the former rulings of this court upon the subject of appeals from probate proceedings by confining such appeals to the cases enumerated in the third subdivision of section 963, except as clearly provided for by other sections of the Code. The statutory proceedings provided for in probate matters lead up to numerous independent decisions, some of which possess most, if not all, the essential requisites of a judgment. The question is, are they such final judgments as are contemplated by the Code when it gives an appeal from a special order made after final judgment? A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding. Code Civil Proc. § 577. "Every direction of a court or judge made or entered in writing, and not included in a judgment, is denominated an 'order.'" Id. § 1003. The supreme court, in Loring v. Illsley, 1 Cal.

27, in discussing the distinction between an order and a final judgment, said: "The former [an order] is a decision made during the progress of the cause, either prior or subsequent to final judgment, settling some point of practice or some question collateral to the main issue presented by the proceedings, and necessary to be disposed of before such issue can be passed upon by the court, or necessary to be determined in carrying the execution into effect." In Gilman v. Contra Costa Co., 8 Cal. 57, it was said: "An order is the judgment or conclusion of the court upon any motion or proceeding. It means cases where a court or judge grants affirmative relief, and cases where affirmative relief is denied." Every order of a court or judge is in one sense a judgment. In New York it was held that a decision upon a demurrer was a judgment. King v. Stafford, 5 How. Pr. 30. But it is not a judgment from which an appeal can be taken. Elwell v. Johnson, 74 N. Y. 80. The term "final judgment," from which an appeal can be taken under the first subdivision of section 963, Code Civil Proc., evidently means the ultimate or last judgment which puts an end to the suit or proceeding. In Metcalf's Case, 11 Coke, 68, "it was resolved that no writ of error lies till the last judgment." Lord Ellenborough declared in Samuel v. Judin, 6 East, 333: "Error can only be brought on final judgment." If the term "final judgment," as used in the first subdivision of section 963, applies to "a judgment or order admitting or refusing to admit a will to probate," then an appeal would lie to this court therefrom, under such first subdivision, and the provision in the third subdivision would be surplusage. We think the term "final judgment," as used in the section under consideration, applies only to those judgments known at common law as "final judgments," and that, as to the statutory determinations termed "orders or judgments" defined in the third subdivision, the term "final judgment" does not apply; hence the right to appeal is expressly given from certain of such "orders or judgments." As they are not final judgments, a special order made subsequent to their entry is not appealable, for the right to appeal from the special orders is only given in case of those made after final judgment. The appeal from the order permitting the amendment of the statement, not being an appealable order, should be dismissed.

Upon a careful survey of the whole testimony embodied in the statement on motion for a new trial, it cannot be said there was an abuse of discretion by the court below in granting the motion for a new trial. Much of the evidence upon which the theory of insanity was based related to a period ranging from 15 to 18 years prior to the execution of the will, and was not conclusive in character, being a relation of facts and a description of conduct which might result either from a disordered mind or from uncontrolled passion. That subsequent to that time, and for a period of many years, he was a prudent, careful, shrewd man of business, accumulating property, and managing it with discretion, is abundantly proven. That he was a man of objectionable personal habits is apparent. Perhaps the court below was of opinion that evidence, uncontradicted, of capacity to accumulate property, to purchase, hold, sell, and convey with acumen, was evidence of capacity to convey to take effect after death, which is all there is of a will. Perhaps there was something in the attitude or appearance of the witnesses for contestant, or in their manner of testifying, that led the court, in the exercise of a wise discretion, to conclude that the matters in issue should again undergo investigation. It is sufficient for us to know that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence, and that the judge, who was entirely familiar with all its details, and in a much better position to give due weight to all its parts, has exercised the discretion conferred upon him by granting a new trial. To analyze the evidence in detail, and express an opinion of the value of its several parts, might tend to influence the result in a retrial of the issues of fact. This is not desired. On the contrary, the cause should be again tried, as though it had never before undergone investigation. It is recommended that the appeal, so far as it purports to be an appeal from the order permitting the amendment of the statement, be dismissed, and that the order appealed from granting a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal from the order permitting the amendment of the statement is dismissed, and the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

98 Cal. 591

FLOYD et al. v. DAVIS et al. (No. 14,551.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1893.)

TRUSTS—CONSTRUCTION—INTEREST—ATTORNEYS' FEES—DISTRIBUTION.

1. Where property was left in trust, with provisions for the payment out of the proceeds of various sums to several institutions in the order named, with residue to other institutions, interest will not be allowed, to the detriment of the residue, to one of the institutions for which a special sum was to be paid, where for a time there were no funds from which to pay the institution, and where, after that, delay in payment was due to its unauthorized refusal to accept anything unless the entire amount was paid to it in a lump sum.

2. Under the provision of the trust deed that out of the proceeds of the trust fund there should be erected statuary "well worth $100,000," an item for models, which proved unsatisfactory and were rejected, should not be deducted from the $100,000, but from the main trust fund.

3. Under the provision that $150,000 should be expended in the erection and maintenance of free baths, under the direction of certain trustees, compensation of the trustees for services relative to the baths should be charged to the bath fund.

4. Under the provision that $700,000 should be expended for purchasing land and constructing and putting thereon a telescope, expenditures for attorneys' services for the express benefit of the telescope fund, and expenses for traveling on the business connected with the telescope, should be charged to the fund therefor.

5. In an action brought by the trustees against the beneficiaries for settlement of their accounts, and for leave to make a partial distribution to the residuary donees, where the various parties asked for allowances for interest, expenses, etc., each trust should be charged with its own attorneys' fees.

6. Under the provisions of a trust deed, that, after making the various specific payments in the order named therein, the residue should be turned over to certain institutions, the court had no authority to order payments to the residuary donees before the discharge of the other trusts, though it could be done without possibility of injury to them.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Richard S. Floyd and others against Horace Davis and others. Decree, from which defendants appeal. Reversed.

S. W. Holladay, John H. Boalt, Nathaniel Holland, and Harold Wheeler, for appellants. Horace W. Philbrook, Ira P. Rankin, John O. Earl, and Boyd, Fifield & Hoburg, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs, as surviving trustees of the James Lick trust, against the various beneficiaries under the trust deed, for two purposes: (1) That the accounts of the trustees might be examined, allowed, and settled, and their administration of the trust sanctioned; (2) that they might have the permission of the court to pay over to the California Academy of Sciences and the Society of California Pioneers, residuary donees, a part of what would in the end be coming to them. This application involved a modification of a prior decree, which had declared that no money or property was to be paid or transferred to the residuary donees until the preceding trusts should have been fully executed and performed. This application on their part arose from the fact that by the sale of the Lick House property in October, 1888, they had become possessed of ample funds to complete all the prior trusts, and to pay over to the residuary donees a large part of what would be coming to them. The various beneficiaries named in the trust deed appeared by answer and cross complaint, and the trial resulted in a decree of the court settling the accounts of the trustees up to the 6th day of September, 1889, and granting them permission to pay the said residuaries, the Pioneers and Academy of Sciences, $300,000 each. The decree also allowed the School of Mechanical Arts interest upon the sum of $535,000 from October, 1888, that sum being the amount due from the trustees for the purpose of founding the school. Various allowances were also made from the main trust fund for the payment of attorneys' fees and other expenses. From the foregoing decree of the court the Pioneers and Academy of Sciences have appealed upon the following grounds: (1) In deciding and adjudging the sum of $1,025, expenses incurred for legal services on account of the telescope, to be charged to the general fund, and in diminution of the residue. (2) In deciding and adjudging that the fees allowed to the attorneys, John H. Boalt, John B. Mhoon, and Horace W. Philbrook, aggregating $1,750, be paid out of and charged to the general fund in diminution of the residue, instead of making the fees of said attorneys payable by their respective clients. (3) In deciding and adjudging that the $661 disbursed by the president of the Lick trustees for expenses in traveling to Cleveland, Ohio, on the special business of the Lick telescope, be paid out and charged to the general fund in diminution of the residue, and not out of the telescope fund. (4) In deciding and adjudging that the $849.90, expenses incurred by the trustees for models, etc., of the historical statuary, be paid out of and charged to the general fund in diminution of the residue, and not charged to the special trust providing for such statuary. (5) In deciding and adjudging that interest be allowed to said California School of Mechanical Arts. And (6) in deciding and adjudging that $3,500 shall be paid to Rankin and Earl, trustees of the bath house trust, out of the general fund. The School of Mechanical Arts has also appealed from that part of the decree (1) permitting the Lick trustees immediately to pay over to the California Academy of Sciences and to the Society of California Pioneers the sum of $300,000 each before their execution of the other trusts precedent mentioned in the trust deed; (2) from that part of the said decree which fixes the date of October 5, 1888, as the date from which interest is to be paid on the sum of $535,000, provided in the fourteenth trust, these defendants claiming that interest should be allowed on said balance from the 31st day of December, 1884, to the final payment of the whole of said balance.

The trust deed of James Lick measures the powers of the trustees, and is their warrant of authority. Under that deed it is made their duty to convert the trust property into money, and out of the proceeds, among other things: "Three. To expend the sum of $700,000 for the purpose of purchasing land and constructing and putting upon such land a powerful telescope, (superior to and more powerful than any telescope ever yet made.)" "Eleven. To expend the sum of $150,000 * * * in the erection and maintaining in the city of San Francisco of free baths, under the direction of certain trustees, [naming them,] with authority to purchase sites," etc. "Thirteen. To erect, under the supervision of the said parties of the second part and their successors, at the city hall in the city and county of San Francisco, a group of bronze statuary, well worth $100,000. Fourteen. To found and endow, at a cost of $540,000, an institution to be called the 'California School of Mechanical Arts,' the object and purposes of which shall be * * *. The institution shall be founded and endowed under the direction of J. D. B. Stillman, Horace Davis, A. S. Hallidie, John Oscar Eldridge, John O. Earl, and Hon. Lorenzo Sawyer, and the survivors of them, who are directed to acquire the site thereof, and form a corporation * * *." "Eighteen. After discharging the trusts and making the payments hereinbefore mentioned in the order heretofore set forth, to make over and transfer the residue of the proceeds of the property hereby transferred and conveyed, and intended to be, in equal proportions, to the California Academy of Sciences and the Society of California Pioneers."

It appears that since the sale of the Lick House property in October, 1888, the trustees have had ample funds to carry into execution the various trusts not fully administered. For reasons hereafter noticed, they cannot be charged with laches as to the founding of the School of Mechanical Arts; and as to the causes which have prevented them since the date that funds have come into their hands from erecting the statuary at the city hall, and finally closing up the telescope, free bath, and other trusts, we have no knowledge, as this appeal is before us upon a judgment roll, which does not include the evidence. As to the conduct of these various trusts by the trustees the court has found "that all the trusts provided for in said trust deed have been executed as speedily as practicable by the plaintiffs and their predecessors, who have at all times performed their duties diligently, faithfully, honestly, intelligently, and economically; and that, although there has been a great delay in executing the trust contained in the trust deed, * * * said delay did not occur through any fault or neglect of said trustees." This is a finding that the trustees have thus far done their work faithfully, diligently, and well. It is not attacked by any of the parties interested, and, as already stated, the evidence upon which it is based is not before us; hence we are not in a position to review the finding.

It was error in the trial court to allow interest to the School of Mechanical Arts upon the money coming to that corporation, and to charge the amount of such interest to the general fund of the trustees, thereby reducing pro tanto the residue to which the Academy of Sciences and Society of Pioneers are entitled. The School of Mechanical Arts insists that interest should have been allowed it from a time long prior to 1888. A complete answer to this contention is that the Lick trustees had no funds in their hands prior to October, 1888, to which the school was entitled, and, in the absence of inexcusable delay on the part of the trustees in carrying out the various prior trusts, (and we do not hold that such delay would justify it,) no principle of law or justice would entitle the school to interest when no funds were on hand applicable to its objects and purposes. The doctrine of Floyd v. Forbes, 71 Cal. 588, 12 Pac. Rep. 726, completely destroys appellants' contention in this regard, for in that case interest was denied the telescope trust, although the funds which were to be applied to the execution of that trust were in the hands of the trustees. Floyd v. Forbes is also squarely opposed to the decree of the trial court in allowing interest to the School of Mechanical Arts upon the amount of its endowment fund from October, 1888. It was held in that case "that the proceeds of the trust property constitute one fund out of which the trustees are to execute the several trusts specified in said deed, and that the profits arising from investments of money in their hands are to be treated as a part of such fund, and not as accruing for the benefit of any of the said trusts in the execution of which a definite sum is required to be paid or expended, so as to increase the amount of such payment or expenditure." The foregoing language of the court has no uncertain meaning, and we can only account for the claims of the School of Mechanical Arts for interest upon the amount to be applied to the execution of its trust, for the reason that Floyd v. Forbes had not been decided when it first advanced such plea. While the learned justice used certain language in the opinion of the court in that case as to "unnecessary or great delay" by the trustees in the execution of the trust, nothing was decided upon that line, but, to the contrary, by the language itself, the court expressly refrained from passing upon the results which would follow to the beneficiaries regarding the accumulated profits if the trustees were guilty of unnecessary delay in carrying out the objects and purposes of James H. Lick, as manifested by his trust deed. Floyd v. Forbes closes every avenue through which interest might be claimed by the School of Mechanical Arts save the single one of delay resulting from neglect upon the part of the Lick trustees to perform their duties under the trust. Inasmuch as the "school" had the right to call to its aid the power of the court to compel a prompt administration of its trust by the Lick trustees, and inasmuch as the trustees had no direct interest in the residue of the trust estate, but all of said residue passes to the Academy of Sciences and Society of California Pioneers, it is not plain that "unnecessary delay" upon the part of the trustees would give the school a right to interest upon the amount coming to it under the trust deed. Certainly, under no aspect of the case could funds be taken from the money received from the Lick House sale to satisfy such claim for interest, for beyond any doubt that would be reducing the residue which Lick intended should be applied in other channels, and the Academy of Sciences and Pioneers have the same rights to the "residue" that the school has to the sum of $540,000. Yet the claims of the school for interest, as indicated by the complaint, are made in no way dependent upon the fact as to whether profits had accumulated upon the main trust fund, but its pleading outlines a right to interest by reason of "great delay" upon the part of the trustees, even though the successful assertion of such rights should deplete the residue of all the original fund derived from the Lick House sale. Such a course can neither be law nor equity. The school has an advantage over the academy and Pioneers in being entitled to priority of payment. In all other respects they stand upon the same plane, and are entitled to the same rights. Neither is favored above the other, and one cannot be allowed to encroach upon the rights of the other. The amount of the residue is entirely immaterial as furnishing light upon the question of the rights of the school to interest. If it is entitled to interest under the law it is entitled to that interest though it drain the main fund, and leave the residuary donees without a dollar. Neither is it clear that accumulated profits arising from unnecessary delay would give the school the right to interest; for, as said in Floyd v. Forbes, the profits from investment pass to the main fund, and become a part thereof. Thus the profits would seem to stand on common ground with the proceeds of sales of real estate, and to be expended only for the same causes. But in the present case we have neither an allegation by the school of unnecessary delay upon the part of the trustees, nor a finding of the court to that effect. The court finds that there was great delay in executing the trust, but that such delay did not occur through any fault or neglect of said trustees. Great delay has occurred, but unnecessary delay has not occurred, and the very delay of which the school now complains, and upon the basis of which it asks interest, may have been occasioned, as far as the record indicates, by the acts of the party now seeking to gain an advantage by reason of such delay.

A second conclusive reason why the school's claims in this regard should be denied is apparent from the record. No funds came to the hands of the trustees which could be applied to the execution of such trust until October, 1888. The school never having become entitled to the principal fund could not have been entitled to interest upon that fund. If authority were necessary to justify a denial of its claims for interest prior to that date, Floyd v. Forbes is that authority. From October, 1888, until October, 1890, the amount to which the school was entitled was in the hands of the Lick trustees, but the school declined to touch the money unless the entire amount was paid to it in a lump sum, and appealed to the court to support its contention to that effect. This position of the school was held untenable by the court, October 7, 1890, in the case of Floyd v. Rankin, 86 Cal. 159, 24 Pac. Rep. 936; consequently the two years of delay occasioned by this litigation is fairly attributable to its own conduct, and it cannot take advantage of its own default or mistake, to the loss of the residuary donees, even though its claims were advanced in the utmost good faith. The date of the decision of Floyd v. Rankin forms the last chapter in the history of this case, viewed by the record before us, and for the reasons given we see nothing to support the decree of the trial court in awarding interest to the School of Mechanical Arts. It is urged in its behalf that the fact of the delay being inevitable, and that the trustees have done their full duty, are equally immaterial. Upon this question the dictum of Floyd v. Forbes, relied upon by the school, indicates to the contrary, and clearly intimates that the unnecessary or great delay which might give it rights to interest should arise from a failure of a proper performance of the trust by the trustees. But, be that as it may, there is nothing in the record, looking at the case from any standpoint, that entitles the School of Mechanical Arts to interest.

It is insisted that an item of $849.90 for models, diagrams, etc., furnished under an advertisement by the trustees, to be used in the erection of the statuary at the city hall, should be charged to the statuary trust, and not to the general trust fund. These articles proved unsatisfactory, and were rejected, and thus were of no assistance in carrying out this trust. The trust deed provided that the group of statuary was to be "well worth $100,000." The meaning of this provision of the deed is that $100,000 should be honestly and intelligently expended in the erection of the statuary. This contested item did not enter into the cost of construction, and in no way added anything to its value. After this money had been expended, the balance, to wit, $99,150, was not sufficient to erect a group of statuary "well worth $100,000." The item should be charged to the main trust fund.

The item of $3,500 for services rendered by Rankin and Earl as trustees in the erection of the free baths should be charged to the bath trust. The trust deed provides that $150,000 is to be expended in the erection and maintaining of free baths. These parties are entitled to compensation as trustees of the free bath trust, but that compensation should come from the trust fund covered by their trust. Their services were rendered in the matter of the erection and maintaining of the free baths, and clearly become a charge upon that trust fund by the language of the trust deed itself.

The items of $1,025 for legal services for the express benefit of the telescope trust, and of $661 traveling expenses of the president of the board of trustees to Cleveland on telescope business, should be charged to the telescope trust. By the trust deed, $700,000 was to be devoted to purchasing a site and constructing the greatest telescope ever made. That was the limit of the appropriation, and the foregoing items were expended in the execution of that trust. Those expenditures were as necessary, and as much a part of the cost of the site and construction, as freight upon material, or labor upon the grounds.

The items of attorneys' fees allowed to attorneys appearing in this action for the various beneficiaries under the trust deed should not be charged to the main trust fund, but are matters standing between those trusts and the attorneys. Plaintiffs brought this action to have their accounts settled, and to have a partial distribution to the residuary donees, the partial distribution being a matter in which the residuary donees were directly interested, and in which the plaintiffs had no special concern. The accounts were found correct, and are approved by the court, but the School of Mechanical Arts filed a cross complaint, asking for affirmative relief. This complaint was controverted by many of the beneficiaries, and others also appeared by answer, asking affirmative relief in the nature of allowances for expenses, attorneys' fees, etc. From that time to the present the action has been transformed into a contest between the various trusts created by the trust deed as against the academy and Pioneers representing the residue, each trust zealously guarding its own interests, possibly some attempting to protect their respective trust funds at the expense of the "residue;" while it has been of equal importance to the "residue" that the various expense accounts should be paid by the secondary trusts. For these reasons each particular trust should be charged with its own attorney's fee.

The court had no authority to order paid to the Academy of Sciences and the Society of California Pioneers $300,000 each as a portion of the "residue" eventually coming to those beneficiaries. While there would be but the slightest possibility of injury resulting to the remaining trusts from such action of the court, and while it is the duty of the trustees to place the funds in their hands to the uses contemplated by the trust deed at the earliest moment consistent with the faithful and intelligent administration of the trust, and while it would be a great convenience to the academy and Pioneers to secure possession of these funds at the present time, all substantial and equitable reasons supporting the decrees made, yet equity is bound by rules of law. It is not above the law. It cannot controvert the law. It is strictly within the powers of a court of equity to construe the various provisions of the trust deed, and to enforce those provisions; but it cannot set them aside. It can neither create nor substitute provisions. The will of the trustor is its will. His intentions, as evidenced by his instructions, are its guiding star, and the limitation of its power. It was the intention of James Lick, as clearly expressed in the eighteenth subdivision of his deed, heretofore quoted, that the residuary donees should be entitled to the "residue" after the previous trusts were discharged, and the payments therein provided for all made. The payment of the residue is the last thing to be done, necessarily so, for until other trusts are discharged and the moneys paid there is no residue, and, considering the uncertainties of the times, there may never be. It is entirely apparent that these were the things in the mind of James Lick when he executed the paper giving away his millions for the benefit of mankind. Aside from the foregoing consideration, this matter was directly adjudicated upon in Floyd v. Forbes, 71 Cal. 593, 12 Pac. Rep. 726, wherein this court said: "If the construction contended for by the appellant were the correct one, there appears no good reasons why the residuaries [referring to the academy and Pioneers] should not receive their residue as soon as the property was sold, and the different funds created. It is evident that the donor intended that the entire property should remain as security for the different trusts in the order named." For the foregoing reasons let the judgment and decree be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in accordance with the views herein expressed.

CLARK et al. v. CHAPMAN. (No. 18,005.) (Supreme Court of California. April 31, 1893.)

REHEARING.

Where the principal assignment of error presented and argued by the appellant is not trivial, and is wholly ignored in the decision of the case, a rehearing should be granted. Per Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. On motion for rehearing. Motion denied.

For report on appeal, see 32 Pac. Rep. 812.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order of the court denying a rehearing of this cause, not because any of the propositions stated in the opinion of the department are incorrectly decided, but because the principal assignment of error presented and argued in the brief of appellant is entirely ignored. The action is upon the undertaking of defendant guarantying the payment of the judgment of Wofford against Fleming. The complaint shows an assignment of the undertaking of the surety, but does not show any assignment of the judgment, and the contention of the appellant is that there can be no recovery against the surety by one party while the obligation of his principal is held by another. This proposition is seriously urged, and is supported by authority. It does not answer itself, and is not trivial. I do not think the case should be disposed of without a reference to it, or that the petition for a rehearing, based upon the omission of the court to notice it, should be denied.

FREDERICKS v. TRACY et al. (No. 15,034.)

CLAIM AND DELIVERY—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint in claim and delivery which shows that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the immediate delivery of the property two days before the commencement of the action is insufficient, in that it must show such facts to exist at the time the action is commenced.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by Joseph Fredericks, doing business under the firm name of Joseph Fredericks & Co., against Mary Tracy and S. Selig. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Selig appeals. Reversed.

Henry I. Kowalsky and T. J. Crowley, for appellant. Jos. Rothschild, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This was an action in claim and delivery. Plaintiff had judgment, and S. Selig, one of the defendants, appeals. The cause comes up on the judgment roll. The action was commenced on the 19th day of November, 1890. The complaint avers that the plaintiff was on the 17th day of November, 1890, the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of all the following goods and chattels, to wit, (then follows a description of the goods;) that defendants, without the consent of the plaintiff, now detain said goods and chattels from the possession of said plaintiff; that on the 19th day of November, 1890, plaintiff demanded of the defendants possession of said goods and chattels, but to deliver possession thereof the defendants refused and still refuse; that defendants still unlawfully withhold possession, etc. The residue of the complaint is in the usual form. A demurrer was interposed, upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant Selig thereupon and in due time answered, averring that on the 18th day of November, 1890, he purchased the property in question from his codefendant, etc. Plaintiff had judgment as before stated.

The question is, did the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? Replevin (claim and delivery) is an action at law for the recovery of specific personal chattels, wrongfully taken and detained, or wrongfully detained, with damages which the wrongful taking or detention has occasioned. It is what we usually term a "mixed action," being partly in rem, and partly in personam,—in rem so far as the specific recovery of the chattels is concerned, and in personam as to the damages. To sustain this action, plaintiff must have the right to immediate and exclusive possession at the time of the commencement of his suit. It is a cardinal principle in pleading that ultimate, and not probative, facts are to be pleaded. The ultimate fact in such an action is that plaintiff was at the time the action was commenced the owner of, or had some special property in, the chattel, coupled with a right to the immediate possession thereof. The fact that he was the owner and entitled to the possession at a previous date is evidence, from which the ultimate fact may be deduced, upon the principle that "a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature." Subdivision 32, § 1963, Code Civil Proc. This principle, however, has no application to the statement of facts in a pleading. Alden v. Carver, 13 Iowa, 253. In Affierbach v. McGovern, 79 Cal. 268, 21 Pac. Rep. 837, the complaint averred that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the personal property on the 12th day of August, 1880. The action was in claim and delivery, and was not brought until December, 1884. There was no demurrer filed to the complaint, but, as may be done under our system, it was objected that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. After stating that the complaint was clearly bad, the court added: "There is nothing in the complaint to show that at the time the action was commenced the plaintiff had any ownership or right to possession of the property." The alleged ownership and right to possession in that case was long before the suit brought, while here it is placed at a date only two days prior to the commencement of the action; but this does not alter the principle, which is that the plaintiff must show his ownership and right to possession at the time the action is commenced. For this defect in the complaint the judgment should be reversed, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint; and in making such amendment it is suggested that the description of the goods be made more definite by describing their situation, the building in which they were situate, that they constituted the furniture in a given house, or by such other method as will clearly identify them.

We concur: VANCLIEF, J.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, with leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint if he be so advised.

In re PEARSON'S ESTATE. (No. 14,944.)

Appeal of KINSEY.

WILL—CONSTRUCTION.

Testator, 21 years old, and not a lawyer, devised to his aunts M. and B. by holographic will, "all the real property which I hold jointly with them;" and to K., "all that property which is owned by me in the block," particularly described, "excepting therefrom that portion which I hold jointly with M. and B., and which has hereinbefore been bequeathed to them." He also directed that in case he survived both his aunts the property devised to them should be sold, and the proceeds distributed to certain charities. He had title to all the land described, but his aunts were entitled to the income of an undivided half of a certain portion of it during their lives or the life of either of them, under his mother's will. He survived his aunts. Held, that the devise to K. did not include that part of the land, from the undivided half of which testator's aunts were entitled to the income.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceeding by the executor of the will of Hiram Arthur Pearsons, deceased, to obtain a construction of such will. From the judgment entered, Isabella Rogers Kinsey appeals. Affirmed.

Wilson & Wilson and Lloyd & Wood, for appellant. Thos. F. Barry, I. N. Thorn, John B. Mhoon, and A. H. Loughborough, (G. W. Haight and Oliver P. Evans, of counsel,) for respondents.

FITZGERALD, J. This proceeding was brought by the executor of the last will and testament of Hiram Arthur Pearsons, deceased, to obtain a construction of the second and third clauses of that instrument. The will is holographic, and was dated at San Francisco, August 9, 1882. The testator died at Chicago, Ill., July 7, 1889, at the age of 28 years. He was the only child of Hiram Pearsons and Ann Charity Pearsons, who died prior to the execution of his will. He had no profession, was never married, and left, surviving him, uncles and aunts, parties to this proceeding, but not named in the will, who claim, as next of kin and heirs at law, that part of his estate as to which it is alleged he died intestate, by reason of the devise to charity exceeding the statutory limit. The clauses referred to are as follows: "Second. I do give, devise, and bequeath unto Betsey Frances Mathewson and Polly Barton, my aunts, all real property which I hold jointly with them; and I direct that, in the event of the death of either Betsey Frances Mathewson or Polly Barton prior to that of my own, all property, of whatever nature, herein bequeathed to them, shall revert and vest in the survivor, her heirs and assigns, forever, and furthermore, in the event of the death of both Betsey Frances Mathewson and Polly Barton prior to my decease, the aforesaid property otherwise bequeathed to them shall be sold at public auction to the highest cash bidder, the proceeds of said sale to be equally distributed among the different orphan asylums of the city and county of San Francisco, and said asylums I request to be designated by the judge of the probate court. Third. I do give, devise, and bequeath unto Isabella Rogers Kinsey, wife of my former guardian, her heirs and assigns, forever, all that property which is owned by me, bounded on the south by Clay street, on the west by Drumm street, on the north by Merchant street, and on the east by East street, excepting therefrom that portion thereof which I hold jointly with Betsey Frances Mathewson and Polly Barton, and which has hereinbefore been bequeathed to them." It appears that the property thus devised had a frontage of 178 9-12 feet on Clay street, running through the block, with a uniform depth of 115 feet, to Merchant street, and was originally owned by Hiram Pearsons, the father of the testator, who in his lifetime granted by deed absolute, to his son, the westerly 68 9-12 feet of the 178 9-12 feet of the property in question. The remaining 110 feet thereof, including other property, he devised by will to his wife, Ann Charity, and his said son, Hiram, in equal undivided halves, "share and share alike," and upon his death the title thereto was accordingly vested in them. Afterwards, Ann Charity Pearsons died, leaving a last will and testament, by the first clause of which she devised to her son, Hiram Arthur Pearsons, "all the real and personal property which I own jointly with him;" and in a subsequent clause of her will she devises and bequeaths to her sisters, Betsey Frances Mathewson and Polly Barton, for their use during the term of their natural lives, certain real and personal property, and also "the income from all property which I own jointly with my son, Hiram Arthur Pearsons, [which description includes the 110 feet in question,] * * * and in case my son, Hiram Arthur Pearsons, shall die before the said Polly Barton and Betsey Frances Mathewson, or either of them, the above-mentioned property shall go to them, or the survivor of them, absolutely, share and share alike, to them, or her heirs and assigns, forever." The undivided one-half interest in the said 110-feet lot owned by Ann Charity Pearsons at the time of her death was afterwards distributed, in accordance with these provisions of her will, to her son, Hiram Arthur Pearsons, "subject only to the rights, interests, and uses hereinbefore mentioned, to Polly Barton and Betsey Frances Mathewson, or to the survivor of them." Such was the condition of the title of this property on the 9th day of August, 1892, when the will was written. The testator survived his said aunts, Polly Barton and Betsey Frances Mathewson, if that be material, and the fee of the whole of this property was vested in him at the time of his death. The judgment and order construing the foregoing provisions of the will of Hiram Arthur Pearsons, deceased, substantially adjudges that by the terms thereof there is devised to Isabella Rogers Kinsey the westerly 68 9-12 feet of the 178 9-12 feet of property in question, and no more. From which judgment and order this appeal is taken by Isabella Rogers Kinsey alone.

There is but one question to be determined on this appeal, and that is whether it was the intention of the testator to devise to Mrs. Kinsey the whole of his interest in the block bounded by Clay, Drumm, Merchant, and East streets, or whether he intended to devise to her only a part thereof, and the remaining portion to his aunts. He held title to the westerly 68 9-12 feet of the 178 9-12 feet of the property in the block by deed from his father, and to one undivided one-half interest in the remaining 110 feet thereof under the will of his father, and to his mother's undivided one-half interest thereof under her will, "subject only to the rights, interests, and uses hereinbefore reserved to Polly Barton and Betsey Frances Mathewson, or the survivor of them." This reservation refers to the income devised to the aunts from the undivided half of the property devised by her to the testator, of which the 110 feet referred to was a part. By the second clause of his will he devises to his aunts "all the real property which I hold jointly with them;" and by the third clause thereof he devises to Mrs. Kinsey "all that property which is owned by me in the block," bounded as therein described, "excepting therefrom that portion thereof which I hold jointly with Betsey Frances Mathewson and Polly Barton, and which has hereinbefore been bequeathed to them." The language used by the testator in his will must be held to refer to the date thereof, and not to that of his death, for the reason that he refers therein "to an actually existing state of things." Such being the case, it is a familiar rule, in the interpretation of such a will, to construe its provisions with reference to the circumstances by which he was, or understood himself to be, surrounded, and the conditions present to his mind, at the time the will was written. The general words of description used by him in the third clause of his will, by which he devises to Mrs. Kinsey all of his interest in the block, are qualified and limited by his expressly excepting therefrom, in the sentence immediately following such description, "that portion thereof which I hold jointly with Betsey Frances Mathewson and Polly Barton, and which has hereinbefore been bequeathed to them." This language plainly shows that he did not intend to devise to Mrs. Kinsey the whole of his interest in the block, but only a specific part thereof; and the circumstances and conditions referred to manifestly show that the part that he did intend to devise to her was the westerly 68 9-12 feet thereof, which he acquired by deed from his father, and was thereafter owned by him in severalty. The title to the 178 9-12 feet was acquired by him at different times, and in various ways. The 110 feet he had held jointly with his mother by virtue of the provisions of his father's will, and the income from her undivided half interest therein had been devised by her to his aunts, and was thereby made a charge upon the property during the term of their natural lives; and in the event of his aunts, or either of them, surviving him, then they, or the survivor of them, would take the fee. He was therefore jointly interested with his aunts in the income derived from the 110 feet. He was but 21 years of age when the will was written, and not a lawyer; consequently, not accustomed to, or versed in, the use of technical terms, therefore, not likely to employ words having a technical meaning, but to use words in their ordinary and popular sense, for the purpose of expressing his wishes and intentions. What, then, could be more reasonable or natural for him, under such circumstances, than to refer to the 110 feet in question as property which he held jointly with his aunts. It was in that way that he had held it with his mother; and his aunts, under her will, had succeeded, not as joint owners in the fee, but to a joint interest with him in the income arising therefrom. And, as a further illustration in support of this view, it is evident from his language that he understood that he held the whole of the property in the block under different conditions; and, acting upon this understanding, he makes a significant distinction between holding and owning. To his aunts he devises "all real property which I hold jointly with them." To Mrs. Kinsey he devises "all that property which is owned by me in the block" bounded as described, "excepting therefrom that portion thereof which I hold jointly with Betsey Frances Mathewson and Polly Barton, and which has hereinbefore been bequeathed to them." It would indeed be a strained and unnatural construction, and one totally at variance with the intentions of the testator, as plainly expressed by the foregoing language of his will, to hold that he intended, by the third clause thereof, to devise to Mrs. Kinsey all of his interest in the block therein described. But it is claimed that, as the aunts died before the testator, they could not have held jointly with him at the time of his death, and that it therefore follows that Mrs. Kinsey takes all the property owned by him at the time of his death, because there was no person living and nothing to which the said exception was applicable. It was manifestly his intention to exclude from the Kinsey devise the 110 feet in question. He survived his aunts, who were the residuary legatees and devisees under his will, having died one week after the death of the surviving aunt. But he had provided for just such a failure of the devise to his aunts by directing that in the event of their death before his own the property devised to them should be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, and the proceeds of such sale be equally distributed among the different orphan asylums of the city and county of San Francisco. The devise to Mrs. Kinsey is a specific devise, and was clearly "intended to operate on the 68 9-12 feet referred to, and no more; and that the testator manifestly intended to, and did, except from the devise the 110 feet in question, which, by clause 2, he had devised to his aunts." From these views it necessarily follows that the judgment and order of the court below should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CONLIN v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.
(No. 15,093.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1893.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—SPECIAL ACTS FOR RELIEF OF INDIVIDUALS.

By Sp. Act 1891, (St. p. 513,) the board of supervisors of San Francisco is directed to pay one C. a certain sum, as the amount unpaid on contracts for improvement of public streets, "for which * * * he has not been able to obtain compensation according to the mode and procedure in such cases made and provided by statute," etc. Held that, as the courts take judicial notice of the fact that, under statutory requirements, all contracts for improvement of streets in San Francisco contain the express condition that in no case will that municipality be liable for any portion of the expenses of such work, or for any delinquency of persons or property assessed therefor, the act shows on its face to be a "gift" of public money to an individual, within the inhibition of Const. art. 4, § 31, and hence is void.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by John J. Conlin against the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco for a mandate directing defendant to allow a certain claim. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

John H. Durst and Dorn & Dorn, for appellants. Mich Mullany, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The legislature of this state, at its session in 1891, passed the following act, (St. 1891, p. 513:—) "The board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco are hereby authorized and directed to order paid to John J. Conlin, or his assigns or legal representatives, the sum of fifty-four thousand and fifteen dollars and thirty-seven cents, said amount being the principal, together with all the interest thereon, that remains due and unpaid to the said John J. Conlin, on contracts entered into with the said John J. Conlin by the superintendent of streets of the said city and county, for work done upon the public streets of said city and county, and for material furnished for the improvement of the said public streets; for which work done and material furnished he has not been able to obtain compensation, according to the mode and procedure in such cases made and provided by statute, by reason of errors, omissions and irregularities of the municipal officers of the said city and county, in their official proceedings concerning such work and material furnished." Thereafter the plaintiff presented his demand for the said amount to the board of supervisors, and on the 7th of December, 1891, the board refused to allow or order the same paid, whereupon the plaintiff brought this proceeding in the superior court to obtain a mandate directing the defendants to allow the claim. The defendants filed an answer to the said complaint, in which they set forth certain matters alleged to be the basis of the action of the legislature in passing the act, and pleaded that by virtue thereof the act was in contravention of certain provisions of the constitution. The plaintiff demurred to this answer, but the court overruled his demurrer, and made findings of fact upon the issues presented by the answer, but in its conclusions of law held that the validity of the act must be determined from its face, and could not be made to depend upon matters of fact not appearing thereon.

In Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 652, 27 Pac. Rep. 1089, we said that "in passing upon the constitutionality of a statute the court must confine itself to a consideration of those matters which appear upon the face of the law, and those facts of which it can take judicial notice;" and the same principle was repeated in Bourn v. Hart, 93 Cal. 321, 28 Pac. Rep. 951. The court, in the present instance, followed this rule in its conclusions of law; but its previous action, in hearing evidence, and making findings of fact, wherein it attempted to ascertain the "errors, omissions, and irregularities of municipal officers," which in its findings it assumed to be "referred to in the act of the legislature of 1891," was inconsistent therewith. It should have sustained the demurrer to the answer, and determined the plaintiff's right of action without considering the facts therein alleged. The authority of the legislature to direct a municipality to make any payment of its funds rests upon the proposition that these moneys are public moneys acquired under the authority of the state for public purposes; that as the municipality is created only as an auxiliary to the legislature, for governmental purposes, with a jurisdiction confined to a limited portion of the state, it does not cease to be under the control of the legislature; and that the legislature has the same power of disposition over the public moneys in the custody of the municipality that it has over those in the state treasury. In making application of this principle, the legislature, prior to 1879, passed many acts of relief, in which public moneys were appropriated to individuals, whose claims rested entirely upon some moral obligation, which could not in every instance be formulated in convincing or satisfactory terms; and when the constitutional convention met, in that year, it placed a restriction upon such appropriations, by the provision of section 31, art. 4, of the constitution, which declares that the legislature shall not have power "to make any gift, or authorize the making of any gift, of any public money, or thing of value, to any individual, municipal or other corporation whatever." This prohibition is, however, primarily addressed to the legislature; and when an act of that body is brought before the judiciary for review it is not to be assumed that the legislature has intentionally disregarded it, although, if the act is in manifest violation of the foregoing section, it must be declared by the courts to be invalid. The provision, moreover, is not to receive a strict and narrow interpretation, but its spirit, as well as its language, is to be followed, (People v. Hopkins, 55 N. Y. 81;) and, in determining whether a statute is in violation thereof, all the provisions of the statute, as well as those matters of which the court can take judicial knowledge, must be considered.

The "gift" which the legislature is prohibited from making is not limited to a mere voluntary transfer of personal property, without consideration, which the Civil Code, § 1146, gives as the definition of a "gift;" but the term, as used in the constitution, includes all appropriations of public money, for which there is no authority or enforceable claim, or which rest upon some moral or equitable obligation, which, in the mind of a generous, or even a just, individual, dealing with his own moneys, might prompt him to recognize as worthy of some reward. The legislature is to be regarded as holding the public moneys in trust for public purposes, and this limitation of the constitution is directed against its disposal of these funds except in accordance with such purposes. All those moral considerations or demands, resting merely upon some equitable consideration or idea of justice which in an individual, acting in his own right, would be upheld, are insufficient as a basis for making an appropriation of public moneys. An appropriation of money by the legislature for the relief of one who has no legal claim therefor must be regarded as a "gift," within the meaning of that term, as used in this section; and it is none the less a gift that a sufficient motive appears for its appropriation, if the motive does not rest upon a valid consideration. In Stevenson v. Colgan, supra, we said: "By these provisions of the constitution there is denied to the legislature the right to make direct appropriations to individuals, from general considerations of charity or gratitude, or because of some supposed moral obligation resting upon the people of the state, and such as a just and generous man, although under no legal liability so to do, might be willing to recognize in his dealings with others." And we also said in Bourn v. Hart, supra: "A legislative appropriation made to an individual in payment of a claim for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by him while in its service, and for which the state is not responsible, either upon general principles of law, or by reason of some previous statute creating such liability, is a gift, within the meaning of the constitution." The act under consideration purports to be for the "relief" of the plaintiff, and declares that the appropriation is made for the amount that remains due and unpaid upon certain contracts, for which "he has not been able to obtain compensation according to the mode and procedure in such cases made and provided by statute;" thus, by its own terms, showing that there was no legal obligation in favor of the plaintiff. The act also assigns the "errors, omissions, and irregularities of municipal officers of said city and county in their official proceedings concerning such work and material furnished" as the reason why the plaintiff has not been able to obtain compensation for the work done by him, thus clearly pointing out the cause, as well as the fact, of there being no obligation in his favor.

As we take judicial notice of the statutes under which any improvements of streets in the city and county of San Francisco have been made, we know that each of the contracts under which the plaintiff did any work or furnished any material for the improvement of those streets contained an express condition that in no case would the city and county of San Francisco be liable for any portion of the expense of the said work or improvement, or for any delinquency of persons or property assessed. It thus appears that, by the terms of the contracts referred to in the act as the basis of the plaintiff's right to any compensation, he had expressly agreed to the exemption of the city and county of San Francisco from any liability thereunder; so that the effect of the statute would be to give him the amount of money therein specified, to which, by his own agreement, he had waived all legal claim. This can be regarded in no other light than as a simple gift. We are aware that in Creighton v. San Francisco, 42 Cal. 446, it was held that a similar provision in a contract did not prevent the legislature from directing the municipality to make payment to the contractor; but at that time there was no constitutional prohibition against any disposition whatsoever that the legislature might make of public moneys after they had been brought into the public treasury. It was for the very purpose of preventing such disposition that the provisions of the present constitution were inserted, and consequently the Case of Creighton has no authority in construing the present statute.

If the failure of the plaintiff to obtain compensation for the work done by him was by reason of any errors, omissions, and irregularities of the municipal officers, which prevented them from having any jurisdiction to order the work done, or rendered his contract invalid, these were matters which were open to the plaintiff, and could have been ascertained by him before entering into the contract. If, however, they arose subsequent to his entering into a valid contract, the statutes by virtue of which the contract was made gave him the right to have such errors, omissions, and irregularities corrected, upon an appeal to the board of supervisors, and if he failed to seek redress in this mode his loss of compensation arose from his own neglect. In either case the act of the legislature is an attempt to appropriate public moneys for purposes for which there was no legal claim or obligation. The moral claim, which, it is alleged, arose from the fact that the city had enjoyed the advantage of the work, is, as we have seen, insufficient to support the act. In McBean v. City of San Bernardino, 96 Cal. 183, 31 Pac. Rep. 49, a sewer had been constructed under a contract with the city of San Bernardino, which contained a clause exempting it from liability, similar to that in the contracts entered into by the plaintiff herein, and after the completion and acceptance of the sewer the city passed a resolution authorizing the payment of a portion of the cost of its construction out of the funds of the municipality. In an action to recover this amount it was held that inasmuch as, by reason of this exemption, there had never been any liability for the work on the part of the city, the resolution to pay the amount was without any consideration to support it, and that, although the city had received the actual benefit of the work, this did not create even a moral obligation to pay for its cost. One of the reasons assigned for this conclusion was that cities are creatures of law, with powers defined by law, and that persons dealing with them are chargeable with notice, not only of the extent of their power, but also of the mode in which their power may be exercised. The principles declared in that case are controlling in this. The constitution makes the same inhibition on an appropriation of public moneys by the legislature, without any consideration, that exists against a similar appropriation by a municipality. The legislature has no more right to direct a municipality to give away the public moneys in its treasury than had the municipality without such direction. We hold, therefore, that the act in question violates the provisions of the foregoing section of the constitution, and is therefore invalid, and for this reason the judgment is reversed.

CLARKE v. BAIRD. (No. 14,934.)

JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—VACATION—INTERVENTION.

A default judgment ordering defendant to "disclose to plaintiff the kind and quality and quantity of the securities held by him through his dealings as broker for W., the daughter of C., deceased, concerning the money appropriated by said W. of the estate of said C., and the investments in which the said money and the proceeds thereof has been placed," was properly vacated to permit W. to file a complaint in intervention, as such judgment was merely interlocutory, and could not be made final without the presence of W. as a party.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Action by Johanna F. Clarke, administratrix of the estate of Margaret Clarke, deceased, against Andrew Baird. There was judgment for plaintiff by default. From an order vacating such judgment, and granting leave to Hannah Wittram to file a complaint in intervention, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alfred Clarke, for appellant. Chas. F. Hanlon, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Defendant, Baird, having failed to plead to the complaint, his default was entered, and thereupon the following judgment or order was made and entered on November 28, 1891: "Now, on the application of the plaintiff, it is ordered that plaintiff have judgment against the defendant, that the defendant disclose to the plaintiff the kind and quality and quantity of the securities held by him through his dealings as a broker for Mrs. Hannah Wittram, the daughter of Mrs. Margaret Clarke, deceased, concerning the money appropriated by said Hannah Wittram of the estate of said Margaret Clarke, deceased, and the investments in which the said money and the proceeds thereof has been placed, and that the defendant account to the plaintiff for the whole and every part thereof, and that plaintiff have judgment for said property and the whole and every part thereof, and for damages, in addition thereto, equal to the value of said property, as required by section 1460 of the Code of Civil Procedure." On December 24, 1891, upon an affidavit filed by the attorney of Hannah Wittram, the court made an order vacating the default of the defendant, Baird, and granting leave to Hannah Wittram to file her complaint in intervention, which complaint, the order recited, was attached thereto, and from this order the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint in the action against Baird is not contained in the record, but the judgment sufficiently discloses its character. The judgment, however, is not a final judgment, but an interlocutory one, ordering an accounting. It did not find that he was indebted to the estate of Mrs. Clarke, but ordered that he disclose the kind, quality, and quantity of securities held by him through his dealings with Mrs. Wittram, "concerning the money appropriated by said Hannah Wittram of the estate of Margaret Clarke, deceased, * * * and that defendant account to the plaintiff for the whole and every part thereof." No final judgment could have been properly entered against the defendant without further proceedings. It disclosed, however, that whatever securities the defendant had in his possession he received from Hannah Wittram, and no final judgment or order for the surrender of such securities, or moneys arising therefrom, to the plaintiff, could properly be made without the presence of Hannah Wittram as a party. What the plaintiff expected to accomplish by the proceeding without making her a party it is difficult to conceive. The order was improvidently made, and was properly vacated upon the interest of Mrs. Wittram being called to the attention of the court.

The objection that an intervention cannot be permitted after final judgment has no application here. Final judgment could not have been had in the action without her presence, and the plaintiff might properly have been ordered to make her a defendant. Besides, the so-called "judgment" was vacated, and the case stood as though no judgment had ever been entered at the time her complaint in intervention was filed. No affidavit of merits was required. Sufficient appeared upon the face of the order vacated to require its vacation, and to show that Mrs. Wittram's intervention was proper. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

MALLORY v. THOMAS. (No. 15,041.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 12, 1893.)

TRESPASS—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint in an action for a trespass upon premises occupied by plaintiff, resulting, as alleged, in the destruction of her property and business, and causing her mental and physical distress, which does not aver the value of the property destroyed, and the amount of damage to her premises and business, is bad on demurrer.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by K. S. Mallory against J. H. Thomas. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fred L. Button, for appellant. J. P. McElroy and J. H. Lucas, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for an alleged trespass and destruction of certain property, and set forth in her complaint the trespass of the defendant in entering upon her premises, charging that the defendant "tore down the ceiling overhead, a partition wall, the plastering on the front of said building, and caused great damage to plaintiff's goods and business, and rendered said premises unfit for the uses and purposes of plaintiff's business, and thereby broke up and destroyed said business of plaintiff;" and also alleging that the same was done in a threatening and terrorizing manner, so that she suffered great mental and physical distress, and that she was damaged thereby in the sum of $5,000. The defendant demurred to the complaint, upon the ground of its uncertainty, setting forth the particulars thereof. His demurrer was overruled, and, upon the trial, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant has appealed.

In many states uncertainty is not a ground of demurrer, the remedy being by motion to make the pleading more certain; but in this state the Code of Civil Procedure (section 430) permits a demurrer upon this ground, and, if such demurrer is improperly overruled, the reversal of a judgment entered upon the complaint must follow. See Reynolds v. Lincoln, 71 Cal. 190, 9 Pac. Rep. 176, and 12 Pac. Rep. 449. In an action for damages resulting from the destruction of property, the pleader should aver the value of the property alleged to have been destroyed, as that is an essential element in determining the amount of his damage; and if, in addition thereto, he has sustained any special damages, the amount of such special damages, as well as the circumstances justifying their recovery, should be alleged, the rule on this point being that only such damages as are the natural consequences of the act which constitutes his right of recovery can be recovered without special averment, and whenever the special damages which the plaintiff seeks to recover do not all flow from the same facts, but depend upon the proof of different circumstances, the grounds for each claim of special damage should be alleged. In the present case the plaintiff should have alleged the value of the property destroyed, the amount of damage done to the premises occupied by her, and the damages sustained by the injury to her business. Each of these elements constituted a distinct portion of the plaintiff's claim, and was capable of exact statement, and the defendant had the right to be informed of the amount of the claim for each, so that he might be prepared with evidence at the trial to meet the claim. He might be willing to concede the amount claimed for each, and limit his defense to the claim for punitive damages. In Grandona v. Lovdal, 70 Cal. 161, 11 Pac. Rep. 623, the plaintiff alleged that the act of the defendant in allowing certain trees to grow near the boundary of his land had caused him damage by lessening the value of the land, and by reason of their shade and the leaves falling therefrom upon his land, and it was held that the complaint was ambiguous and uncertain, because it did not state the amount of damage resulting from either the shade, the falling leaves, or the decrease in the value of the land.

The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, and the judgment of the court below is reversed.

NAFTZGER v. GREGG et al. (No. 14,705.)

SAME v. MONTAGUE et al. (No. 14,704.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1893.)

ACTION ON NOTE — DEFENSE — SUFFICIENCY OF FINDING — EVIDENCE OF BAR — COMPETENCY OF APPEALABLE JUDGMENT.

1. In an action on notes made by defendants, the answer alleged that the notes were given for the deferred payments for land purchased of plaintiff on a contract by which it was agreed that, if defendants failed to comply with the terms thereof, plaintiff would be released from all obligations to convey the land to them, and that plaintiff has not executed to defendants the deed of the land. Held, that the answer constitutes a complete defense to the action, and the finding of fact that the same is true is sufficient to support a judgment for defendants. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

2. Since Code Civil Proc. § 1049, provides that an action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination on appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, an appealable judgment is not admissible in evidence as a bar to a subsequent action. Harrison and Paterson, J.J., dissenting, on the ground that such judgment is competent and admissible on a plea in bar, but does not of itself constitute a bar.

Action by A. H. Naftzger against W. F. Montague, Frank W. Gregg, and S. S. Patton. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. B. Stanton and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Goodcell & McIntyre, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The above-entitled causes, between the same parties, and relating to the same subject-matter, will be considered together, for convenience, if not of necessity. As No. 14,705 was first tried, it will be first stated: It is an action upon two promissory notes, and made by the defendants, each for $2,500, dated September 8, 1887, one payable one year, and the other two years, after date. It was commenced March 10, 1890. The complaint is in two counts, in the usual form, and is on its face sufficient. The answer of the defendants expressly admits each and every allegation of the complaint, but alleges that there was no consideration for said notes, or either of them, other than a written contract of even date with the notes, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and convey to the defendants, and the defendants agreed to buy from plaintiff, a certain lot or parcel of land, and to pay therefor $7,000,—$2,000 upon the execution of the contract, $2,500 in one year, and $2,500 in two years, from date of contract; the deferred payments being evidenced by the two notes described in the complaint. A copy of the contract is exhibited as a part of the answer, and contains the following: "In the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said parties of the second part, [defendants,] the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligations, in law or equity, to convey said property, and said parties of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto; and the said party of the first part, on receiving such payments at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agrees to execute and deliver to the parties of the second part, or to their assigns, a good and sufficient deed, conveying said land free and clear of all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the said party of the first part; * * * and that time is of the essence of this contract." The answer further alleges that the defendants paid $2,000 at the time the contract was executed, and that "the plaintiff has not executed to the defendants the deed provided for in said contract, or any deed of conveyance of said land, or any part thereof." The court found as facts the execution of the contract; that defendants paid thereon, at the time it was executed, $2,000; that the notes in suit were given at the same time, as a part of the same transaction; and that "the plaintiff has not executed to the defendants the deed provided for in said contract, or any deed of conveyance of said land, or any part thereof,"—and, as conclusions of law, found "that the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief in this action," and "that the defendants are entitled to judgment against the plaintiff for their costs," and rendered judgment accordingly on July 29, 1890. The plaintiff appealed from this judgment on July 9, 1891, upon the judgment roll, without a bill of exceptions.

No. 14,704 is an action, commenced October 11, 1890, upon the same two promissory notes, to recover the amount alleged to be due thereon, and to enforce the vendor's lien upon the lot described in the contract of sale. The complaint differs from that in the former action (No. 14,705) only in that it sets out the contract of sale, alleges that the notes were made to secure the unpaid purchase money, and "that after the maturity of said promissory notes, and before the commencement of this action, the plaintiff tendered to said defendants a good and sufficient deed, conveying to the defendants the said premises described in the said agreement, free and clear of all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the plaintiff, * * * and at the same time demanded of said defendants payment of the said promissory notes, but that said defendants then refused, and ever since have refused, to accept the said deed, and then refused, and ever since have refused, to pay the said promissory notes, or any part thereof, and "that at the time of the maturity of said promissory notes the plaintiff was, and ever since has been, and still is, ready, willing, and able to carry out and perform his said agreement on his part, and to deliver to said defendants a good and sufficient deed, conveying said premises to said defendants free and clear of all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the plaintiff, and he hereby offers to deliver such deed upon payment of said notes." In their answer to this complaint the defendants "admit each and every averment thereof, except that, as to the averment that the plaintiff was and is the owner of the land described in said amended complaint, these defendants are not sufficiently informed to enable them to answer the same, and therefore they deny that the plaintiff was at any of the times mentioned in the complaint, or that he now is, the owner of said land, or able to convey a good title thereto to defendants." For a further answer they pleaded the former judgment in the above-entitled cause, No. 14,705, as a bar to this action. The plaintiff demurred to each branch of the answer on the ground that it stated no defense. The demurrer was overruled, and the cause was tried by the court. The court found as facts that the former action was between the same parties, and for the same cause, and that it was therein adjudged and determined that the averments of the answer therein were true, that the plaintiff had failed to perform said contract of sale on his part, and that he was not entitled to any relief against the defendants on account of said notes, or the purchase price of said land, and, as a conclusion of law, found that by the judgment in the former action the plaintiff is estopped from maintaining this action, and accordingly rendered final judgment in favor of defendants on July 7, 1891. From this judgment, plaintiff appealed on July 9, 1891, upon the judgment roll, containing a bill of exceptions.

1. On the appeal from the former judgment (No. 14,705) the appellant contends, in substance, that no defense to the action was either pleaded by defendants, or found by the court, and that plaintiff was entitled to judgment upon the pleadings and findings of fact. It is true that the averment in the answer that the plaintiff had not executed to defendants the deed provided for in the contract, and the finding of the court that this averment was true, were entirely immaterial, since the plaintiff was under no obligation to execute the deed until the purchase money was tendered or paid, and could not be put in default without a tender of the purchase money by the defendants. Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 420; Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 Pac. Rep. 429. But the setting out of the contract, and the averment that the execution of the contract and the making of the notes were parts of the same transaction, and that the contract was the only consideration for the notes, were material, since it thereby appeared that "the covenants of the vendor and vendee were mutual and dependent, and neither could put the other in default except by tendering a performance on his own part, unless the other party either waived the tender, or by his conduct rendered it unnecessary." Englander v. Rogers, supra. And also that the complaint was defective in that it did not set out the contract of sale, nor aver that plaintiff had tendered to defendants a deed of the land. The averment of this new matter in the answer was a complete defense to the prima facie cause of action stated in the complaint, and the finding by the court that this new matter was true supports the judgment. It may be that the plaintiff might have obtained leave to amend his complaint by adding the averment that he had tendered a deed before the commencement of the action, if the fact had been so. But for some reason, which does not appear, he did not so amend his complaint. There was no averment in the pleading of either party, and consequently no finding, as to whether or not the plaintiff had tendered a deed, yet facts were pleaded by defendants, and found by the court, from which it resulted, as a legal conclusion, that the plaintiff had no cause of action. The plaintiff had failed to set forth that part of the contract which required him to tender a deed as a necessary condition of his right to recover on his notes, and also failed to state that he had performed that condition; and the new matter stated in the answer only partially supplied the deficiency, as it contained nothing in respect to a tender of the deed. It devolved upon the plaintiff to allege and prove that he had tendered a deed; otherwise, it did not appear that the defendants were in default. The authorities, in addition to those above cited, which warrant this conclusion, are numerous, and a large collection of them may be found in 2 Bing. Real Prop. p. 716, c. 12 et seq.

2. On the appeal from the subsequent judgment (No. 14,704) the appellant contends, first, that his demurrer should have been sustained to that part of the answer which denies that plaintiff was the owner of the land he agreed to sell to defendants, or able to convey a good title thereto, and puts the denial on the ground that "these defendants are not sufficiently informed to enable them to answer the same." Section 437, Code Civil Proc., provides: "If the defendant has no information or belief upon the subject sufficient to enable him to answer an allegation of the complaint, he may so state in his answer, and place his denial on that ground." It seems obvious that the denial in this case is not in substantial compliance with the Code, since it does not state that defendants have no belief on the subject sufficient to enable them to answer. But the point is of no importance, for the reason that the court made no finding upon the issue attempted to be made by this denial, and placed its decision solely upon the ground that the former judgment is a bar to this action.

But it is claimed that the court below erred in admitting in evidence, against plaintiff's objection, the judgment in the former action, because it had not become final, with reference to the subject-matter thereof, as the time for appeal therein had not expired when the trial of this cause was had. We think this claim should be sustained. Section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal is passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied. It appears that the judgment in the former action was given and entered July 29, 1890, and that said action was still pending, within the meaning of the provisions of the foregoing section, when this cause was tried in the court below, which the record shows was commenced on March 12, 1891,—more than four months before the time for appeal had passed. It therefore follows that the court erred in admitting in evidence the judgment roll in the former action, against plaintiff's objection, in bar of plaintiff's right to recover in this action. Harris v. Barnhart, (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 589. Let the former judgment (No. 14,705) be affirmed, and the latter judgment (No. 14,704) be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the judgment. In my opinion, however, the error of the court below was not in admitting the judgment roll in evidence, but in determining that it constituted a bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery. The evidence offered—the judgment roll—was relevant to the issue presented by the answer, and of a character competent to establish that issue. The objection that it was not sufficient in itself for that purpose went to its weight, and not to its admissibility. It was a judgment that had been rendered between the same parties upon the same cause of action, and by a court of competent jurisdiction; and unless it is to be held that a judgment is not, under any circumstances, admissible in evidence until the time for an appeal therefrom has expired, the court properly received it. Section 1049, Code Civil Proc., does not purport to prescribe a rule of evidence, but merely to determine the condition of an action after judgment has been rendered, and, inferentially, the effect of the judgment; and there are many cases in which a judgment is admissible in evidence at any time after its entry. The court could not anticipate that this was all the evidence to be given upon that issue, and thus exclude it from being considered. It might be shown that there had already been a final determination upon appeal, or that the parties had consented that there should be no appeal. When, however, upon the submission of the case, it appeared to the court that a year had not elapsed since the entry of the judgment, and no other evidence upon that issue had been introduced, the court should have held that it did not constitute a bar, for the reason that under the provisions of section 1049, Id., the action was deemed to be still pending.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the views of Mr. Justice HARRISON.

GAROUTTE, J. I concur.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. I think the judgment in No. 14,705 is erroneous, and should be reversed. In the other case, (No. 14,704,) I concur in the judgment of reversal.

BERGIN v. HAIGHT et al. (No. 14,993.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1893.)
ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE—WHEN SET ASIDE—FRAUD.

1. Where a mere volunteer institutes probate proceedings on an estate in which he has no interest, for the ostensible purpose of paying the debts of the estate, but in reality to procure the sale of part of the estate to himself, and, by securing the appointment of his own agent as administrator, controls the proceeding, and accomplishes his purpose, there is such fraud as will entitle an innocent purchaser from heirs of the decedent to have the sale, and the decree confirmatory thereof, set aside.

2. An action to quiet the title of the property, instituted for such a purpose, is not a collateral attack on the decree confirming the sale.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Thomas I. Bergin against George W. Haight and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. W. Haight and Edward W. R. Taylor, for appellants. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action to quiet the alleged title of plaintiff to five undivided twelfth parts of a lot of land situate in the city of San Francisco. The judgment of the trial court was in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The cause was tried by the court, and findings were expressly waived. It appears that Francisco Soto, who died intestate in this state in 1856, was seised of the lot in question at the time of his death, and that he left surviving him five sisters and a brother, who were his only heirs at law. In March, 1866, two of these sisters conveyed to plaintiff an undivided half of all their right, title, and interest in said lot, by deed of grant, bargain, and sale, which was duly recorded August 10, 1870. Thereafter, on April 7, 1868, three others of said heirs conveyed to plaintiff an undivided half part of all their right, title, and interest in said lot, by a like deed, which was also recorded on August 10, 1870; and it is admitted that, by virtue of these conveyances, plaintiff was the owner of an undivided five-twelfths of said lot at the time of the commencement of this action, unless he had been divested of his title thereto by an alleged sale of the lot, by order of the probate court, to James Gordon, under whom the defendant Haight claims title to the entire lot. It is alleged in the complaint, however, that the order of sale, and the confirmation thereof to Gordon, under whom defendant claims, were fraudulently obtained, by collusion of the administrator with Gordon and the defendant Haight; that the administrator was merely the passive and willing instrument of defendant Haight, by which the latter, in fact, administered upon the estate, and, through Gordon, became the purchaser of the property at his own sale thereof.

The principal point made by appellants is that the evidence does not justify the finding of the fraud charged; but, after a careful consideration of the facts and circumstances of the case, we cannot say that they would not justify a finding that the defendant Haight procured the appointment of Sander, and employed the proceedings in probate for the purpose of securing the title in himself; that he, in fact, administered upon the estate, and, through Gordon, became a purchaser at his own sale. It would serve no useful purpose to detail the facts and circumstances upon which we think an implied finding, such as stated above, may be supported. The court below saw and heard the witnesses, and there being, in our judgment, a substantial conflict, upon material testimony, tending to establish or rebut the allegation of fraud, its decision is conclusive upon us. Upon the findings necessarily implied in the decision of the court below, we entertain no doubt as to the right of the plaintiff to the relief herein sought. A mere volunteer, who institutes proceedings in probate upon an estate in which he has no interest, and for the ostensible purpose of paying the debts of such estate, but in fact to procure a sale of a part of the estate to himself, and directs, controls, and manages the proceedings in probate successfully to that end, has no standing in a court of equity. Such a sale is voidable, and will be set aside at the instance of any one injured thereby.

It is claimed by appellants that this is a collateral attack upon the orders of the probate court, and that since the record of the proceedings show that the court had acquired jurisdiction, and that the proceedings were upon their face regular, the order confirming the sale cannot be thus attacked. It is true the court did acquire jurisdiction to administer upon the estate, and to order and confirm the sale of the property; but it does not follow therefrom that this is a collateral attack. The attack is a direct attack upon the sale, on the ground of fraud, and as such is authorized by law. Van Fleet, Collat. Attack, pp. 4, 5, 15, and authorities cited. It is not every species of fraud, however, which may be the basis of an action to vacate an order or judgment. To be actionable, as stated by our chief justice in Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. Rep. 970, and 27 Pac. Rep. 537, it must be a "fraud extrinsic or collateral to the questions examined and determined in the action. * * * Among the instances given in the books are such as these: Keeping the unsuccessful party away from the court by a false promise of a compromise, or purposely keeping him in ignorance of the suit, or where an attorney fraudulently pretends to represent a party, and connives at his defeat, or, being regularly employed, corruptly sells out his client." The fraud herein relied upon falls within the principle illustrated by the example stated above, and certainly within the principle underlying many other cases. Jones v. Hanna, 81 Cal. 507, 22 Pac. Rep. 883; Johnson v. Waters, 111 U. S. 667, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619; Griffith v. Godey, 113 U. S. 93, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383; Mayberry v. McClurg, 51 Mo. 256; Hardy v. Broadus, 35 Tex. 668; Warner v. Blakeman, 43* N. Y. 487; Larue v. Friedman, 49 Cal. 278; Caldwell v. Caldwell, 45 Ohio St. 513, 15 N. E. Rep. 297. The plaintiff had only constructive notice of the administration, and proceedings to sell. Furthermore, there was nothing upon the face of the proceedings to indicate a fraudulent collusion between the administrator and his attorney. There was no opportunity to determine an issue of fraud in the probate court. The administrator was acting as trustee and agent for the owners of the property, whether such owners were heirs or assignees of heirs, and the defendant stood in the same confidential relation. Ex parte James, 8 Ves. 343; O'Dell v. Rogers, 44 Wis. 136-178; West v. Waddill, 33 Ark. 586; Phillips v. Benson, 82 Ala. 500, 2 South. Rep. 93; Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow. 718-733; Baker v. Humphrey, 101 U. S. 494.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

McCOY v. VAN NESS. (No. 15,032.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1893.)
ACTION ON JUDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE

In an action on a judgment, service in the previous action is sufficiently shown, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, by recitals in the default and the judgment, contained in the judgment roll introduced in evidence, that "defendant was regularly served with process."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Horace G. Platt, for appellant. James L. Crittenden, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. One Hardesty recovered a judgment against the defendant on October 28, 1885, for the sum of $17,548.19. The judgment was assigned by him to one McClung, and by the latter assigned to this plaintiff, who thereafter brought this action to recover the amount due on the judgment.

The only point made by the appellant on this appeal is that the plaintiff failed to show at the trial that the summons in Har-esty v. Van Ness was served upon the defendant therein. There is no merit in this contention. The judgment roll in that case, which was introduced in evidence, contains the default entered by the clerk, the complaint, the summons, with the return thereon, and the judgment and certificate of the clerk thereto. Both the default and the judgment recite that the defendant therein was "regularly served with process." These recitals are sufficient of themselves, in the absence of any showing to the contrary; but, in addition to this evidence, the affidavit of service states that the summons attached to a copy of the complaint was personally served upon the defendant on the 14th day of August, 1885, and the defendant himself admitted that he had been served with a paper which purported to be a copy of the summons, and a paper which purported to be a copy of the complaint in that action, and that he could not deny that he was served by Mr. Richardson on the day stated in the affidavit of the latter, which is annexed to the judgment roll.

Judgment and order affirmed.

BANK OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA v. MADISON et al. (No. 14,308.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1893.)

BANKS AND BANKING—PUBLICATION OF ASSETS AND LIABILITIES—SUFFICIENCY OF STATEMENT.

1. Though St. 1876, p. 729, provides that banking corporations shall publish in January and July of every year statements of their financial condition, yet, in view of the fact that the only penalty provided for failure to so publish is that no corporation can maintain an action "until" such statement has been published, a publication of a statement before the time named in the statute for the publication of the next statement is sufficient.

2. Though the statute provides for the publication of two statements,—one of the capital stock, and the other of the assets and liabilities, of the corporation,—the publication of the two statements as one document is sufficient, where the amount of the capital stock, and the actual condition and value of the assets and liabilities, are set out in the document.

3. Under a provision of the statute that the statement of a foreign corporation shall be verified by the agent or manager of such corporation residing in the state, a verification of the statement of a foreign corporation by its resident agent, that it was true to the best of his knowledge and belief, is not open to the objection that it was not made upon actual knowledge.

4. Under a provision of the statute that the published statement shall contain "the actual condition and value of the assets" of the corporation, a statement showing the amount of cash on hand and at bankers, the amount of cash at call and short notice, the amount of investments, the amount of bills receivable and other securities, and the value of the corporation's premises, is sufficient.

5. Under a provision that the published statement shall contain "the actual condition and value of the liabilities" of the corporation, a statement showing the amount of capital, the amount of reserve fund, the amount due depositors, the amount of circulation, the amount of bills payable and other liabilities, the amount of rebate, and the amount of undivided net profits, is sufficient.

6. Under a provision that the published statement shall set forth "where" the assets are situated, a statement reciting that part of the assets are in London, England, part in San Francisco, part in New York city, and part in Canada, without giving the amount of assets at the places named, is insufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Bank of British North America against James Madison and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Daniel Titus, for appellants. Smith & Pomeroy, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This case involves principles similar to those presented in the Bank of British North America v. Alaska Imp. Co., 97 Cal., —, 31 Pac. Rep. 726. The plaintiff seeks herein to recover from the defendants, as stockholders of the Alaska Improvement Company, their proportionate liability of the amount represented by the bills of exchange upon which the former action was brought. The defense thereto is the same as was presented in that action, and the question involved is whether the statements which the plaintiff had filed and published before the commencement of the present action sufficiently conform to the requirements of the act of April 1, 1876, (St. 1876, p. 729,) whose provisions were construed in the former case, and take the present case out of the rules there laid down.

1. The present action was commenced April 8, 1890, and the statement relied upon by the plaintiff was published and filed April 4, 1890, and it is objected that, as the act in question required the statement to be published and filed "in January and July of every year," it must be published and filed in those respective months, in order to relieve the plaintiff from the penalty prescribed by the statute. The statute does not, however, in terms, declare that any penalty shall be enforced against the corporation for a failure to publish and file the statements, or that any consequence shall result from its omission to do these acts within the designated months; and it must therefore be held that the naming of the months in the statute is merely directory. The penalties named in the statute are the liability of the officers for making a false statement, and the prohibition of the corporation from maintaining any action in the courts of this state "until they shall have first duly filed the statements herein provided for, and in all other respects complied with the provisions of this law." The use of this phrase shows that the prohibition to maintain an action was not intended to be absolute by reason of the failure to do the acts within the designated months, but was intended to exist only "until" they should have been done. See Byers v. Bourret, 64 Cal. 73, 28 Pac. Rep. 61. The object of the statute is not that the statement shall be published and filed in any particular months, so much as that the public shall have information of the financial standing of the corporation; and, for the purpose of enforcing this requirement, it declares that the corporation shall not maintain any action until it shall have complied therewith. The statute does not fix the time at which the statements shall be prepared, but as some time must necessarily elapse after their preparation before they can be published, and as they are to be published semiannually, it is reasonable to hold that it is a sufficient compliance with the provisions of the statute if a semiannual statement is published and filed before the time named in the statute for the publication of the next statement.

2. Although the statute provides for the publishing and filing of two statements,—one of the capital stock, and the other of the assets and liabilities, of the corporation,—it does not require that they shall be presented in two distinct documents, nor do the appellants advance any reason in support of their objection that the incorporation of them both in one document is not a sufficient compliance with the statute. No such reason occurs to us, and we hold, therefore, that when the corporation has made proper statements of the amount of its capital actually paid in, and of the actual condition and value of its assets and liabilities, and where said assets are situated, the objection that such statements are incorporated into one document, and published and filed together, is not tenable, especially if they are recorded in each of the books kept for that purpose by the county recorder.

3. The verification of the statements under consideration sufficiently conforms to the requirements of the act. The statute requires that the "sworn statement" shall be verified, in the case of a foreign corporation, "by the agent or manager of the business of such corporation, resident in this state," "before some judge or officer of this state authorized to take affidavits to be used before any court in this state." In the present case the statements are each accompanied by the affidavit of William Lawson, "sworn to" before a notary public, in which he states that he is "the managing agent at San Francisco of the above-named bank, and that said bank has no cashier or secretary at its agency in said place; * * * that the foregoing statement is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true and correct statement," in the one case, "of the actual condition and value of the assets and liabilities of said bank, and of the situation of the said assets on the 31st of December, 1889," and, in the other case, "of the capital actually and bona fide paid in money into the treasury of said bank." The objection that the affidavit is not positive, or made upon the actual knowledge of the affiant, is not tenable. Necessarily, all the transactions of a corporation are not within the actual knowledge of any one individual; and the contents of the statement required by the statute must be obtained from different sources. The legislature did not intend to require an affidavit of a higher degree than could be made on the part of the officer from whom it is demanded, and, when an affidavit is to be made of matters which are presumptively derived through information from others, it is sufficient if the affiant states that it is made to the best of his knowledge and belief.

4. The statement of the amount of capital actually paid in is as follows:

"Statement of the amount of capital of the Bank of British North America (Incorporated by royal charter, 1840) at the close of business hours on the 31st of December, 1889, and April 4, 1890:

Capital subscribed	$4,866,500 00
Capital actually and bona fide paid in money into the treasury of said bank.....	4,866,500 00
Reserve fund	1,240,957 00
Undivided net profit.....	214,496 12

"The above accounts are made upon the basis of $4.8665 to the pound sterling."

To this statement is annexed the affidavit of the managing agent of the plaintiff, made April 4, 1890, in which he states "that the foregoing statement is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true and correct statement of the capital actually and bona fide paid in money into the treasury of said bank, of the reserve fund and undivided net profits thereof at the close of business hours on the 31st day of December, 1889, and at the date of the verification of this statement."

The statement of the actual condition and value of its assets and liabilities is as follows:

"Statement of the liabilities and assets of the Bank of British North America (Incorporated by royal charter, 1840) at the close of business hours on the 31st of December and April 4, 1890.

"Actual condition and value of said bank's liabilities:

Capital	$ 4,866,500 00
Reserve fund	1,240,957 00
Due depositors on deposit....	11,004,998 44
Circulation	1,224,452 34
Bills payable and other liabilities	8,419,612 32
Rebate	67,202 52
Undivided net profit	214,496 12

Total $27,038,218 74

"Actual condition, value, and situation of said said bank's assets:

Cash and specie at bankers and on hand.....	$ 2,321,978 42
Cash at call and short notice	3,749,518 76
Investments	333,588 52
Bills receivable and other se- curities	20,225,487 78
Bank premises	407,645 26
Total	$27,038,218 74"

And to this statement is also annexed an affidavit of the manager, made April 4, 1890, that "the same is a true and correct statement of the actual condition and value of the assets and liabilities of said bank, and of the situation of the said assets, at the close of business hours on the 31st of December, 1889, and, to the best of the affiant's knowledge and belief, is a true and correct statement of the actual condition and value of such assets and liabilities, and of the situation of said assets, at the date of the verification of this statement."

The provision of the statute is that the corporation shall publish and file for record a sworn statement "of the amount of capital actually paid into such corporation, or into such banking business, provided that nothing shall be deemed capital actually paid in except money bona fide paid into the treasury of such bank * * *; and a like sworn statement of the actual condition and value of the assets and liabilities." We are of the opinion that the statements under consideration are a substantial, as well as a literal, compliance with these provisions of the act. The statute does not contemplate a detailed schedule, setting forth each asset and liability of the corporation, but its object is to show their condition and value in gross, with such distribution into groups or classes as will enable those for whose benefit the statements are required to ascertain the general condition and financial standing of the corporation as a banking institution. The statement of assets contemplated by the statute is one from which can be ascertained their condition and value, and whether they furnish a sufficient security for the public in dealing with the corporation; and this would include the general character of the securities in which its capital, as well as the moneys deposited with it, are invested; what portion thereof is available for meeting its liabilities, or may be readily converted into money therefor; and what portion is in a more permanent investment, or held as a quasi guaranty for its depositors. On the other hand, the statute contemplates such a statement of its liabilities as will show what portion thereof is immediate, and what portion remote; whether there is such a disparity between the assets and liabilities of the corporation as to render it of doubtful standing, or whether its surplus of available assets is such as to justify the public in regarding it as prosperous, and safe to deal with. These statements are intended to be general in character, and to give results, rather than details. The "condition" of the several assets and liabilities which is to be set forth therein is not a detailed description, from which the solvency of each asset is to be determined, as that object is reached by requiring their "value" to be stated.

5. The statute requires that the statement shall also show where the assets are situated. The manifest object of this provision is to furnish information to the public within this state, and particularly to those in the locality where the corporation has its place of business, of the security which is afforded to those whom the corporation invites to deal with it as a banking institution; and for this purpose it is essential to know where its assets may be found, as well as their condition and value, in order that those wishing to deal with it may determine whether they are available for the purpose of meeting its liabilities within this state. A banking corporation doing business in California, whose assets are chiefly in a remote part of the world, would not offer as great an inducement for patronage as if its assets were within the state; and, although such fact does not prevent it from doing business here, it has been determined by the legislature that, for the protection and guidance of those who may deal with it, the public shall be informed where the assets of the corporation are situated. The declaration in the statement of the plaintiff herein is that its assets "are situated partly in the city of London, England; partly in the city and county of San Francisco, California; partly in the city of New York, New York; and partly at the other places in Canada mentioned in the affidavit hereto, where the said bank has agencies." And in the affidavit it is stated "that the places in Canada at which the said bank has agencies, and at each of which a certain portion of its assets are situated, are as follows, to wit: London; Brantford; Paris; Hamilton; Toronto; Brandon, Man.; Kingston; Ottawa; Montreal; Quebec; St. John's, N. B.; Fredericton, N. B.; Halifax, N. S.; Victoria, B. C.; Vancouver, B. C.; Winnipeg, Man." This statement fails to comply with this provision of the statute, by reason of the omission to state the amount of the assets which are situated at each of the designated places. A statement giving the amount of the assets, and that they are situated in "Great Britain" or "California," would not be a compliance with the statute, nor would the designation of six or more of the principal cities in both or either of these countries as the places where they are situated be the statement which the law requires, if the amount of the assets in each of the designated places is not also given. The requirement of the statute that the statement shall show where the assets are situated means that it shall not only point out and designate with approximate particularity the place in which they are situated, but also that, if they are situated in more than one place, the amount of the assets in each of the several places shall be given. A statement which does not show what proportion of the assets are situated within the state of California does not afford the information which it is intended to give, and the citizen of this state who deals with the bank is not informed whether he has any security in such dealing. The state has indicated as its policy that corporations that engage in banking, whether foreign or domestic, shall at stated intervals publish to the world, for the protection of those who may desire to deal with them, certain information concerning their assets and liabilities, and it is incumbent upon every corporation that would engage in such business to make a substantial compliance therewith. The fact that the plaintiff is a foreign corporation, and that it is for that reason more difficult to comply with the statute, does not exempt it from this obligation, for the constitution, art. 12, § 15, declares that "no corporation organized outside the limits of this state shall be allowed to prosecute business within this state on more favorable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of this state." This requirement of the statute is not unreasonable, nor is it one with which a compliance is impracticable or even difficult. It is quite as easy for the plaintiff to specify the amount of its assets in each place in which it does business, as it is to aggregate them for the purpose of giving their condition and value. It may involve a little more labor, but that results from the magnitude of its business, rather than from its nature. For the error in the court below in holding that this portion of the statement was a sufficient compliance with the statute, its judgment and order are reversed.

EASTERBROOK v. O'BRIEN, Tax Collector, et al. (No. 15,256.)

VOID ASSESSMENTS—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

Equity will not give relief against a tax for street improvements levied under a valid act, though the proceedings were void, where plaintiff makes no offer to pay any part of the tax, though his complaint impliedly admits that some part thereof ought in fairness to be paid.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by D. E. Easterbrook against Thomas O'Brien, tax collector of the city and county of San Francisco. Other parties intervened. From a judgment against plaintiff, he appeals. Affirmed.

Haven & Haven, for appellant. Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, W. C. Belcher, and Geo. E. Bates, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This action was brought to enjoin the defendant O'Brien, as tax collector, from selling a certain lot belonging to the plaintiff for taxes levied to pay the principal and interest of the "Dupont Street Bonds," under the act of the legislature providing for the widening of Dupont street, approved March 23, 1876, (St. 1875-76, p. 433.) The complaint shows that the property is situated in the district assessed for the improvement; that the preliminary proceedings prescribed by said act were duly taken; that a report of the commissioners was made to and confirmed by the county court, showing the description and cash value of lands and buildings taken for the improvement, and the damages done the same, together with the amount in which each parcel would be benefited by the improvement, amounting to $796,837, including $8,200 benefits to the plaintiff's lot; that the total amount of costs and damages resulting from the improvement was put at $914,941; that after such confirmation the commissioners issued the bonds, amounting to $1,000,000. Then follow allegations with respect to the levying of the taxes sought to be enjoined, which, it is claimed, show conclusively that the levy or assessment was wholly unauthorized, illegal, and void, but, nevertheless, sufficient in form to constitute a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff, and to impair the market value of his property. It is claimed by the appellant that the levy was improperly made, because the tax to pay the interest and the tax to pay the principal were united when the amounts for each ought to have been distinguished, and that the assessment was apportioned according to the enhanced values, as fixed by the commissioners, and not upon an annual assessment of the value of the property. In any event, it is claimed the tax collector cannot now sell the property for the delinquent assessment of any year excepting the last. It may be conceded that the levy was not properly made and that the acts complained of are not merely irregularities, but are such as to render the levy illegal and void, (matters which we do not decide,) and yet the plaintiff, in our opinion, is not entitled to any relief in equity. The rule stated by the respondent, and conceded to be correct by the appellant, is that, if the plaintiff ought in equity and good conscience to pay the tax, or any part of it, he must first pay it, or the part of it which in equity and good conscience he ought to pay, before he can ask relief from a court of equity. The allegation of the complaint in that regard is as follows: "That he has been wrongfully and unlawfully charged for more than his just share or proportion of the said annual taxes so imposed upon said land for said Dupont street taxes; and that the land and improvements thereon of plaintiff have been wrongfully and unlawfully charged with more than their legal and fair proportion of the said annual taxes, by reason of the failure by the duly-constituted authorities of the city and county of San Francisco to assess and levy annually a separate tax upon the said lands described in said act for the payment of the annual interest upon the said bonds, and to assess and levy annually a separate tax upon the said lands and improvements for the payment of five per cent. of said sinking fund. That by the failure by said authorities to assess and levy a separate tax upon the large and valuable improvements situated on the westerly line of Dupont street, or Grant avenue, in said city, there has been imposed and charged upon the lands and improvements of this plaintiff, so located upon the north line of Sutter street, in said city as aforesaid, a much larger proportion of the taxes assessed and levied under the provisions of said act than is lawfully chargeable to said lands and improvements." There is in this allegation an implied admission that some portion of the tax, not stated, is legal and fair, and ought to be paid. Plaintiff must have had in mind some standard of fairness when he made this allegation, and recognized at least a moral obligation to bear a portion of the burden put upon the property included within the district.

Courts of equity do not review the proceedings of officers intrusted with the assessment of the property. If proceedings taken by them are void, no title will pass by a sale of the real estate, and the party claiming to be injured must litigate his rights in an action at law for the possession of the premises. Of course, there are exceptions to the rule,—as where it is shown that the lands are not at all subject to taxation, or that there is no law authorizing any proceedings therefor,—but that is not the case here. The act under which the proceedings were had was declared valid in Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 Pac. Rep. 71, which was brought to enjoin the tax collector from selling certain real estate for the collection of some of the taxes, the payment of which is resisted in this action. In Weber v. San Francisco, 1 Cal. 455, the court said, speaking of an attempt to resist the collection of an assessment for improving a street: "The work has been completed, and after plaintiff has derived all the benefit and profit therefrom * * * he comes into court when he is called upon to pay his portion of the expense, and asks in effect that he may be exempted from the general burden imposed for the common benefit of himself and others, on the ground that there are some irregularities in the mode of making the assessments. I think that should not be permitted. * * * The court below by its judgment held in effect that, as there was no equity on the side of the plaintiff, it would not interfere to prevent a sale, but would leave him to his strict legal right, if he has any, after the sale of the premises on which the assessment was laid. I think that the decision of the court is correct in this respect." The character of the proceedings therein referred to does not appear, but, whether they were merely irregular or void, we think the conclusion therein reached was correct. So long as the moral obligation to pay any portion of the tax exists, a court of equity will not lend its aid to prevent a cloud upon the title, but will leave the party to his remedy at law. There are cases from other states cited which hold to the contrary, and there are some cases of our own court cited, in which the relief herein prayed for was granted, but in the latter no question was made as to the proper remedy. Judgment affirmed.

HAYES v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (No. 19,103.)

TAXATION—SECOND PAYMENT—ACTION TO RECOVER—PARTIES—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Where property is erroneously sold for taxes which have already been paid by the owner, and the purchaser again pays the same, it is a payment "more than once," within the meaning of Pol. Code, § 3804, as amended by Act March 19, 1889, providing that "any taxes, per centum and costs paid more than once, or erroneously or illegally collected, may by the order of the board of supervisors be refunded by the county treasurer."

2. The word "may," in said section, means "shall;" and, thus construed, the board having no discretion to allow or reject a claim for taxes actually paid a second time, on a refusal to allow such claim, action therefor lies against the county, without also making the state party defendant.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. § 338, providing that an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake does not accrue "until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake," the action against a county for the amount paid by the purchaser at a tax sale, which had already been paid by the landowner, accrues when the prior payment is discovered, rather than when payment is made by the purchaser.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by William Hayes against the county of Los Angeles. Defendant had judgment on demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Spencer G. Millard, for appellant. James McLachlan, Dist. Atty., Waldo M. York, and B. M. Marble, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was instituted to recover from the county of Los Angeles taxes levied for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, and paid upon a delinquent sale of property by the assignors of plaintiff. According to the averments of the complaint, the officers assessed certain real property in the county of Los Angeles to the owner thereof, and also assessed the same property for the same fiscal year to one Samuel Stratton. The owner paid the tax levied upon the property. The assessment to Stratton was not paid, and after the usual notice the tax collector of defendant, on the 7th day of March, 1890, offered the property for sale, representing that the state and county taxes thereon for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, had not been paid, and were still due and unpaid. That A. W. Berry, relying upon the facts so stated by the tax collector, became the purchaser of the property, paying therefor the taxes, per centum, and costs represented to be due on account of the taxes thereon, which amounted, together with the cost of the certificate, to $35.96. Berry received a tax certificate, which he assigned to plaintiff, and the latter, after notice had been given as provided by law, applied, on the 10th day of September, 1891, to the tax collector, and demanded a tax deed of the purchased premises, which was refused upon the ground that the tax had been paid "prior to the payment shown in the written certificate." Neither plaintiff nor his grantor had any notice that the tax upon the property had been once paid prior to the sale until September 10, 1891. On the 8th day of October, 1891, plaintiff presented to the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles a claim for the amount paid by his assignor on account of the double assessment, which the board refused to allow. The complaint contains other causes of action, stating facts similar to those above stated, differing only as to name, date, and amount, which causes of action aggregate the sum of $325.35, for which judgment is demanded. Defendant interposed a demurrer to the complaint upon the grounds (1) that there is a defect of parties defendant, in that the state of California is not made a defendant; (2) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (3) that the demand is barred by section 41 of the act of March 14, 1883, and of March 31, 1891, known as the "County Government Acts."

Section 3804 of the Political Code, prior to 1889, read as follows: "Any taxes, per centum and costs erroneously or illegally collected may by the order of the board of supervisors be refunded by the county treasurer." We are referred to a number of cases,—among them, Loomis v. County of Los Angeles, 59 Cal. 456, and Harper v. Rowe, 53 Cal. 234,—as tending to sustain respondent's position that no recovery can be had. On the 19th day of March, 1889, section 3804 of the Political Code, above quoted, was amended to read as follows: "Any taxes, per centum and costs paid more than once, or erroneously or illegally collected, may by the order of the board of supervisors be refunded by the county treasurer; and whenever any payments shall have been made to the state treasurer by the county treasurer, as provided for by sections three thousand eight hundred and sixty-five and three thousand eight hundred and sixty-six of this Code, and it shall afterwards appear to the satisfaction of the board of supervisors that a portion of the moneys so paid has been paid more than once, or erroneously or illegally collected, said board may refund such portion of said taxes, per centum and costs so paid to the state treasurer to the person entitled to the same out of the general fund in the county treasury, and said board shall thereupon certify to the state controller the amount of such taxes paid more than once, or illegal or erroneous tax, per centum and costs so collected and refunded; and thereupon said controller shall draw his warrant upon the state treasurer in favor of the treasurer of said county for the amount so certified to him, and said treasurer shall pay said warrant as in other cases." It had often occurred, prior to the amendment to the Code above quoted, that, by accident or oversight, property was twice assessed, and the taxes twice collected, yet the obstacles in the way of a recovery of the taxes thus improperly collected were so numerous and perplexing that the remedy for a recovery was scarcely worth pursuing. That the object of the statute was to obviate these difficulties, and provide a means whereby moneys collected by mistake, and to which the county and state have neither a moral nor legal right, is apparent. When the taxes upon property have for a given fiscal year been once paid by the owner, the county has no right or power to sell, or in any manner affect or incumber the land by a sale thereof. The lien of the tax is gone, and as the implied right, which, in the event of a failure to redeem, ripens into a title in the purchaser, has no existence, there is no consideration for the purchase money; and he who has paid it ought, in justice, to be entitled to recover it back. "When the consideration appears to be valuable and sufficient, but turns out to be wholly false, or a mere nullity, or where it may have been actually good, but before any part of the contract has been performed by either party, and before any benefit has been derived from it to the party paying or depositing money for such consideration, the consideration wholly fails, there a promise resting on this consideration is no longer obligatory, and the party paying or depositing money upon it can recover it back." Pars. Cont. (7th Ed.) p. 462; Chapman v. City of Brooklyn, 40 N. Y. 372; Corbin v. City of Davenport, 9 Iowa, 239. In Fuel Co. v. Tuck, 53 Cal. 304, it was said: "The authorities appear to be uniform to the effect that, where a sum of money has been paid upon a consideration which has entirely failed, the law implies a promise to refund it." The doctrine of caveat emptor, as applied to purchasers at a tax sale, invoked by counsel for respondent, has no application here. Section 3804 was enacted to do justice in a class of cases where, but for its provisions, the application of the doctrine of caveat emptor would work a hardship to citizens who had paid money which it was inequitable for the county to retain. I am of the opinion that the doctrine of caveat emptor has no proper application to that class of cases in which the attempted sale of real property for taxes is absolutely void by reason of the tax having been previously paid. This view is sustained by a large number of the late authorities, but for present purposes the question is not of moment, the inquiry being directed to plaintiff's right of recovery under the statute.

It is urged by respondent that the Code, by providing that the board of supervisors may by order provide for refunding taxes, etc., paid more than once, made it optional with that body whether to do so or not, and that the board, in this instance, having refused to refund, its action is conclusive upon the plaintiff. Where the public interest or private right requires that the thing should be done, then the word "may" is generally construed to mean the same as "shall." People v. Supervisors of Livingston Co., 68 N. Y. 119. Where the statute directs the doing of a thing for the sake of justice, or the public good, the word "may" is the same as the word "shall." Rex v. Barlow, 2 Salk. 609. Where a statute directs a thing to be done for justice's sake, "may" means "shall." Silvey v. U. S., 7 Ct. Cl. 334. Where persons or the public have an interest in having the act done by a public body, "may," in such a statute, means "must." Phelps v. Hawley, 52 N. Y. 27; People v. Supervisors of Otsego Co., 51 N. Y. 401. See Estate of Ballentine, 45 Cal. 696. In Supervisors v. U. S., 4 Wall. 435, a statute of Illinois provided that the board of supervisors "may, if deemed advisable, levy a special tax," etc. Mr. Justice Swayne sums up the authorities on the question as follows: "The conclusion to be adduced from the authorities is that where power is given to public officers, in the language of the act before us, or in equivalent language,—whenever the public interest or individual rights call for its exercise,—the language used, though permissive in form, is in fact peremptory. What they are empowered to do for a third person the law requires shall be done. The power is given, not for their benefit, but for his. It is placed with the depositary to meet the demands of right, and to prevent a failure of justice. It is given as a remedy to those entitled to invoke its aid, and who would otherwise be remediless." Applying the rule enunciated in the foregoing cases, and it is apparent that a sound and just rule of construction requires the permissive word "may," in section 3804, supra, to be construed as "shall."

There is a further contention by respondent

that the section only applies to taxpayers, as such,—a class to which plaintiff does not belong. Property taxes are levied upon, and become a lien upon, property. If the property is sold, it is to the person who will take the least quantity of the land, and pay the taxes and costs due. Section 3773, Pol. Code. "If the purchaser does not pay the taxes and costs before ten o'clock A. M., of the following day, the property, on the next sale day, before the regular sale, must be re-sold for the taxes and costs." Section 3774, Pol. Code. After receiving the amount of the taxes and costs, the collector must make out, in duplicate, a certificate. Pol. Code, § 3776. The purchaser at a tax sale pays the taxes as effectually as could have been done by the owner without a sale; and if they have been previously paid by the owner of the property, and it is therefore sold for the same tax, and the taxes again paid by the purchaser, it is a payment more than once, within the purview of the statute, for which the purchaser or his assignee may recover from the county, as provided in section 3804. It follows from this conclusion that the complaint demurred to states a cause of action against the defendant, and that the state of California is not a necessary party defendant.

There is no allegation in the complaint that the state has received any portion of the tax in question. To presume it to have done so for the sole purpose of passing upon the constitutionality of that portion of section 3804, Pol. Code, which provides the mode by which taxes of the character in question, when paid to the state, shall be refunded to the county, would require us to go outside the record, in quest of a proposition which may never arise in the case.

The further point is made by the demurrer that plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the provision of section 41 of an act of the legislature of the state of California entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments," approved, etc. The section in question requires all claims to be presented to, and filed with, the clerk of the board of supervisors, within one year after the last item in the account or claim accrued. The tax in question was paid by the assignor of plaintiff on the 7th day of March, 1890. Neither plaintiff nor his assignor was aware that the tax had been paid more than once until September 10, 1891, when the tax collector refused to deliver the tax deed. The claim was presented to the board of supervisors October 8, 1891, and rejected October 14, 1891. The fourth subdivision of section 338, Code Civil Proc., provides: "An Action for Relief on the Ground of Fraud or Mistake. The cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake." (1) The claim of plaintiff under the statute was inchoate until September 10, 1891, when the collector furnished him the official evidence that the tax had been previously paid. Prior to that time he possessed no evidence that a deed would not be forthcoming upon demand. It was his demand for a deed, and the refusal by the collector to deliver it, for the cause specified, viz. that the tax had been paid before the sale, that gave him a right to recover from the county. (2) Conceding, however, that we are wrong in the foregoing proposition, plaintiff's cause of action in this case, where the claim was evidently founded in a mistake by the collector, is, under subdivision 4 of section 338, Code Civil Proc., to be deemed as accruing on the 10th day of September, 1891, the date when the mistake, and the facts connected therewith, were first discovered. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the county could, through its collector, for whose acts, within the scope of his powers, it is liable, unlawfully collect taxes from two or more persons upon the same property for the same fiscal year, and then, by withholding the facts for a year, escape liability. This cannot be regarded as within the intention of the lawmaking power. I am of opinion the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court is directed to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

WETMORE v. CITY OF OAKLAND et al.
(No. 15,412.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1893.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOLHOUSES—RIGHT TO ISSUE BONDS.

1. Under Act March 19, 1889, authorizing cities to issue bonds for public buildings, and designating the city council as the body to decide on the necessity of calling an election to vote on the subject of issuing bonds, the city of Oakland may issue bonds to build schoolhouses, though its charter vests the government of the school department in a board of education, and authorizes the board to "build schoolhouses," but does not authorize it to contract debts exceeding in any one year the revenue provided for that year.

2. Pol. Code, §§ 1880-1887, providing for the issuance of school-district bonds by the supervisors of a county to build schoolhouses, do not limit the power conferred upon a city by Act March 19, 1889, to issue its own bonds for the same purpose, though section 1576 makes each incorporated city a school district.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by J. L. Wetmore against the city of Oakland and others to determine the validity of city bonds issued for the purpose of building schoolhouses. The bonds were adjudged valid, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

v.33p.no.14—49

Cal.Rep. 32-34 P.—33

Edw. C. Robinson and E. A. Holman, for appellant. James A. Johnson, Davis & Hill, and James W. Goodwin, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The legislature of this state, at its session in 1889, passed an act approved March 19, 1889, authorizing the incurring of indebtedness for municipal improvements, and issuing bonds therefor by cities, towns, and municipal incorporations, (St. 1889, p. 399,) the first section of which declares that "any city, town, or municipal corporation incorporated under the laws of this state may, as hereafter provided, incur indebtedness to pay the cost of any municipal improvement, or for any purpose whatever requiring an expenditure greater than the amount allowed for such improvement by the annual tax levy." By the next section of the act it is provided that whenever the legislative branch of the municipal corporation shall determine that the public interest or necessity demands the acquisition, construction, or completion of any municipal buildings or other municipal improvements, whose cost will be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income and revenue of the municipality, it may call an election for the purpose of determining whether bonds of the municipality shall be issued for such improvement, and if the proposition shall receive the vote of two-thirds of the voters voting at such election such bonds may be issued. September 23, 1891, the council of the city of Oakland passed an ordinance by which it declared that the public interest and necessities of the city of Oakland demanded the acquisition, construction, and completion of certain municipal buildings and improvements in that city for public school purposes, viz. certain designated schoolhouses, and that the cost thereof would be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income and revenue of the city; and afterwards passed an ordinance that the question of issuing bonds therefor to the amount of $400,000 be submitted to the voters of the city at a special election to be held for that purpose. At that election, more than two-thirds of the voters having voted for the issuance of the bonds, suitable ordinances were passed by the council, and bonds of the city to the amount of $400,000 were issued and sold prior to January 1, 1893, and the proceeds placed in the city treasury. In June, 1893, the appellant having challenged the validity of these proceedings, an agreed case was submitted to the superior court of Alameda county, under the provisions of section 1138, Code Civil Proc., for the purpose of having a determination by that court of the validity of the bonds. The superior court adjudged that they were valid obligations of the city of Oakland, and from its judgment this appeal has been taken.

The proposition presented by the appellant in support of his appeal is that the municipality of the "city of Oakland" has no power to issue its bonds for the construction of schoolhouses, for the reason that the management of its schools is vested in a board of education, and that any bonds to be issued for school purposes must be authorized by that body. The city of Oakland is governed by a freeholders' charter, which was approved by the legislature February 14, 1889. St. 1889, p. 513. Under this charter the legislative power of the city is vested in a council of 11 members, and the government of the school department is vested in a board of education consisting of 11 members. The board of education is by the charter vested with authority to "build schoolhouses" upon plans approved by it, but the work of building the schoolhouses is to be carried on through the medium of a board of public works. It is, moreover, expressly declared in the charter (section 131) that the board of education "shall not have power to contract any debts or liabilities in any form whatsoever against the city, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for the school fund for such year." By section 149 of the charter it is provided that "whenever the council shall determine that the public interest requires the construction or acquisition or completion of any permanent municipal building * * * the cost of which in addition to the other expenditures of the city will exceed the income and revenue provided for in any one year, they may by ordinance submit a proposition to incur a debt for such purpose, and proceed therein as provided in section 18, of article 11, of the constitution of this state and general law." By this section of the charter the same authority is conferred upon the council to create a bonded indebtedness as is given by the aforesaid act of the legislature, but the act of the legislature prescribes the steps to be taken, and is the "general law" under which it is necessary for the council to proceed in incurring such indebtedness. The provisions of the act of March 19, 1889, are general in their character, and give to every municipal corporation incorporated under the laws of this state the power to create a bonded indebtedness for any of the purposes authorized by the act. The indebtedness is not to be incurred, nor are the bonds to be issued, until after the voters of the municipality have so directed; but, as it is the vote of the electors which determines that they shall be issued, it is immaterial to them what officers of the city carry out this vote. The act itself designates the legislative branch of the municipality as the body to determine in the first instance whether the public interest or necessity demands the construction or completion of the building or improvement, and also designates that body as the agency of the corporation through whose acts the indebtedness is to be created and evidenced. There is no particular mode provided by which the council shall ascertain this fact, but, in a matter which pertains to the public schools, the fact would naturally be ascertained by direct communication with the board of education, or by a request from that board, and, inasmuch as that board has no power to issue the bonds of the city, it is but natural to assume that it would manifest its wishes to the council. The question, however, is not how the council shall ascertain whether the public interest demands the improvement, but whether it has any power to issue the bonds after it has so determined, irrespective of the mode of ascertaining it. Although the board of education has been intrusted with the management of the schools, and it is the body designated in the charter to build the schoolhouses, there is nothing inconsistent with this provision for the legislature to designate the council as the body to give inception to the indebtedness and issue the bonds therefor. The power to build or improve the schoolhouses which is vested in that board is distinct from the power to borrow money with which to build or improve them. The board of education, as such, is forbidden by the charter from incurring any indebtedness beyond the annual income for school purposes, and as the constitution permits such indebtedness by any municipal corporation only after a vote of the electors therefor, it is competent for the legislature to designate the agent or body of the municipal government which shall act for it in carrying out the will of its electors, and for this purpose the legislative branch of that government would most naturally be selected.

That the education of the youth is properly included within the functions of a municipal government cannot be denied. A municipal corporation is but a branch of the state government, and is established for the purpose of aiding the legislature in making provision for the wants and welfare of the public within the territory for which it is organized, and it is for the legislature to determine the extent to which it will confer upon such corporation any power to aid it in the discharge of the obligation which the constitution has imposed upon itself. The constitution has declared (article 9, § 1) that, "a general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, the legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement." In furtherance of this duty the legislature has made provision in the Political Code for a system of public schools throughout the state; and in the municipal government act, which was enacted in 1883, providing for the organization of municipal corporations, it has included a school department for the first five of the several classes of municipal corporations therein provided for. In each of the freeholders' charters that has been approved by it an educational department has been established, and provision made for education, and for the exercise of municipal functions in reference thereto. As schoolhouses are essential aids in the promotion of education, their erection is but incidental to the maintenance of the schools, and falls as completely within the functions of a municipal government as does the erection of a hospital for its indigent poor, or buildings for its fire engines; and the schoolhouses, when so erected, are as fully municipal buildings as are its engine houses and hospital buildings. Danielly v. Cabaniss, 52 Ga. 222; Horton v. Commissioners, 43 Ala. 598. In Board v. Fowler, 19 Cal. 24, the validity of a reservation by the Van Ness ordinance of certain lots for school purposes was involved, and the supreme court said: "The school department of the municipality is only a part of its government. A reservation of property for school purposes is not a disposition of it for the benefit of third persons, but a keeping of it for its own purposes. The resolution amounts only to the setting apart of property of the town for a particular town purpose, and in this respect is not different from a similar act, if such had been done, declaring that the plaza should be reserved as a public garden, or a lot for a jail, or a house for the holding of courts." See, also, Board v. Martin, 92 Cal. 209, 28 Pac. Rep. 799.

The provisions of sections 1880-1887 of the Political Code for the issuance by the supervisors of the county of school-district bonds whenever the electors of the district shall vote therefor, to pay for the building of schoolhouses in the district, do not limit or qualify the power conferred by the act of March 19, 1889, upon an incorporated city to issue its own bonds for the same purpose, notwithstanding the provisions of section 1576 of the same Code, making such incorporated city a school district. Each of these acts is a general law upon a subject within legislative power, and, if there is any inconsistency between them, that which is later in date must prevail over the earlier act. There is not, however, any inconsistency between the two acts. The bonds authorized by these sections of the Political Code are different obligations from those issued by the municipal corporation under the act of March 19, 1889. A school district has not, like an incorporated city, any financial officers, nor has it been intrusted with the power of assessment and taxation which is conferred upon an incorporated city, and for these reasons as well as others the legislature would naturally intrust to the supervisors of the county, as being the body having the financial supervision of the school district, the function of issuing and providing for the payment of school district bonds; and as by the constitution bonds cannot in any case be issued except upon the vote of two-thirds of the qualified electors of the district voting upon the question of their issuance, the agency by which they might be executed would seem immaterial, and there would be little likelihood of an issuance being authorized to be made for the same purpose by each agency. It is, however, unnecessary to determine whether the power to issue bonds conferred by these sections of the Political Code exists in favor of the school district as a corporation, as well as of the incorporated city which constitutes the school district, or whether it has been superseded by the power conferred upon the city, as the bonds in question are those of the municipal corporation, and not of the school district; but, even if it should be conceded that the power to issue bonds for the same purposes rests in the supervisors at the instance of the school district, and also in the city itself, the bonds which are authorized by the Political Code are to be issued in the corporate name of the school district, which by section 1575 of that Code must be "— district of — county," whereas the bonds in question are those of the municipality of the city of Oakland, and their validity is to be determined by the power of the municipal corporation to issue them.

The question presented in Kennedy v. Miller, 32 Pac. Rep. 558, was the right of the treasurer of the city of San Diego to demand from the county treasurer the custody of certain public school moneys apportioned to the school district of San Diego, which had been derived from sources outside of the municipality, and not through any agency of the city, viz. the state school fund and taxes levied by the supervisors of the county, and it was held that they were moneys whose custody had been placed by the legislature with the county treasurer. The power of the city to raise money within its own territory for school purposes by tax or otherwise, or to retain the custody or make the disbursement of any moneys which might be raised from taxes levied by its council, did not arise in that case. On the contrary, we said that "the city is a corporation distinct from that of the school district, even though both are designated by the same name, and embrace the same territory. The one derives its authority directly from the legislature through the general law providing for the establishment of schools throughout the state, while the authority of the other is found in the charter under which it is organized;" and it follows that the acts of each corporation are to be measured by the authority under which they are performed, and their validity determined by a comparison with that authority. We hold, therefore, that the city of Oakland had the power, under the provisions of the act of March 19, 1889, to issue the bonds in question, and, as it was conceded at the argument that all the provisions of that act had been complied with, the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

MAGEE v. PACIFIC IMP. CO. (No. 14,115.)

INNKEEPERS—GUESTS AND BOARDERS—EVIDENCE—CORPORATIONS—ULTRA VIRES.

1. The fact that an hotel has a rule to charge a guest a less rate per diem by the week than by the day, and that, if a guest had been there longer than a week, he got the benefit of the rule, does not show that one who had been at the hotel more than a week was a "boarder," rather than a "guest," it not being shown that he had any notice of the rule, or any knowledge of the charges, or that any arrangement for a permanent stay had been made.

2. The fact that one has made a special arrangement at an hotel for board and lodging by the week is not determinative of the question whether he is a guest or a boarder, but merely evidence on the issue.

3. A corporation, after engaging in the hotel business, and assuming the liability of an innkeeper, cannot repudiate its liability on the ground that its acts were ultra vires.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by James W. Magee against the Pacific Improvement Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Blake, Williams & Harrison, for appellant. A. B. Hotchkiss, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought to recover from the defendant the value of certain personal property, lost by the burning of the Hotel Del Monte, April 1, 1887. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed. It was held in Fay v. Improvement Co., 93 Cal. 253, 26 Pac. Rep. 1099, and 28 Pac. Rep. 943, upon the facts then before the court, that the defendant, as the proprietor and keeper of the Hotel Del Monte, was an innkeeper; and, as the facts herein are almost identical with those presented with that case, the defendant must in the present case be held to have been an innkeeper, and subject to its liabilities. It is, however, contended by the defendant that in the present case the plaintiff was a "boarder" with it, rather than a "guest," and consequently that its liability as an innkeeper does not exist. The finding of the court upon this issue is as follows: "That plaintiff and her assignor, at the time of the destruction of said house by fire, were inmates of said house under special arrangement for board and lodging by the week for a permanent stay, and at the time of the fire had given no intimation to defendant of any intention to depart from said house, where they had been for about ten days." The appellant contends that this finding is not sustained by the evidence, and we are of the opinion that her contention is correct. The plaintiff testified that there was no special contract made between her and the management of the hotel as to the terms upon which she was received; that she simply went into the office, asked for a room, registered, and was assigned to the room; and, instead of there being any testimony in conflict with this statement, it was corroborated by testimony given on behalf of the defendant by its clerk and manager. The only evidence which it is contended supports the above finding is that it was shown to be a rule of the house to charge a guest a less rate per diem for entertainment by the week than by the day, and that, if a guest remained more than a week, he got the benefit of the rule; that they treated all persons as transient guests until they remained a week, and then they commenced to treat them as boarders, and charged them the weekly rates; and that the plaintiff had been at the hotel about 10 days at the time of the fire. It was not shown, however, that this rule was ever brought to the knowledge or notice of the plaintiff, or that she was ever informed of the rates of charge, the only evidence upon that subject being that she always paid all demands that were made on her for her entertainment; and the defendant's manager testified that nothing was said when they came in about whether they came there by the day or otherwise. There was no evidence whatever that the plaintiff made any arrangement "for a permanent stay," or that there was at any time anything said or done with reference to the time that she would remain at the hotel. Whether the plaintiff was a guest or a boarder with the defendant was an issue in the case upon which the liability of the defendant depended, and upon which the court should have made an express finding. This question was one of fact to be determined by the court upon all the evidence before it. Whether the plaintiff made a special arrangement respecting her stay with the defendant was only evidence to be considered by the court in determining the ultimate fact whether she was a guest or a boarder. Even if the finding of the court that she had made a special arrangement with the defendant for board and lodging by the week had been sustained by the evidence, that fact would not be determinative of the issue whether she was a guest or a boarder, but would be merely evidence to be considered in determining that issue. Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 597; Hancock v. Rand, 17 Hun, 279, 94 N. Y. 1; Hall v. Pike, 100 Mass. 495.

The proposition of the defendant that, because innkeeping is not enumerated as one of the objects of its incorporation, its acts as an innkeeper are ultra vires, and cannot form the basis of any liability therefor, cannot be maintained. Having engaged in that occupation, and assumed the liability of an innkeeper towards the plaintiff as his guest, and received from her the consideration for such liability, the defendant cannot now repudiate its obligation upon the ground that under its corporate powers it was not authorized to engage in such occupation. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

DREXLER v. McGLYNN et al. (No. 15,086.) (Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1893.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — NOTICE OF PROTEST — BY AND TO WHOM GIVEN.

1. An executor named in a will, though not yet approved by the court, is a personal representative, within the meaning of Civil Code, § 3145, providing that notice of protest of a note may be given, in case of the death of the person otherwise entitled to notice, to one of his personal representatives.

2. Notice of protest of a note may be given by an agent of the owner, in the agent's name.

3. The fact that notice of protest of a note was sent to the executors of a deceased party to a note, addressed as "administrators," is immaterial, so long as they received it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by L. P. Drexler against P. J. McGlynn and others, as executors, on a promissory note. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles F. Hanlon, for appellants. Henry K. Mitchell, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action against the defendants, as executors of the last will and testament of James M. Donahue, deceased, upon a promissory note indorsed by their testator September 10, 1889. The note became due March 10, 1890. Donahue died on the 3d day of March, 1890, leaving a will in which the defendants were named as executors, and which was filed in the superior court on the 11th day of March, 1890.

It is claimed that the estate is not liable because no proper notice of protest was given, but we think the point is not well taken. The notice was addressed to "Messrs. Peter J. McGlynn and J. F. Burghin, Jr., administrators of the estate of J. M. Donahue, deceased," and it was deposited in the postoffice on the day the note became due. The Civil Code provides that a notice of dishonor may be given, in case of the death of the party otherwise entitled to notice, to one of his personal representatives, or, if there are none, then to any member of his family, and, if there be no family, it must be mailed to his last place of residence. Section 3145. Appellants contend that, inasmuch as the defendants had not been appointed by the court at the time the notice was given, they were not personal representatives, within the meaning of this statute; and cases are cited, holding that notice sent to a person afterwards appointed administrator of an intestate is insufficient. These authorities are not in point. While it is true that the appointment of an executor is only provisional, and requires the approval of the court, for the purpose of administration upon the estate of the testator, it is also true that the law allows a man to appoint his executors, subject to this approval, and treats them as entitled to the office until they renounce it; and unless, for some reason, they are incompetent, the appointment makes them representatives of the estate, "so far as relates to acts in which they are merely passive, such as receiving notice of the dishonor of a note." Shoenberger's Ex'rs v. Savings Inst., 28 Pa. St. 466. It matters not that the person named in the will may never be actually appointed executor by the court. He may renounce the trust. But, as he is the person to whom the testator has confided the administration of his estate, it is regarded as safe to intrust him with the notice. "It is not to be expected that any person can ordinarily be found upon whom this duty [protecting the estate] will rest more strongly than upon one who is named as executor in the will." Goodnow v. Warren, 122 Mass. 82; 3 Rand. Com. Paper, § 1245. The reason for holding that a notice to one named in the will as executor is good, is not applicable to the case of one who happens after the notice is given to be appointed administrator, because the latter is neither honorably, nor in legal duty, bound to do anything for the protection of the estate.

It is claimed, also, that the note was not presented for payment by the holder; that the evidence shows that the note was transferred to the Anglo Californian Bank, which was the holder of the note at the time demand was made. The certificate of the notary, it is true, states that the note was presented and payment was demanded, "at the request of the Anglo Californian Bank, Ltd., holder of the original note," but the plaintiff testified that he had been the owner of the note from the time it was made until the day of the trial, and the fair import of the evidence is that the note was given to the bank simply for collection. The notice may properly be given by an agent, and the agent may give the notice in his own name. 3 Rand. Com. Paper, §§ 1236, 1237; 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 991.

There is nothing in the point that the notice was invalid because it was addressed to the defendants as "administrators." The notice need not have been addressed to them in their representative character at all. The actual receipt of the notice is the material thing. Beals v. Peck, 12 Barb. 245. If the defendants actually received the notice,—and such is the presumption from the fact of mailing, properly addressed and postage prepaid,—the object of the law has been attained.

We think the court properly overruled the demurrer. The allegation as to protest might have been more specific in its statement of facts, but, as against a general demurrer, it is good. Judgment and order affirmed.

WOOD v. CURRAN et al. (No. 14,962.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1893.)

QUIETING TITLE—SHERIFF'S DEED—FORECLOSING LIEN OF STREET ASSESSMENT—SALE BY PROBATE COURT.

Where neither the personal representatives nor the heirs of a decedent are made parties to an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment upon the land of the estate, the title of one claiming under the judgment of foreclosure is inferior to that of one who, with knowledge of such judgment, enters into possession by virtue of a subsequent deed from the administratrix under a sale had in pursuance of an order of the probate court.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. M. Wood against Michael Curran and others to quiet title. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. M. C. Hassett, (Jas. F. Tevlin and Thos. E. Curran, of counsel,) for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to quiet title to a lot of land in the city of San Francisco. John Agnew took possession of the property in 1868, and held the same until April 25, 1871, when he conveyed it to John Hogan, who entered into possession of the land, and held it until his death, which occurred August 6, 1874. Hogan left surviving him the widow, Ellen, and four minor children. Letters of administration were issued to Ellen, August 26, 1874. On October 3, 1884, after due proceedings had, the lot was sold under an order of the probate court to the respondent, who received a deed from the administratrix on October 20th. On the same day the respondent received from Ellen Hogan a quitclaim deed of the property. The appellant claims under a judgment in Harney v. Corcoran et al., foreclosing the lien of a street assessment on the property in controversy. This judgment was entered on June 3, 1879, and the sheriff's deed to appellant is dated December 4, 1883. The proceedings leading up to the street assessment were initiated by resolution of intention, filed March 27, 1876. It is admitted that the respondent had actual notice of the sheriff's deed to appellant. Ellen was a party to the action of Harney v. Corcoran et al., individually, but not as administratrix, and none of the minor heirs were represented. We think, upon the facts stated, the court below properly held the title to be in defendant. Under the act of 1872, upon which the assessment lien was based, the land is not sued or summoned as a party; it is simply described, the owner being the defendant. The action, therefore, to foreclose was not a proceeding strictly in rem. The decree was in personam; the measure of satisfaction, however, being the interest which the defendant had in the land. Of course, the plaintiff did not acquire by his purchase under the decree in that action the interest of the minor children; that interest passed to the defendant herein by the probate sale subsequently made, neither the heirs nor the personal representative of Hogan having been a party to the action. The judgment in Harney v. Corcoran against Ellen Hogan did not bind Ellen as administratrix of the estate of John Hogan, deceased. It is settled here that a judgment for or against a party in one right does not affect him when acting in another right. Association v. Chalmers, 75 Cal. 332, 17 Pac. Rep. 229; Archbishop v. Shipman, 69 Cal. 586, 11 Pac. Rep. 343. The respondent took all the right, title, and interest which Ellen acquired by succession, but he took it subject to the provisions of the probate act for the support of the family of the deceased, and for the payment of the expenses of administration and the debts outstanding against the deceased. Where the widow, after the death of her husband, executed and delivered a quitclaim deed, it was held that this fact constituted no ground for the refusal of the probate court to set apart to her as a homestead a portion of the land conveyed by the deed; that, if an heir conveys his interest in the estate of an ancestor, it will carry only such interest as will remain to him after satisfying the objects of administration. The court there said: "Upon the death of an intestate his property goes by succession to his heirs, subject to administration. The objects of administration are: (1) To support the family for a period; (2) to set apart a homestead to the family; (3) to pay the expenses of administration; (4) to pay the debts of the deceased; (5) to distribute the balance of the estate to those who take it by law." Estate of Moore, 57 Cal. 437. So, where the heirs of the deceased executed a mortgage upon property inherited from him, it was held that the purchaser at the foreclosure sale acquired no greater or higher right in the mortgaged premises than the mortgagors held, and that the property in his hands was subject to the orders and proceedings of the probate court as fully in all respects as if the mortgage had not been foreclosed. Cook v. De la Guerra, 24 Cal. 241. That the proceeding for the foreclosure of an assessment under the act of 1872 is not strictly a proceeding in rem, with all the binding force claimed for it by the appellant, is clearly established by the decision in Wood v. Brady, 68 Cal. 78, 5 Pac. Rep. 623, and 8 Pac. Rep. 599. The plaintiff had purchased the land at a sale made under a judgment in an action to enforce a street assessment lien which accrued July 10, 1875. Prior to the last-named date the defendant had acquired a street assessment lien upon the lot, and, having recovered judgment, was proceeding to sell the property in satisfaction thereof. The court pointed out the distinction between the power of assessment and the general power of taxation, and held that the foreclosure of a junior street assessment lien did not extinguish prior liens of the same kind, if the holders of such prior liens were not made parties to the foreclosure suit. In that case, as well as in the case at bar, the statute under which the proceedings were had did not purport to attach to the proceedings for collection the effect claimed by the appellant, and, as there said: "There are no considerations of public policy that require that it should be given." It is claimed that, as the defendant had actual notice of the plaintiff's title when he took the deed from Mrs. Hogan, he is estopped from denying the title under which he entered. While Ellen was personally bound by the assessment, decree, and sale, and the defendant, if entering into possession only under her quitclaim deed, would be likewise bound, yet he entered also under the deed of the administratrix of the estate of John Hogan, which vested in him the interest of the estate in the property. Where a party enters into the enjoyment of an estate under two claims, one of which is good and the other is bad, he will be regarded as having entered under the better claim. We have carefully examined the authorities cited by the appellant, and find none of them inconsistent with the views above expressed. The evidence supports the findings of the court, and we see no error in the record.

Judgment and order affirmed.

WATRISS v. REED. (No. 15,064.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1893.)

PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANT—RIGHT OF PURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

1. Act Cong. July 23, 1866, § 7, provides that where one, in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, has purchased lands of Mexican grantees, which lands have been excluded from the final survey of any Mexican grant, and has used, improved, and continued in actual possession thereof, such purchaser may purchase the same, after having such land surveyed under existing laws. Held, that the fact that a Mexican grant fixed a definite base line, and that the grant was only a quarter of a league wide, did not affect the grantee with notice that all lands lying more than that distance from the base line did not belong to the grant, so as to deprive him of the right to purchase such lands under said act.

2. The fact that the land in question was never a portion of the grant, and hence could not be excluded from the final survey, did not affect the right to purchase the same under the act.

3. An inclosure was not necessary in order to constitute actual possession under the act.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by Martha C. Watriss against E. S. Reed. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George Pearce, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This action was brought to recover possession of a tract of land in Sonoma county. The land is a portion of 640 acres confirmed to Gen. Joseph Hooker, as a part of the Mexican grant known as the "Agua Caliente Rancho." On the final survey 550.36 acres, only, were found to be included within the grant; and the respondent made application to purchase the balance of the 640 acres called for by the decree, under the seventh section of the act of congress of July 23, 1866, popularly known as the "Conness Act," which provides that: "Where persons in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, have purchased lands of Mexican grantees or assigns, which grants have subsequently been rejected, or where the lands so purchased have been excluded from the final survey of any Mexican grant, and have used, improved and continued in the actual possession of the same according to the lines of the original purchase, and where no adverse right or title (except of the United States) exists, such purchaser may purchase the same after having such land surveyed under existing laws, upon first making proof of the facts required in this section." Respondent's application was granted, and she received a United States patent for the land after a contest with the defendant in the United States land office. The defendant claims under a settlement upon the land in 1879, and a homestead entry of November 12, 1880.

The first point made by the appellant on this appeal is that the respondent was not a purchaser in good faith. In answer to this, it is sufficient to say it clearly appears that Mrs. Watriss paid at least $7,000 in money, in good faith, acting upon the advice of her attorneys, and that the lands, at the time she purchased, were supposed to have been granted by the Mexican government. At the time of the passage of the act above referred to, she had used and improved the property, and had continued in the actual possession thereof, and it was for the benefit of persons of this class that congress passed the act. The case is one clearly and fairly within the letter and the spirit of the law. Bascomb v. Davis, 56 Cal. 152; Hosmer v. Wallace, 97 U. S. 577.

Appellant insists that the grant fixed one definite boundary or base, and that, as the grant was only a quarter of a league wide, all purchasers under the Mexican grantee must have taken with notice that all lands lying more than a quarter of a league east of the base line did not belong to the grant, and that such purchasers cannot, therefore, be regarded as bona fide purchasers, within the meaning of the act of 1866. The character of the grant was considered and determined in Hays v. Steiger, 76 Cal. 560, 18 Pac. Rep. 670, and requires no further notice. Plaintiff purchased the land in 1858. Reed made his settlement in 1879, before the final survey of the grant, and the filing of the township plat, and was notified at the time of the respondent's claim, and warned not to trespass thereon. It is claimed by appellant that the land was never excluded from the final survey of the grant, and that the respondent is therefore not entitled to the benefit of the act. The argument seems to be that, as the land never was a part of the grant, it never could have been excluded. But, if the land had in fact been a portion of the grant, she would not have been compelled to rely upon the provisions of the act for title to the land. If congress had intended legal rights alone to control, there was no occasion for the passage of the act. The object of the act was to give to the purchaser from the Mexican grantee the right of purchase from the government. He was assured by the act that if he made his purchase in good faith, took actual possession, and continued the same, and paid a valuable consideration, and the land was believed to be within the grant, he would be treated as a preferred purchaser of the land, and, upon paying for the same, would be entitled to a patent. If respondent's land was not within the lines of the grant, it was supposed to be, and the evidence shows that she honestly believed it to be within such lines, and this entitles her to the protection of the act.

It is claimed, also, that respondent never had actual possession of the premises, and that she has not used, improved, and continued in the actual possession of the same, according to the lines of her original purchase. The evidence shows that respondent used the land for grazing purposes, to which it was best adapted. The land was fenced on two sides. Steiger paid rent to her for grazing his cattle upon the tract, and she has paid taxes upon it since her purchase. All of the neighbors seem to have respected her possession, and no one ever disputed her right to the same prior to the settlement of Reed. Her claim relates back to the date of the act, although she has been disturbed in her actual possession since the settlement of third parties. Among other facts conceded in the record is the fact that her grantor, Brown, put her in possession of the tract. The deed from Hooker to Brown gives a description of the 640 acres, and one of the witnesses testified that the tract was bounded on the west by Sonoma creek, on the south by land belonging to Camp and Bergin, on the east by government land, and on the north by the Stone tract. To constitute actual possession, it is not necessary that there should be an inclosure, and there can be no doubt, we think, that respondent's land was sufficiently identified. Steinbach v. Stewart, 11 Wall. 567, where the grant in question was considered. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MUNROE. (No. 20,973.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1893.)

FORGERY—WHAT SUBJECT OF—ORDER FOR TEACHER'S SALARY—ABSENT WITNESS—EVIDENCE PREVIOUSLY GIVEN—TRIAL—VARIANCE.

1. Since the assignment by a public school teacher of salary not yet earned is void, the false making of such an instrument does not constitute forgery.

2. But if the instrument containing such intended assignment contain likewise a guaranty of payment of the sum assigned, and a provision that, if the sum is not collected by a certain time, it will be paid by the assignee, it is valid in part, and hence is a subject for forgery.

3. Where a witness telegraphed and wrote to the district attorney from another state that, owing to business engagements in that state, he could not be present at the trial, which began about 12 days thereafter, and the return to a subpoena for such witness was that he could not be found within the county, there was a showing of such "due diligence" as justified the reading at the trial of his evidence taken at the preliminary examination before a committing magistrate, under Pen. Code, § 686, providing for the reading of such evidence upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that the witness "with due diligence cannot be found within the state."

4. On a prosecution for forgery, where the prosecuting witness states that he was present when the complaint was drawn by the district attorney, that they compared the copy therein of the instrument alleged to have been forged with the original, and that such copy was correct, it is proper, if the original is in defendant's possession, and he refuses to produce it after notice so to do, to allow the witness to refresh his memory as to the original by reference to the copy in the complaint.

5. Where a part of an answer is not responsive to the question, and a part is directly so, but the whole is relevant, material, and competent, it is proper to refuse to strike it out as being irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and as being irresponsible to the question.

6. On a prosecution for forgery, a witness testifying as to the forged instrument cannot refresh his memory by reference to the copy contained in the information, which he does not, of his own knowledge, know to be correct.

7. An order drawn directly on a city, instead of on the auditor thereof, is not void on its face.

8. Where an information for forgery sets out the forged instrument as an order addressed to a city, the fact that it was in reality addressed to the auditor of the city does not constitute a variance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

George Munroe was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Williams and Wm. E. Cox, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HAYNES, C. The defendant was convicted of forgery, and this appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Appellant's principal contention is that the information does not state facts which constitute a public offense, for the reason that the forged instrument would, if it were genuine, be void upon its face. Said instrument is as follows: "No. 78. Los Angeles, Cal., Feb. 1, 1892. To the city of Los Angeles, Cal.: Please deliver to the State Investment Co., or order, my warrant upon the treasurer of said city for the month of February, 1892; and I hereby authorize the State Investment Co., or order, to receipt for and collect the sum of $80 due me as teacher; and, for value received, I hereby sell, assign, and set over to the State Investment Co., or order, the sum of $80, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per month from March 2, 1892, and I guaranty payment of the above-stated amount on or before March 2, 1892, authorizing the State Investment Co., or order, to collect any warrants drawn in my favor until the amount of this claim and interest are paid in full, and, in case suit is instituted, to collect this claim or any portion thereof, I promise to pay such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable as attorneys' fees in said suit. [Signed] Helen Henry." The information charges that defendant forged said instrument with intent to defraud one J. W. Jackson, to whom he transferred it by indorsement.

It is well settled in this state and elsewhere that the indictment or information must show that the forged instrument is such that, if genuine, it could be made available in law to work the intended fraud or injury; that, if it is a nullity upon its face, no case is made, unless by averment it can be shown how it could be made to operate injuriously or fraudulently. People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 506; People v. Ferris, 56 Cal. 445; Ex parte Finley, 66 Cal. 262, 5 Pac. Rep. 222. It is also well settled that the unearned salary of a public officer is not assignable, because against public policy, and that any instrument intended to operate as such assignment is void. Bangs v. Dunn, 66 Cal. 72, 4 Pac. Rep. 963; Bliss v. Lawrence, 58 N. Y. 442. This principle, however, is not confined to those commonly called "public officers," though we think teachers in the public schools may be properly designated as such. Their employment is a public one, made under the authority of law, and their compensation is paid out of public funds provided by law for that purpose. See Pol. Code, §§ 1696-1704. In Arbuckle v. Cowtan, 3 Bos. & P. 328, quoted with approval by the court of appeals of the state of New York in Bliss v. Lawrence, supra, it was laid down as a general principle "that all such profits as a man receives in respect to the performance of a public duty are from their very nature exempt from attachment and incapable of assignment." The attorney general, on behalf of the people, does not controvert either of the foregoing propositions, but contends that the instrument in question is something more than an assignment of the unearned salary of a teacher; that it contains a guaranty of the payment of the moneys there mentioned; that Helen Henry had a right to make such guaranty; and that it could be legally enforced. This contention we think is sound, and must be sustained. There is nothing criminal in the assignment of the unearned salary. It is simply void because it is against public policy. The officer whose duty it is to draw the warrants for teachers' salaries was not bound to regard the assignment, or to issue the warrants to the assignee. Notwithstanding the assignment he could, without creating any liability against himself or the city, issue the warrant to the teacher. This would seem to have been a contingency understood or anticipated, and as a protection to the assignee the guaranty was inserted. The test is, could an action have been maintained against Helen Henry for the recovery of the warrant if the instrument had been genuine? The instrument admits that she has received value for the assignment of her warrant for the month of February. The warrant, if earned, would be for the sum of $80; but interest on that sum at 10 per cent. per month from March 2, 1892, is promised if the money is not then paid, and there is the further express promise to pay such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable as attorneys' fees in case suit is instituted to collect the claim. There are many cases where money paid upon an illegal contract may be recovered. In contracts which contemplate the performance of some act involving moral turpitude and therefore malum in se, no action can be maintained by either party to the contract. But this is not that case. It is not out of special regard for the officer as an individual that the assignment is held void, but for the protection of the public by securing to the officer that compensation without which he may be unable to discharge the duties of his office. But he is not prevented from incurring personal obligations, nor from devoting his salary when received to the payment or discharge of such obligations. Credit may be given him or money loaned to him upon the promise to pay out of his salary when received, and a written agreement so to pay is not illegal. The fact that payment was attempted to be secured by an assignment of the warrant, such assignment being void, does not affect the validity of the guaranty or promise to pay the amount. When a salary warrant is issued, it is assignable, and the assignee may collect or receive payment of the warrant; and it will be observed that the guaranty is not that the warrant will be issued to the assignee, but is for the "payment of the above-stated amount." Upon the face of the instrument the transaction appears to be an advancement or loan of $80, to secure which the borrower assigns her unearned salary for the month of February, authorizing her assignee to receive the warrant and collect the money thereon, but providing that, if the money is not collected on or before March 2d, that she will pay the amount, and, as a further security, authorizes the assignee to collect other warrants drawn in her favor "until the amount of this claim and interest are paid in full." The assignment is void, but the debt and obligation to pay is legal and binding, and therefore the subject of forgery.

A large number of exceptions were taken to rulings of the court upon the admission of evidence, several of which are argued by appellant's counsel.

J. W. Jackson, the prosecuting witness, was not present at the trial, and his testimony taken before the examining magistrate was read in evidence to the jury. It is insisted by appellant that the preliminary evidence offered by the district attorney did not show that Jackson was absent from the state at the time of the trial. This evidence consisted of a telegram from Jackson to the district attorney, dated at Kansas City, Mo., September 30, 1892, in reply to a telegram from the district attorney addressed to him at that place, and two letters, the first postmarked Kansas City, September 22, 1892, and the second postmarked at the same place, October 13, 1892, in each of which he said it was impossible for him to come to California on account of business relations he had formed, and expressed regret that he could not do so. A subpoena for this witness was duly returned by the sheriff of Los Angeles county that the witness could not be found within his county. Upon this evidence the testimony of the witness Jackson, taken upon the examination of appellant before the committing magistrate, was received. Section 686 of the Penal Code provides that such testimony may be read upon the trial "upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he (the witness) is dead or insane, or with due diligence cannot be found within the state." The actual absence of the witness from the state is not required to be shown, but it must appear that he cannot with "due diligence" be found within the state. We think due diligence was shown. During the 10 or 11 days intervening between the date of Jackson's last letter and the time of the trial it was possible for him to have come within the state, but it certainly could not have been necessary for the people to have placed a guard upon every line of travel into the state to enable them to satisfy the court that he could not be found within it.

The instrument alleged to have been forged, a copy of which appears to have been set out in the complaint in the justice's court, was not produced upon the examination. The witness Jackson (whose testimony taken upon the examination before the magistrate was being read to the jury) had stated that he was present when the complaint was drawn by the district attorney, that they compared it, and that the copy in the complaint was correct; whereupon the justice said to the witness: "You may go on and state, refreshing your recollection as you please, the contents of that instrument." Upon the reading of this testimony in the superior court, appellant's counsel objected to the above direction given by the justice to the witness, and the testimony of the witness following, which appears to have been a reading of that portion of the complaint. The superior court overruled the objection, and permitted the testimony in relation to the contents of the paper to be read to the jury. The direction of the justice was too broad, but it does not appear that the witness improperly refreshed his recollection. He was present when the copy was taken from the original; assisted in comparing it. The copy thus made was competent as secondary evidence of the contents of the original, the original, after it was copied, having gotten into the possession of the defendant, and was not produced, though its production was demanded. We think the superior court did not err in overruling appellant's objection.

A part of an answer given by the witness was not responsive to the question, and a part was directly responsive. Appellant moved to strike out the answer on the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and also that it was not responsive to the question. The first objection was properly overruled, as the whole of the answer was relevant, material, and competent; and the second objection was also properly overruled, as the motion went to the whole answer, and part of it was directly responsive to the question.

Thomas F. Smith, deputy city auditor of the city of Los Angeles, was called for the prosecution, and testified that he saw the Helen Henry order in the office of the city auditor; that Mr. Jackson had it; and that a warrant was drawn in favor of Helen Henry, and delivered to Jackson. Upon cross-examination he testified that "the orders were addressed to the city auditor and city treasurer,—to both." Upon redirect examination the witness said: "I do not remember whether the word 'auditor' after the words 'to the city' was written or printed in. I think it was there. At this point in the re-examination of the witness, the deputy district attorney showed the witness the information containing a copy of the forged instrument, with the request, 'Now look at this.' Defendant's counsel objected that it was not a paper that the witness saw or executed or made, and that it was nothing by which the witness could refresh his recollection; to which the attorney for the people replied: 'It don't make any difference. It is a paper proven to have been an exact copy of the original.' The court overruled the defendant's objection, and permitted the witness to examine the copy contained in the information, and thereupon the witness further testified: 'As I stated, I thought the word 'auditor' was written in there, but I would not be positive. I would not like to swear that it was or was not, but at the same time I thought it was there. These forms are gotten out in that way. I thought it was there because it was customary to put it there.' The mode adopted by the prosecution in the re-examination of this witness was most extraordinary, and the court erred in permitting it. An inspection of the writing set out in the information could not by any possibility refresh his recollection. It might lead him to distrust his memory, or convince him that he was mistaken, but, if so, it could only be because he relied upon the statement of another that "it is a paper proven to have been an exact copy of the original." It was for the jury to say whether the forged instrument was correctly set out in the information, and counsel had no right to assume, for the purpose of affecting the testimony of the witness, that it was proven to be a correct copy. The means which may be used to refresh the recollection of a witness, as embodied in section 2047 of the Code of Civil Procedure, has long been the settled law, and there are no precedents to the contrary. The question remains, however, whether the defendant was prejudiced by this error. If the alleged variance between the instrument as set out in the information and the original was material, the error was prejudicial; otherwise, it was not. The defendant, as he had a right to do, assumed two apparently inconsistent positions. He contended that the instrument as set out in the information, being addressed to the city of Los Angeles, and not to the auditor, was for that reason void; and that the original was in fact addressed to the auditor, and therefore was a different instrument from that for the forgery of which he was being tried, or, in other words, that there was a variance between the information and the proof. An immaterial variance must be disregarded. There are two aspects in which the variance in this case must be considered: (1) As to whether the validity of the instrument, if genuine, was affected; and (2) whether, if the forged instrument was addressed to the auditor, as the defendant sought to prove, a conviction or acquittal upon the information in this case could be made available as a bar to another prosecution upon an information in which the instrument should be shown to be addressed to the auditor.

1. As to the validity of the instrument as set out in the information, the defendant requested the court to charge the jury that "an order drawn directly on the city of Los Angeles, and not drawn on the auditor of said city, is void on its face, and could not be enforced." This instruction was refused by the court, and we think correctly. The auditor is but the agent of the city. A corporation can only act by or through its officers, who are its agents. The address to the city was quite sufficient, and fully authorized the auditor to act.

2. We see no ground upon which it could be successfully contended that a conviction under this information would not bar a prosecution upon the instrument in question if it should afterwards appear that it was in fact addressed to the auditor, and a new information should so charge it. Wharton, in his work on Criminal Pleading and Practice, (section 173,) says: "The great rigor of the old English law in this respect was one of the consequences of the barbarous severity of the punishment imposed. A more humane system of punishment was followed by a more rational system of pleading."

The order in question was for the salary of a certain person for the month of February, 1892, to the State Investment Company, indorsed by the defendant to J. W. Jackson, and a warrant was in fact issued thereon to Jackson. It is the order upon which a warrant was issued to Jackson for the salary of Helen Henry for the month of February, 1892, for the sum of $80, which the defendant has been found guilty of forging. It is not like the case of a counterfeit bank bill, where a letter or a figure may be the only means of distinguishing it from thousands of others of the same denomination purporting to be issued by the same bank. In People v. Hughes, 29 Cal. 258, the defendant was charged with arson, committed to defraud an insurance company. In the indictment the insurance company was named the "Hartford Insurance Company." The name as proved on the trial was the "Hartford Fire Insurance Company." The court said: "It is sufficient to say that, under our practice, this is no ground for the arrest of judgment." Page 262. This remark was made independently of the section of the practice act which also justified the conclusion of the court. In People v. Phillips, 70 Cal. 61, 11 Pac. Rep. 493, the information alleged the forgery of a promissory note described as payable "to H. C. Phillips, or order." The note given in evidence did not contain the word "to." Held, the variance was immaterial. See, also, People v. Tonielli, 81 Cal. 275, 22 Pac. Rep. 678. As the omission of the words "city auditor" was not essential either to the validity of the instrument or its identification, we must hold, both upon principle and authority, the error under consideration was not prejudicial.

Other rulings upon evidence are assigned for error, most of which are mentioned only by number, and are not discussed. We have, however, examined the whole record, and find no error which would justify a reversal. The exceptions to the instructions to the jury given and refused have been sufficiently covered in the foregoing opinion. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

RAMISH v. KIRSCHBRAUN et al. (No. 19,165.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1893.)

BREACH OF CONTRACT—DELAY IN DELIVERY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

In an action for delay in delivering eggs agreed to be delivered as soon as they should arrive by freight, the measure of damages is the difference between their value at the place of delivery at the time when they were delivered and when they should have been delivered.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by A. Ramish against Kirschbraun & Sons for delay in delivery of a car load of eggs. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Gould & Stanford, for appellants. Del Valle & Munday, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The facts of this case are fully stated in the opinion of the court found in 90 Cal. 581, 27 Pac. Rep. 433, where the judgment and order of the trial court were reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. A new trial was had, judgment again went for plaintiff, and the case is now before us for the second time. Plaintiff, in Los Angeles, purchased from defendants, in Omaha, a car load of eggs, to be delivered in Los Angeles. The eggs arrived in Los Angeles July 8th, but owing, as it is claimed, to the negligence of the defendants, plaintiff was unable to secure possession of them until July 14th. In the mean time the price of eggs dropped, and this action is brought to recover damages upon a failure to deliver on the 8th of July. Upon the question as to the measure of damages, the trial court instructed the jury as follows: "If your verdict be for the plaintiff, you should then, of course, estimate the amount of damages, and in estimating the amount of damages the rule should be the difference between what the eggs cost plaintiff by the terms of the contract and the value of the eggs to him at the time and place when they ought to have been delivered by the terms of the contract. The value to him at that time and place was the market value at that time and place." The foregoing instruction does not state the true rule of damages in a case of this character. The cost price of the eggs is an immaterial element in the case. If the foregoing rule be the correct one, then the value of the eggs at the time they were actually received by plaintiff would be an immaterial element, and evidence addressed to that inquiry not within the issue. But the contrary is the fact, and a determination as to the value upon the 14th of July, the day when the eggs were actually received, is absolutely necessary in order that plaintiff's damage may be properly estimated. It is entirely apparent that the eggs may have been of a greater value on July 14th, when they were actually received than they were upon July 8th, when they should have been received. Upon such an assumption of facts, plaintiff would not have suffered any damage whatever, but, on the contrary, would have been greatly benefited by the delay in delivery; yet, under the instructions of the court, heretofore quoted, he might have been entitled to the amount of damages awarded by the jury. In addition to the reasons already suggested, this court said in the previous decision of the case, (90 Cal. 581, 27 Pac. Rep. 433:) "The evidence should have been confined to the inquiry of what was the market value of the eggs between July 8th and July 14th." The law of the case must be deemed as settled to that effect. For the foregoing reasons let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

99 Cal. 25

BAY VIEW SCHOOL DIST. OF SANTA CRUZ COUNTY v. LINSKOTT, County Superintendent of Public Schools. (No. 15,199.) (Supreme Court of California. July 20, 1893.)
SCHOOL DISTRICTS—DIVISION—EFFECT OF INCORPORATION OF TOWN

1. Under Pol. Code, § 1576, providing that each city or incorporated town, unless subdivided by the legislative authority thereof, shall form a school district, by the incorporation of a portion of a school district as a city or town, all that portion of the district within the exterior boundaries of the city or town is withdrawn from the district.

2. Where a portion of a school district is incorporated as a city or town, the fact that the trustees of the district continue to maintain, as before, for the benefit of the children of their district, a school within the territory included in the city or town, does not entitle such district to a portion of the school fund of the county, in the absence of any school in the portion of the district not included in such newly-incorporated city or town.

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Application by the Bay View School district, of Santa Cruz county, for a writ of mandate to compel John W. Linscott, county superintendent of public schools, to apportion to plaintiff a part of the county school funds. Writ denied.

Charles B. Younger, for petitioner. Spalsbury & Burke, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. August, 1865, there were in Santa Cruz county two adjacent school districts, one known as the "Santa Cruz School District," and the other as the "Bay View School District." Since that time, both have maintained their autonomy, electing trustees at the proper times, and have kept up schools within the original boundaries of their respective districts. The Bay View district, the plaintiff here, in 1868, purchased a lot for its schoolhouse, and has since expended $5,000 in building a schoolhouse upon it. In this house its school has been since maintained, where there has been an average attendance of 100 pupils. At every apportionment of school moneys by the superintendent of said county, up to December 15, 1891, its share has been apportioned to plaintiff, and has been expended by it by orders drawn upon the treasury in the usual mode. At the last-named date the defendant, as superintendent of schools, refused to make any apportionment to plaintiff, and has since refused to recognize plaintiff, or its rights to the public moneys, on the grounds (1) that said Bay View school district has no legal existence; (2) that the persons claiming to act as trustees of said alleged school district are not trustees thereof; and (3) that no public school has been maintained within the exterior boundaries of said alleged Bay View school district, as defined and fixed by the order creating said district, except the public school hereinbefore referred to, which school, since March, 1866, has been maintained in a schoolhouse situate within the exterior boundaries of the town (now city) of Santa Cruz.

The contention is that the portion of Bay View school district within the exterior boundaries of the city of Santa Cruz has ceased to be a portion of such school district, and therefore no school has been maintained within the district. The question to be determined, therefore, is whether, by the incorporation of the town or city of Santa Cruz, all that portion of the school district within the exterior boundaries of the city has been withdrawn from the district.

It was said by this court in Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. Rep. 1067: "The power to change the boundaries of the district, as well as to define them in the first instance, is of legislative origin, and whether exercised immediately, by the legislature, or mediately, by a board of supervisors,—the local legislature,—is, whenever exercised, a legislative act. It is well settled that the legislature has the power to make such changes, and that in the exercise of this power it may make such provision respecting the property and obligations of the corporation as it may deem equitable or proper, and that its action in this respect is conclusive." The town of Santa Cruz was incorporated by special act of the legislature March 31, 1866, and the exterior boundaries defined so as to include a large portion of Bay View school district, with the lot upon which the trustees of the school district subsequently erected their schoolhouse, and where they have since maintained their school. March 11, 1876, the city of Santa Cruz was incorporated, with the same boundaries as the town of Santa Cruz. At the time of the incorporation of the city, section 1576 of the Political Code read as follows: "Each county, city or incorporated town, unless subdivided by the legislative authority thereof, forms a school district." The legislative authority of Santa Cruz has never subdivided the city into school districts. In 1878 the above section was amended so as to read: "Each county, city, or incorporated town, unless subdivided by the legislative authority thereof, forms a school district; provided the board of supervisors may include more territory than that now included within the boundaries of any incorporated town." March 20, 1891, this section was amended as follows: "Every county, city or incorporated town, unless subdivided by the legislative authority thereof, forms a school district; provided, that whenever a city or town shall be incorporated the board of supervisors may upon petition annex thereto for school purposes only the remainder of the district or districts from which said city or town was organized, or any part thereof; and provided further, that whenever any territory shall be annexed to a city or an incorporated town for school purposes, the board of education or of school trustees of said city or incorporated town shall have full control for school purposes only of the territory or property so annexed." The board of supervisors of the county of Santa Cruz has not annexed any territory to the city of Santa Cruz for school purposes. Had it done so, the authority to divide such territory with the territory of the city into school districts would have been in the legislative authority of the city or school trustees. In view of these statutes, there can be no doubt but that the city of Santa Cruz constitutes a school district. Certain acts of the city, of the school district, and of the school superintendent are cited, as showing a recognition of the plaintiff as a school district with its original boundaries, and as an estoppel upon defendant. But an act of the legislature, within legislative power, fixing the boundaries of the political subdivisions of the state, cannot be repealed by the officers of such subdivisions, not even by acts of estoppel in pais. After the incorporation of the city the board of supervisors ceased to have any power over the school districts within the city. It must then be taken for granted that the portion of Bay View school district which was included within the exterior boundaries of the city has ceased to constitute a part of that district. The school was therefore not maintained within the district.

A school was, however, maintained by the trustees of the district for the benefit of the children of the district, and there is no complaint that they have not been fully accommodated, or their educational wants fully satisfied, so far as such school could do so. Is this such compliance with the law as will entitle plaintiff to the mandate? It is important to remember that the money has been apportioned and paid out. There is actually no money in the treasury to be apportioned. Perhaps, if insisted upon, this would be sufficient to defeat the application. To issue the mandate now would be of no avail, nor would it compel the respondent to refund the amount on the ground that he has illegally disbursed it. If, in doing so, he has followed the law, he cannot be made to do this no matter how great the hardship upon plaintiff. Sections 1543-1859, Pol. Code, do not expressly provide that such school shall be within the district, but such is clearly the implication. The purpose of establishing school districts is that schools may be brought conveniently near the pupils. This intent could be defeated if the trustees could maintain school out of the district. Section 5, art. 9, of the constitution, provides that: "The legislature shall provide a system of common schools by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each district. * * *" The provisions made by the legislature will be presumed to be intended to effectuate this, as well as other purposes, and the statutes indicate this. Section 1858, Pol. Code, gives the trustee power to manage school property within the district. Section 1581 requires every new district to open a school therein within four months. See, also, section 1662. If a district may, under the law, maintain a school outside of the district, other unpleasant consequences might follow, which it is unnecessary to specify. It is enough that so the law is written.

It is suggested that the Santa Cruz district also antedates the incorporation of the city, and, according to the agreed case, all of it is not included within the city of Santa Cruz. It does not appear that the corporation now known as the "Santa Cruz School District" is the school district created by the statutes above cited, and whose boundaries are coincident with the city boundaries. On the contrary, it appears from the agreed case that such is not the fact. Santa Cruz school district may be in the same condition as Bay View school district, and may not be entitled to any of the school moneys, for the same reason. This may be so, but Santa Cruz school district is not a party to this case. It is not bound by the agreed case here, and no question is raised, or can be, in regard to its rights. It would not help the case of plaintiff to show that money has been improperly apportioned to Santa Cruz school district. I think the order should be denied.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is denied.

PEOPLE v. HYNDMAN. (No. 20,966.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 19, 1893.)
HOMICIDE—INDICTMENT—JUSTIFICATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. It is not necessary that an indictment for murder state the means with which crime was committed.

2. Under Pen. Code, § 187, defining murder as the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought, it is unnecessary to allege that the killing was deliberate and premeditated.

3. Defendant had a quarrel in a saloon with a woman who had come in with deceased. Deceased interfered, and, while deceased held defendant down on the floor, the woman struck defendant with a hammer, cutting through his ear. Held, that it was error to add to an instruction justifying the killing, if it was done under a reasonable fear by defendant of loss of life or great bodily harm at the hands of deceased and the woman jointly, a condition that deceased and the woman had a preconceived design, and had agreed together, prior to the infliction of the wounds causing deceased's death, to jointly assault defendant.

4. While threats made by defendant between a quarrel and reconciliation in good faith cannot be considered, in the absence of subsequent threats, it is proper to add to an instruction that if defendant had not, in good faith, forgiven deceased, the threats could be considered.

5. Though there had been no reconciliation, the killing might be justifiable, if defendant was assaulted under such circumstances that he had reasonable grounds to believe, and did believe, that it was necessary to preserve his own life, or prevent great bodily injury.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

William Hyndman was convicted of murder, and appeals. Reversed.

G. L. Waters, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and Wm. H. Layson, First Dep., for the People.

HAYNES, C. The defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The body of the information is as follows: "William Hyndman is accused by the district attorney for the county of Nevada, state of California, by this information, of the crime of murder, (a felony,) committed as follows: The said William Hyndman, on, to wit, the 8th day of July, 1892, at and in the county of Nevada, and state of California, and prior to the filing of this information, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and of his malice aforethought, did kill and murder one William Searle, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California." The defendant demurred to this information and the demurrer was overruled, and defendant also objected to the introduction of any evidence upon the same grounds. Briefly stated, the points urged by appellant are (1) that the information does not allege the means used, nor state facts sufficient to apprise the defendant of the nature of the evidence the people will offer in that regard, or such facts as would enable him to prepare his defense; (2) that the information does not allege that the killing was "deliberate and premeditated."

At common law it was indispensable to a good indictment that the means used to procure death should be stated in all cases where such means were known, and, if unknown, the absence of the allegation must be excused by the statement that the means used were unknown. Under legislation adopted in England in 1851, and afterwards in Canada, an indictment in the form of this information is declared to be good, and this legislation has been incorporated into the statutes of several of the states. While there is no statutory provision in this state expressly declaring such form of indictment or information to be sufficient, it has several times been held that such averments are unnecessary. People v. Alviso, 55 Cal. 230; People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 388. In People v. King, 27 Cal. 510, and People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 192, the question as to changes effected in criminal pleadings by the Code was discussed. In the latter case it was said: "While it may be well to state the means by which death was caused, we do not consider such a course indispensable." No case is reported in this state where such averments are discouraged, though held unnecessary. To prevent misconception it may be added that in none of the cases so holding was the homicide committed in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate, arson or other felonies mentioned in that connection in section 189 of the Penal Code. On the authority of the cases above cited, the first objection made to the information cannot be sustained.

As to the second objection, Pen. Code, § 187, defines murder as follows: "Murder is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought." In People v. De La Cour Soto, 63 Cal. 166, it was held that murder, thus defined, includes both degrees, and that it is sufficient to charge the offense committed in the language of the statute defining it. See, also, People v. Martin, 47 Cal. 101.

Other points made by appellant require a statement of the circumstances under which the homicide occurred. The defendant and deceased were working together in a mine a month or two prior to the homicide. The superintendent met defendant in the mine, and the latter, in an excited manner, put his head down, and said Searle (the deceased) had hit him with a drill or hammer. Searle called defendant a liar, and the two "squared off" to fight. The superintendent separated them, and discharged them both, but soon after took Searle back, and put him to work. Defendant was not re-employed. On the evening of the homicide, Searle and the defendant met in the store of one Kohler, who also kept a bar in the same room. The old difficulty was talked over, and they "made up friends," shook hands and drank together, and shortly afterwards another drink was taken, and again they shook hands. Searle made some purchases of some provisions, which were placed in a basket, and he left the store. He was then living with a woman named Lou Kane, who was not his wife, and who was reputed to be a woman of the town. Shortly after Searle left the store, he returned with this woman, and his basket, and took a seat upon a bench. Lou Kane made some purchases, and, while standing at the bar counter, defendant asked her to treat, which she did. According to her testimony, defendant said to her he used to know her at Pioche, to which she replied that she never was there, and that defendant called her a liar, and she then "hailed off, and slapped him in the face;" that the defendant commenced slapping her, whereupon Searle came, and shoved them apart. Other testimony tended to show that it was the woman who gave the "lie," and that defendant seized her by the arms after she had slapped him in the face. When Searle pushed the defendant and the woman apart, the men grappled each other, and after a short struggle they fell to the floor, the defendant underneath. While in this position the woman struck the defendant at least twice with a hammer, cutting entirely through his ear, so that it had to be stitched up to keep it together. Mr. Kohler testified that defendant called him twice, saying, "Oh, Kohler, Kohler!" that he ran round, and pulled Searle off, "but he was dead then, or as good as dead; he never spoke another word." The fatal wound was inflicted with a pocketknife; one being in the thigh, partly severing the femoral artery, and another penetrating the heart. As to the stage of the struggle at which these wounds were inflicted,—whether before or after the defendant was struck with the hammer,—the evidence is conflicting. The defendant testified positively that he did not take out or use the knife until he was struck with the hammer, and that he believed that it was necessary to use it to preserve his own life, or to prevent great bodily harm. Lou Kane, on the other hand, testified that she did not strike defendant with the hammer until after Searle cried out that he was cut. There was also other evidence upon this point, not necessary to be noticed in this connection. Under this state of the case, the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that if the woman joined in the assault upon the defendant with a hammer, or other instrument likely to produce death, or to do great bodily harm, "and the defendant had reason to fear, and did fear, that his life was in imminent danger, or that he was in danger of receiving great bodily harm, at the hands of said Kane and William Searle, the deceased, jointly, and that defendant acted under the influence of such fears alone, and to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, gave the mortal cuts to the deceased, he was justified, and the jury should acquit." This instruction was refused, and the court, of its own motion, gave the following: "If the jury find from the evidence that the deceased, William Searle, at the time of the homicide charged, made an assault upon the person of the defendant, and violently threw him to the floor, and continued his assault in a violent manner, and the jury find further from the evidence that the deceased, Searle, and the witness Mrs. Kane had a preconceived design, and had agreed together, prior to the inflicting of the wounds that caused the death of the deceased, to jointly assault the defendant, and inflict upon him some great bodily injury, and you further find from the evidence that prior to the infliction of such wounds the said Mrs. Kane, in pursuance of such agreement, joined in the assault upon the defendant with a hammer, or some other instrument or thing in her hands likely to produce death, or to do the defendant some great bodily injury, and did strike the defendant on the head with such hammer, instrument, or thing, and the jury find from the evidence that such assault endangered the life of the defendant, or that he was in danger of great bodily harm at the hands of said Kane and deceased jointly, and you further find from the evidence that the defendant had reason for and did fear that his life was in imminent danger, or that he was in danger of receiving great bodily harm at the hands of said Kane and Searle, the deceased, jointly, and that the defendant acted under the influence of such fears alone, and to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, gave the mortal cuts to the deceased, he was justified, and the jury should acquit. If, however, you believe from the evidence that there was not any preconceived design or agreements between said deceased and said Mrs. Kane to inflict at the time of said homicide, jointly, upon the person of the defendant, a serious bodily injury, and that the assault or injury, if any, were inflicted by the said Kane voluntarily, and without any design or request by the deceased, and if, in such case, at the time of the infliction of such wounds, the defendant had no sufficient reason to apprehend a design on the part of the deceased to take his life, or inflict upon him great bodily injury, then the defendant was not justifiable."

The court erred in refusing to give the instruction asked for, and in giving the instruction above quoted. It certainly could make no difference to the defendant whether the deceased and Mrs. Kane had a preconceived design, and had agreed together to assault the defendant. If he had reason to fear, and did fear, that his life was in danger, or that he was about to receive great bodily injury, he was not obliged to ascertain whether there was in fact such preconceived design, at the risk of converting what would be a justifiable homicide, if such preconceived design and agreement existed, into murder, if it did not exist. The deceased, by being upon defendant, effectually prevented the defendant from protecting himself against the woman. They were in fact co-operating in the assault, and in the infliction of the injuries, upon the defendant. The assault was first made by the woman. The deceased, whether there had been any prior agreement or not, voluntarily joined in the assault. It may be that he had no intention to inflict any great bodily injury upon the defendant, or to put defendant's life in danger, but he was not justified in assaulting him, or joining in the assault made by the woman; but in either case the deceased and the woman, whether there was a preconceived purpose or not, became mutually responsible, each for the acts of the other, unless some dissent or remonstrance or disapproval was in some manner expressed, either by word or act. Of course, we do not intend to pass upon facts which are alone to be found by the jury. There was, however, evidence tending to prove a state of facts which made the request preferred by defendant's counsel pertinent, and which we necessarily assume in determining whether the court erred in determining it, and in giving the instruction above quoted.

The people, after giving evidence of the reconciliation between the defendant and the deceased, which took place in Kohler's saloon, and of the subsequent homicide, questioned certain witnesses as to threats made by the defendant towards deceased after the difficulty at the mine, and prior to their meeting at the saloon. Evidence of these threats was received, over defendant's objection. In view of this testimony, the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that if defendant and deceased, in good faith, "made up good friends, and that each forgave the other all past differences and animosities, and no new threats were made by defendant," such former threats could not be considered by the jury as evidence of malice. This instruction was given, with the following qualification: "But if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant had not, in good faith, forgiven the deceased, and made up good friends, prior to the infliction of the wounds by the defendant, then the jury has the right to consider the past threats of the defendant, if any there were, for the purpose, with the other evidence in the case, of determining the question of malice." We think the evidence of previous threats was properly received, and cannot say that the modification of the instruction by the court was erroneous. There is no class of evidence, however, more likely to be given undue weight and importance by juries, or requiring greater care on the part of the court, to prevent misconception or misapplication. It does not necessarily follow, because a man avows an intention to commit a crime, that such intention really exists. Threats may be uttered in a transient fit of anger, or through bravado, and it requires careful attention to other circumstances to ascertain with reasonable certainty the actual intention of the party making them. One would naturally suppose that a sane man, intending to commit a crime, would not make known his purpose by threatening to perpetrate it, yet such threats have been fulfilled; and therefore, unless under special circumstances, such evidence is competent. If, for example, the time or the manner in which the homicide is committed correspond to the threat, or other circumstances clearly connect them, they are entitled to great weight. But, "such is the indulgence shown human frailty, that when two persons have fought, even on malice, and afterwards, to all appearance, are reconciled, and fight again on fresh quarrel, it will not be presumed that they were moved by the old grudge, unless it appear from all the circumstances of the fact." State v. Barnwell, 80 N. C. 470, citing Hawk. P. C. c. 31, § 30; State v. Jackson, 2 Jones, (N. C.) 247; State v. Hill, 4 Dev. & B. 491. Besides, if there had been no reconciliation, if the defendant was assaulted, and placed under such circumstances that he had good reason to believe, and did believe, that it was necessary to take the life of the deceased to preserve his own, or to prevent the infliction of great bodily injury, the fact of the previous ill will or malice sustained towards the deceased could not take away his right to self-defense, or convert a justifiable homicide into murder. The instruction, as given, does not, when considered with other instructions, exclude these considerations, and in many cases is all that could be necessary to say to the jury in that connection; but, in viewing the peculiar circumstances of this case, we think it advisable that the attention of the jury should be called, in that connection, to the qualifications above suggested.

The instruction given by the court upon the subject of good character is not objectionable.

The further contention of appellant, that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict, need not be noticed, in view of the conclusion to which we have arrived. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE ex rel. ATTORNEY GENERAL v. SAN FRANCISCO PUBLIC STOCK EXCHANGE. (No. 14,668.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 11, 1893.)

CORPORATIONS—ANNULMENT OF CHARTER—PLEADING.

The complaint in an action to annul the charter of a corporation, for conducting a business in violation of the laws against lotteries and gambling, should clearly and distinctly allege its illegal acts.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California, upon the complaint and information of the attorney general, to annul the charter of the San Francisco Public Stock Exchange. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, for appellant. Davis Louderback, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appeal from a judgment upon demurrer to the complaint. The complaint alleges the incorporation of defendant, and sets out its articles of incorporation, constitution, and by-laws in full. Its business, as shown by its articles of incorporation, is to buy and sell stocks, bonds, and securities. Except as to one feature, the mode of conducting its business is the same as that of other exchanges with which the public are familiar, so far as appears from its constating instruments, and that is that it permits the use of the phonograph in making orders, offers, and bids. These offers or bids may be spoken into the private phonograph of the person making the bid or offer, or into phonographs kept by the exchange for that purpose in adjacent rooms, and the cylinders containing these bids are placed upon a table in the exchange room, and afterwards placed in the "main phonograph" consecutively, in the order in which they are received, and publicly announced; and the bid, offer, or order is then placed upon the blackboard. The bid, offer, or order must designate the member or broker who is to execute it, and the name of the person making it, unless he directs it to be withheld. The by-laws provide, among other things not material to be noticed, that no fictitious sales or contracts shall be made, and that all stocks and securities must be delivered within 30 minutes after the close of the session. Orders, bids, and offers may also be made orally or in writing, at the option of the party making them. The complaint charges that the mode of conducting business by the defendant is in violation of section 330 of the Penal Code, and in violation of the laws of this state, and of the ordinances of the city of San Francisco, "against conducting of lotteries, gambling, and games of chance, and is therefore illegal, and against public policy." It is conceded by appellant that the articles of incorporation, constitution, and by-laws, upon their face, seem to be legitimate and proper; that there is nothing in the law which inhibits the buying and selling of stocks, bonds, and securities, and that the proper use of the phonograph is not, in itself, objectionable. This being conceded, the complaint must be held insufficient, unless facts are alleged, showing either that defendant is not operating within its constitution and by-laws, or that while its constitution and by-laws may, upon their face, appear to be legal, the business done, though in conformity therewith, demonstrates their illegality. We do not find in the complaint any allegation tending to show either of such facts. While it is alleged that bids and offers are spoken into the phonograph without the hearing of members of the exchange or the public, and that no one knows the prices fixed until the same are announced through the main phonograph, it alleges that the bids and offers are consecutively announced through the main phonograph. No complaint is made of any wrong or injustice in making the announcements consecutively, nor do we see that any ground of complaint can be based upon the fact that no one can know of the bid or offer until it is announced, as that objection would be equally valid if all bids and offers were made orally. In appellant's brief the argument seems to be confined to the point that respondent's business, as conducted, is a lottery. We see in the complaint no statement of any element of chance, except that which inheres in all speculative business of like character. It is said in appellant's brief that "by a close perusal [of the complaint] it is seen that nothing of substance is either bought or sold." In a complaint seeking to annul the charter of a corporation, or to end its business by a perpetual injunction, the allegations of misuser ought to be so clear and distinct as to be seen without resorting to a close perusal. We can discover no averment of any fact showing that respondent's business is not conducted in conformity to its charter, constitution, and by-laws, or where in it violates any provision of the Penal Code. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

99 Cal. 57

ZELLERBACH v. ALLENBERG et al. (No. 14,313.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1893.)

DECREE IN EQUITABLE ACTION — RELIEF NOT PRAYED FOR — CONSPIRACY — SECONDARY EVIDENCE OF LETTERS — QUESTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW.

1. In an action to enjoin the sale by defendants of certain stock pledged by plaintiff to defendants, to have judgments recovered by the latter against the former, for money loaned, adjudged paid, and for an accounting, plaintiff alleged that the money loaned to him by defendants was embezzled from him by one of them, who was his clerk, under a conspiracy between all the defendants. Defendants denied the fraud and conspiracy, alleged that the stock was pledged to secure the loans made by them to plaintiff, pleaded as estoppels the judgments recovered by them against plaintiff, and asked for affirmative relief. Held, that under Code Civil Proc. § 580, authorizing the court to grant any relief consistent with the case made, and embraced within the issues, though not specifically prayed for, the court had power to decree that plaintiff was indebted to defendants on the judgments in certain sums, that defendants had a lien on the stock for such sums, and to order a sale of the stock by the sheriff to satisfy such indebtedness.

2. In an action to enjoin the sale of certain stock pledged by plaintiff to defendants, and to have certain judgments adjudged satisfied, where the court finds that plaintiff is indebted to defendants in the amount of the judgments, and that the latter have a lien on the pledged stock for the amount of such indebtedness, plaintiff cannot for the first time on appeal object that the judgments are barred by limitations.

3. The payment of cash dividends out of net earnings of a corporation is a question of policy, and the action of the directors in that regard, if honest and intelligent, will not be lightly overruled.

4. Where plaintiff alleges a conspiracy to defraud him, on the part of defendants, letters written by one defendant to another during the continuance of the alleged conspiracy are admissible.

5. Where a witness shows that letters had been mailed by him to a person in a foreign country, and that the witness had not thereafter seen them; that he received replies in due course of mail; and that he has no copies of the letters,—it is proper to admit secondary evidence thereof.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Marks Zellerbach against Charles Allenberg and others to restrain a sale of stock pledged by plaintiff to defendants, to have certain judgments adjudged paid and satisfied, and for other relief. From a judgment for defendants, and an order overruling a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The facts involved in this case, so far as they need be stated, are as follows: On December 31, 1875, the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant William Goldstein in the sum of \$50,000, for borrowed money, and on that day executed to him his promissory note for the sum named, payable one day after date, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month. On March 20, 1876, plaintiff was indebted to the defendant Charles Allenberg in the sum of \$9,000, and on that day he executed an agreement in writing by which he promised to pay, on or before January 20, 1877, the said sum of \$50,000 to Goldstein, and the said sum of \$9,000 to Allenberg, with interest on the same at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, payable quarterly. At the time of executing this agreement, plaintiff also executed to Allenberg a deed of conveyance of certain real property, situate in the county of Sierra, in this state, to secure payment of the said respective sums of money; and thereafter, in March, 1877, to further secure payment of the said respective sums of money, plaintiff pledged with Allenberg 30,000 shares of the capital stock of the Altoona Quicksilver Mining Company, and on March 7, 1879, for further security, plaintiff pledged with Allenberg 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the Eureka Lake & Yuba Canal Company. Immediately after receiving the said shares of stock in pledge, Allenberg surrendered the certificates therefor to the corporations, and took new certificates in his own name. He was then the attorney in fact of Goldstein, who resided in Germany; and all the transactions, so far as the latter was interested in them, were managed by him as such attorney. In March, 1877, plaintiff, being then indebted to the defendant, E. L. Goldstein, upon two promissory notes for \$10,000 each, given for borrowed money,—one dated February 26, 1876, and the other June 29, 1876, and both bearing interest at the rate of $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per month,—pledged with said E. L. Goldstein 11,000 shares of the capital stock of the Altoona Quicksilver Mining Company to secure payment of the said notes. On March 22, 1879, the defendants herein severally made personal demand upon the plaintiff that he pay to them the respective amounts for which he was indebted to them, and at the same time served him with written notice that unless he did make such payments they would, on the 5th day of May, 1879, at 12 o'clock noon, at the auction rooms of Middleton & Son, in San Francisco, sell the said shares of stock that had been pledged to them as aforesaid for the said respective amounts of indebtedness. On the said 5th day of May, 1879, plaintiff commenced this action in the late district court of the fourth judicial district in and for the city and county of San Francisco, to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants, and each of them, from selling, or offering for sale, the said shares of stock, or any of them. In his complaint the plaintiff admitted his indebtedness to the defendants, except that he claimed the indebtedness to Allenberg to be \$7,000, instead of \$9,000. The injunction was granted, as prayed for, and it remained in force until it was dissolved by the judgment now appealed from. On February 25, 1880, the defendant E. L. Goldstein commenced an action in the superior court in and for the county of San Francisco, against the plaintiff herein, to recover the amount due upon his said promissory notes. Summons was duly served on the defendant in the action, and, he failing to answer, judgment by default for the sum of \$34,645 was entered against him, and in favor of the plaintiff therein, on November 1, 1881. On January 19, 1881, the defendants Allenberg and William Goldstein commenced an action in the superior court in and for the county of Sierra, against the plaintiff herein, to recover judgment against him for the amount of his said indebtedness to them, and to obtain a decree foreclosing, as a mortgage, the deed of the real property in that county, and directing the sale of the stocks which had been given and pledged to Allenberg, as before stated, to secure payment of such indebtedness. The defendant in the action, Zellerbach, filed his answer to the complaint on August 16, 1881, denying that he was at all indebted to Allenberg, and also denying that he had ever pledged with Allenberg, for the benefit of the plaintiffs in the action, or for any purpose, 30,000 shares, or any number of shares, of the capital stock of the Altoona

Quicksilver Mining Company. Thereafter the case was tried, and on May 17, 1882, findings were filed, and judgment entered therein. The court found that Zellerbach was indebted to Allenberg in the sum of $15,651, for principal and interest, and to William Goldstein in the sum of $75,823.15, for principal and interest; that the real property in Sierra county had been conveyed, and the said 30,000 shares and 1,000 shares of stock had been pledged to secure payment of the indebtedness; and that the injunction issued in this action, restraining the sale of the said stock, was still in full force and effect. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiffs, for the amounts found due them, and it directed the sale of the real property, and the application of the proceeds thereof to the payment of the indebtedness, and further provided that, if the proceeds should be insufficient to pay the indebtedness, "application might be made to said court for an order or writ directing the sale of said shares of stock, and the application of the proceeds of said sale to the payment of such deficiency, and that until the further order of said court no process should issue therein for the sale of such stock, or any part thereof." From this judgment an appeal was taken to this court, and in February, 1884, the same was affirmed. Altenberg v. Zellerbach, 65 Cal. 26, 2 Pac. Rep. 726. Under the judgment the real property was sold, and the proceeds applied as directed. The whole indebtedness was not paid by the proceeds, but no application was subsequently made to the court for the sale of the said stocks. The Altoona Quicksilver Mining Company was incorporated in July, 1875, with 50,000 shares of capital stock. There were five directors of the company, and, from 1878 up to 1885, defendants E. L. Goldstein and Allenberg were two of such directors. The last election of directors was held September 25, 1880, when the three defendants herein, and two others, were chosen. From that time on, E. L. Goldstein was president, and Allenberg secretary and treasurer, of the company. The Altoona mine was worked profitably up to 1880, but in that year it became necessary, at a large expense, to sink to lower levels; and the work therein was practically suspended, and so continued up to the trial of this action. At the time of suspending work there was quicksilver on hand, the product of the mine, which was subsequently sold by the president, E. L. Goldstein, for sums aggregating, after paying all expenses of working, and indebtedness of the company, the sum of $22,730.63. This money was received by the president, and held by him up to the time of the trial; no dividend of any part of it having been declared, or credit therefor given to Zellerbach. At the times when the said stocks were transferred to Allenberg in pledge, as before stated, he was the confidential clerk and bookkeeper of Zellerbach. He was also, then and thereafter, the secretary of the Altoona Company, and received for his services as such $50 per month. On October 1, 1878, a resolution was passed by the directors of the company, allowing him $2,400 for various services rendered to the company, other than those required of him as its secretary, and this sum was paid to him out of the funds of the company.

On April 23, 1885, after having three times amended his complaint in this action, plaintiff, by leave of the court, filed a new "consolidated and supplemental complaint," on which the trial was had. He alleged therein, among other things, that since the commencement of this action he had discovered that the moneys pretended to have been loaned to him by the defendants were his own moneys, which had been embezzled by Allenberg, his confidential clerk, and advanced to him as money belonging to the Goldsteins, with their knowledge and connivance; that plaintiff was not in fact indebted to the defendants, or either of them, in any sum of money whatever; that plaintiff was the owner of all the shares of stock claimed by defendants to have been given to them in pledge, and that they had no interest in said stocks; that the judgments of November 1, 1881, and May 17, 1882, "are held by said defendants E. L. Goldstein and William Goldstein, respectively, in trust for their codefendant Allenberg; and the said Goldsteins have not, nor has either of them, any beneficial interest whatever therein, and that all their acts and doings in and about the receipt and procurement of said notes, and in the suing thereon, and obtaining said judgments, were and are solely for the benefit of said Allenberg;" that at the time of the execution of said notes, and the recovery of judgments thereon, plaintiff believed that the consideration of the notes had been advanced to him by the payees named, and that the suits thereon were prosecuted, and the judgments recovered, for their benefit alone, and plaintiff did not discover that they were privy to, and participating in, the frauds of the said Allenberg, or were conspiring or conniving with him in covering up and concealing his frauds upon plaintiff, until within the three years last past; "that the defendants, conspiring and confederating together to ruin plaintiff in his business, and to leave him utterly helpless and destitute financially, wrongfully took possession of his valuable properties, and particularly the shares of stock hereinbefore mentioned, * * * and have wrongfully voted this plaintiff's said Altoona stock to elect and re-elect and keep themselves in office as directors of said quicksilver company; that said defendants have, as such directors, wrongfully voted and paid to said defendant Allenberg large and exorbitant sums of money, the property of said company, and which should have been applied to the payment of dividends on the stock of said company, * * * and particularly that said defendants, as directors of said company, voted to said defendant Allenberg, on the 1st day of October, 1878, the sum of twenty-four hundred dollars, and paid the same to him, under the assumed and false pretense that it was for services rendered the company, other than those of secretary;" that the defendants have willfully managed the Altoona mine so as to depreciate its value, and cause its stock to have no market value, that they might be enabled to purchase the said shares of stock, at such threatened sale, at a merely nominal price; and that unless restrained they will sell and dispose of the same, and the same will be utterly lost to the plaintiff. And the prayer was that the defendants be enjoined from selling or otherwise disposing of the said stock, or any part thereof, and be required to deliver the same to the plaintiff, free and clear of all incumbrances; that the said judgments be adjudged satisfied and paid, or that the amount found due to plaintiff be set off against them; and that an accounting of all the said transactions between plaintiff and defendants be had; and for general relief. The defendants answered the complaint, denying, specifically, all the allegations of fraud and conspiracy; alleged the loan of the various sums of money by themselves to the plaintiff, the pledge of the stock to secure the payment of the said sums, and the nonpayment thereof; and set up, and pleaded as estoppels, the judgments recovered by them against the plaintiff. The answer asked for an affirmative relief. The case was thereafter tried, and the findings upon all the issues were in favor of the defendants. A decree was accordingly entered, adjudging that the plaintiff was indebted to each of the defendants, upon the judgments referred to in the complaint and answer, in certain specified sums of money, and that the defendants, respectively, had a lien, for the payment of such indebtedness, on the said described shares of stock which were pledged to them, and also dissolving the injunction issued at the commencement of the action, and directing that the said shares of stock be sold by the sheriff at public auction, in the manner and upon the notice provided by law for the sale of personal property under execution, and that the net proceeds of the sales be paid to the defendants, so far as necessary to pay the indebtedness due them. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

1. The appellant contends that the judgment was not authorized—First, because it granted to the defendants, severally, affirmative relief, when no such relief was prayed for by them; second, because the two former judgments, upon which the relief was granted, were barred by the statute of limitations; and, third, because the lien upon the pledged stock had become extinguished by lapse of time. There was no error in the action of the court complained of. The case was one in equity, and the court was authorized to grant any relief consistent with the case made, and embraced within the issues, although not specifically prayed for. Code Civil Proc. § 580; Gimmy v. Gimmy, 22 Cal. 633; Scott v. Lumber Co., 67 Cal. 75, 7 Pac. Rep. 131; Hurlbutt v. Saw Co., 93 Cal. 55, 28 Pac. Rep. 795; Pom. Rem. §§ 83, 580. The plaintiff set up the former judgments in his complaint, and brought the whole matter before the court, for its determination as to their validity. No question as to the judgments being barred by the statute of limitations was raised by the pleading, nor, so far as appears, at the trial. The court found: "At the trial of this action, evidence was introduced by the respective parties for the purpose of determining the amounts unpaid upon the several judgments hereinbefore mentioned, and the amounts of the indebtedness of the plaintiff thereon, and an investigation and accounting were had and taken of and concerning the transactions and dealings between the plaintiff and the said defendants, and of the moneys received by the defendants, and each of them, for or on account of the plaintiff; and from such evidence the plaintiff has been shown to be indebted to the defendants, respectively, in the respective amounts hereinbefore stated." This finding is not assailed, and the evidence referred to is not brought up in the transcript. It thus appears that evidence was introduced by both sides for the purpose of determining the matters referred to in the findings, and that no objection was made by either party to the evidence that was offered, or to the accounting that was had. This being so, the appellant cannot raise the objection for the first time in this court, that the indebtedness was barred by the statute. "Common honesty requires a debtor to pay his just debts, if he be able to do so, and the courts, when called upon, always enforce such payments, if they can. The fact that a debt is barred by the statute of limitations in no way releases the debtor from his moral obligation to pay it." Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 276, 17 Pac. Rep. 225. And, even though the debt is barred, the debtor cannot recover property pledged to secure its payment without first paying the debt. Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 298; Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 437, 26 Pac. Rep. 203; Jones, Pledges, § 582; 18 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 734. It follows that, as the indebtedness was not barred, the lien upon the pledged stocks had not become extinguished, and the court was authorized to order them to be sold as it did.

2. The appellant contends that he was entitled to a new trial, because, in the accounting between the parties, he should have been credited with his share of the $22,-

730.63 surplus assets of the Altoona Quicksilver Mining Company, and with his share of the $2,400, which, as alleged, was improperly paid to Allenberg. This contention is based upon the theory that the defendants, in the exercise of ordinary care as directors of the company, ought to have declared a dividend of the surplus assets, including the $2,400, and to have credited appellant's share thereof on his indebtedness; and in support of the contention the rule is invoked that "that which ought to have been done is to be regarded as done in favor of him to whom, and against him from whom performance is due." Civil Code, § 3529. As to the payment of the $2,400, the court found that the defendants, as directors, had not "voted to or paid the defendant Allenberg any sum of money to which he was not entitled, or which should have been applied to the payment of dividends on the stock of said company," and the only specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings is that it appears from the evidence that said E. L. Goldstein and Charles Allenberg, as directors of said company, voted the sum of $2,400, against the protest of Mr. Zellerbach, out of funds which should have been applied to the dividends of said corporation, and to the credit of said Zellerbach. It appears from the statement that it was shown at the trial "that Allenberg had rendered various services, other than those required of him as secretary, and had received the sum of $2,400 therefor," and that the payment of this sum was authorized by a resolution passed by the board of directors of the company. The only evidence brought up in the record to show that the allowance and payment were improper is that of Mr. Zellerbach, in which he stated "that in 1879 the trustees of the Altoona Quicksilver Mining Company voted Allenberg a compensation of $2,400 for services outside of his secretary's work, against which he (Zellerbach) protested as strongly as he could." It was proper, if Allenberg performed extra services, that he be paid a reasonable and just compensation therefor; and that he did perform such services, and received only a reasonable compensation for them, must be assumed, in view of the action of the board. Of course, he could not, as a member of the board, himself take part in passing the resolution to pay him the money, and it does not appear that he, or even E. L. Goldstein, did take any part in passing it. There were five directors, and, in the absence of anything to the contrary, it will be presumed that the resolution was authorized, and was properly passed.

As to the claim that the defendants ought to have declared a dividend, and should be required to account for the money, in this action, as if one had actually been declared, it is enough to say that no such claim was set up in the complaint, or, so far as appears, made at the trial. But, however this may be, the rule as to declaring dividends is "that the apportionments of the net earnings to the payment of cash dividends * * * is largely one of policy, intrusted to the discretion of the directors, which, when honestly and intelligently exercised, will not be lightly overruled." Mining Co. v. Pierce, 90 Cal. 131, 27 Pac. Rep. 44. Here the court found, in effect, that the defendants had honestly and intelligently managed the affairs of the Altoona Company, and had not misappropriated any of its moneys, and the evidence was amply sufficient to justify the findings. It appeared that when work in the mine was practically suspended, in 1880, there was still valuable rock in the mine, but that a considerable expenditure of money was necessary before it could be profitably worked. According to Mr. Lytle's testimony, an outlay of $15,000 was necessary. He said: "It should be worked with a furnace. A good furnace could be put up for $15,000, that would work ten tons a day, with a return of about 600 pounds of quicksilver per day." Mr. Allenberg testified "that it would require at least $50,000 to open up the mine at a lower level, and equip it for good work." And the plaintiff, while giving his testimony, was asked if he complained of them for not spending the money in the further development of the mine, and said: "I didn't want them to manage anything. I wanted them to give it up. I wanted to work the mine myself. I didn't want them to do anything but give up the property." Now, inasmuch as the plaintiff, in his complaint, denied that he had pledged his stock to the defendants, and was questioning their right to hold the stock in any capacity, and was attacking every act of theirs with reference to the mine, it would seem to have been simple prudence on their part to suspend any further operations, and to hold these assets in their hands until their rights should be determined, and the litigation ended, for if, as claimed by plaintiff, the stock had not been pledged to them, they would have had no right to pay themselves any dividends out of the assets. Under these circumstances it must be held that the defendants, as directors of the corporation, exercised their discretion honestly and intelligently, in not declaring any dividends, and that they cannot be called upon to account for the money in this action.

3. The appellant further contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over his objection, certain letters written by William Goldstein to Allenberg, and also in admitting proof of the contents of certain letters written by Allenberg to Goldstein. It appears that Allenberg was called by the plaintiff as a witness, and was asked if he had any letters from William Goldstein. He answered that he might have, and was then asked to produce them upon a succeeding day. Upon such succeeding day the witness, still being under examination by the plaintiff, was asked to produce any letters from William Goldstein, which he had, relating to the matters about which he had been testifying; and thereupon he produced a letter dated May 8, 1874, and was asked to read a portion thereof, which he did. The witness thereupon gave to counsel for plaintiff another letter, purporting to have been written by William Goldstein under date of July 31, 1874, and plaintiff's counsel then stated: "I do not wish that letter at present. You can put in any letters you want to, and exhibit them." Subsequently, upon cross-examination of the witness, defendants' counsel offered to read in evidence the letter of July 31st, and plaintiff's counsel objected that it was incompetent, for the reason that it was correspondence between two parties defendant. Defendants' counsel stated that they did not offer the letters as evidence to bind Mr. Zellerbach, but to disprove the allegations of fraud; and thereupon the letter was admitted, and an exception reserved. Defendants' counsel were afterwards permitted, over a like objection and exception, to read other letters written by the said Goldstein to Allenberg and dated, respectively, November 26, 1874, May 14, 1875, July 30, 1875, November, 1875, January 28, 1876, and February 2, 1877. The letter of May 8, 1874, which was produced and read at the request of the plaintiff, was an acknowledgment of the receipt of a letter from Allenberg, containing a quarterly statement of the amount of money standing to the credit of Goldstein on April 1st, and saying it was all right. The letters objected to contained acknowledgments of the receipts of subsequent similar statements, and some of them spoke of the writer's family and financial affairs, and of his investments and losses. It is urged that some of these letters were written after the notes were given for the money claimed to have been misappropriated, and were not a part of the res gestae, and therefore not admissible. But it appears that all but two of the letters were written before the notes were given, and the last two were written before the Altoona stock was pledged to secure the notes. It also appears that the transaction complained of commenced prior to 1874, when, as alleged, Allenberg began to abstract and embezzle the plaintiff's money, and it continued until 1879, when he and his co-conspirators advertised, and were about to sell, the plaintiff's stock. It was therefore, according to the plaintiff's theory, a continuing transaction of robbery and fraud from the beginning to the end. Under these circumstances, any communications from one alleged conspirator to the other, made while the conspiracy was in progress, and relating to its subject-matter, were part of the res gestae, and admissible. The court did not err, therefore, in admitting in evidence the letters objected to. Code Civil Proc. § 1850; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 108; Mining Co. v. Park, 14 Blatchf. 412; Beaver v. Taylor, 1 Wall. 642; Lund v. Tyngsborough, 9 Cush. 41; Allen v. Duncan, 11 Pick. 308.

Nor did the court err in admitting evidence of the contents of the letters written by Allenberg to Goldstein. It was shown by the witness that the letters had been mailed by him directed to William Goldstein, at Bremen, in Germany, and that the witness had not seen them since; that in due course of mail he had received replies thereto; and that he had no copies of the letters. Under the provisions of section 1963, subd. 24, Code Civil Proc., there is a presumption that a letter duly directed and mailed was received in the regular course of the mail; and a letter that is beyond the territory of the state is, within the meaning of the statute, "lost," so as to allow secondary proof of its contents. Gordon v. Searing, 8 Cal. 49; Binney v. Russell, 109 Mass. 55; Manning v. Maroney, 87 Ala. 567, 6 South. Rep. 343; Burton v. Driggs, 20 Wall. 134.

It is admitted by respondents that there is in the judgment a clerical error of $1,000, and that the judgment should be modified so as to correct the mistake. The cause is remanded, with instructions to modify the judgment by striking out "$21,541.86" and inserting in lieu thereof "$20,541.86." As so modified, the judgment will stand affirmed. Each party will pay his own costs on appeal. Order denying motion for new trial affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HAWES. (No. 20,942.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 12, 1893.)

HOMICIDE—EXPERT WITNESS—COMPETENCY—EVIDENCE — HARMLESS ERROR — DYING DECLARATIONS—WHAT CONSTITUTE — DEFENDANT'S DECLARATIONS — INSTRUCTIONS — EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE—BURDEN OF PROOF—RESULTS OF PREVIOUS TRIALS—SELF-DEFENSE.

1. In a murder case, a physician of 17 years' practice testified that he had had such experience as would enable him to say at what distance powder marks would be noticeable on the flesh from the firing of a S. & W. pistol of a certain caliber; that he had seen a great many gunshot wounds, and powder marks and powder burns in connection therewith, and knew, of his own knowledge, the distance between the discharged weapons and the bodies fired on. Held, that it was not error to permit such witness to testify, as an expert, as to the distance at which the pistol carried by defendant at the time of the homicide would produce powder marks.

2. In a murder case, it appeared that deceased was shot in the abdomen, when he wore an undershirt, white shirt, coat, and vest; and no one claimed there were powder marks on deceased's flesh, and all the evidence on the subject tended to show there were none on his vest or shirts. Held, that while evidence as to the distance at which the pistol carried by defendant at the time of the homicide would produce powder marks was immaterial, its admission was harmless.

3. In a murder case, a physician testified that he informed deceased that he could not recover, and that deceased used a variety of expressions, such as: "I can't stand this," "It will kill me," "I am going to die." To his brother he said: "I think I am going to die." To another physician he said: "I know enough of anatomy to know I have received my death blow." "I am badly hurt. I am shot in the bowels. I know it is all up." About half an hour thereafter his statement was taken, a few words at a time, while he was gasping for breath. Held, that such statement was properly admitted as deceased's dying declarations.

4. Where a witness testified that he saw deceased's vest when it was removed from the body, after it had lain in the grave over five months, and that it was then in the same condition as when he examined and brushed it just after deceased's death, held, that it was not error to admit the vest in evidence.

5. It is not error to admit evidence as to what defendant said as to the shooting immediately after it occurred, where the statement was entirely voluntary.

6. Where a murder case has been previously tried three times, and the parties stipulate to use the evidence of one of defendant's witnesses, as given at the last trial, it is not error to exclude a part of the evidence of such witness, as given at the first trial, when offered by defendant to impeach such witness.

7. It is not error for the court to read to the jury Pen. Code, § 1105, which provides that on a trial for murder, the homicide by defendant being proved, "the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves on him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that defendant was justifiable or excusable,"—where there are other instructions in connection therewith which fully and clearly insist on the right of defendant, in every step of the case, to have all reasonable doubts as to his guilt, or as to any fact essential to show guilt, resolved in his favor.

8. An instruction is not erroneous which calls the jury's attention to the importance of having the laws properly executed, and of a careful consideration of the evidence and the law, so that they may reach a result which will be "just to both sides, regardless of what may be the consequences."

9. Where a murder case has been three times previously tried, and on each trial the jury disagreed, it is not error to charge the jury that they must in no sense consider such fact, but render a verdict according to the evidence in the case, and consider no other matters except the evidence and the instructions of the court.

10. Where the court fairly presents to the jury the right of defendant, as a reasonable man, under the circumstances, to act on appearances, it is not error to refuse to give a correct instruction asked by defendant on the same subject.

11. An instruction which is not warranted by the evidence is properly refused.

12. It is not error to refuse an instruction which singles out, and gives prominence to, certain portions of the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Charles W. Hawes was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

The instructions asked by defendant, and refused, referred to in the opinion, are as follows: "The court instructs you that if, while the defendant had his hands in his overcoat pocket, the deceased made a violent assault upon him, he was justified in defending himself, and it is not necessary that the defendant should show that some danger to him, of loss of life, or danger of some great bodily harm, then about to be done him, actually existed, for actual, real, and imminent danger, to his comprehension, as a reasonable man, is sufficient; and if, in defending himself in his struggle with the deceased, the pistol was discharged there, inflicting a mortal wound, then the defendant is not responsible, and your verdict must be not guilty." "The court further instructs you that it is a rule of law in this state that evidence willfully suppressed would be adverse to the party suppressing it if produced; so, in this case, if you find from the evidence that the prosecution have willfully suppressed portions of the clothing worn by the deceased at the time the fatal shot was fired, or any other fact or circumstance that would tend to throw light upon the case now in consideration, you may presume that if these clothes had been produced, or other facts, if there be any such, shown, they would have shown facts favorable to the defendant, and adverse to the prosecution." "(15) The court further instructs you that in this case the nature and essence of the crime are made by law to depend upon the peculiar state and condition of the defendant's mind at the time, and with reference to the act done. To constitute the crime of murder, with which the defendant is charged, he must have fired the fatal shot with the intention of then and there killing E. W. Wagner, after deliberation, premeditation and aforethought, actuated thereto by his malice. Therefore, you should consider whether his mind was in a condition of self-possession favorable to the formation of a fixed purpose with deliberation and premeditation; and in so doing it is proper that you should take into consideration all the facts shown in evidence, which might throw any light on the defendant's mental condition at the time. Evidence has been introduced tending to show that for a long time prior to the homicide the defendant had been addicted to the excessive use of morphine, and that at that time he had been for a considerable time deprived of the drug. The defendant has also introduced evidence tending to show the effects that such deprivation worked on his mind. In arriving at your verdict, it is necessary to consider whether, under these conditions, (if you find that these conditions existed,) the defendant's mind was in a sufficient state of tranquility to enable him to commit the crime charged, or any lesser crime included in the information."

S. F. Gell, W. A. Kearney, and John J.

Wyatt, for appellant. Wm. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PATERSON, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder of the second degree, and was sentenced to serve a term of 50 years in the state prison.

The first point made by counsel for appellant is that the court below erred in allowing Dr. Wright, one of the witnesses on behalf of the prosecution, to testify as an expert with respect to the distance at which the pistol carried by the defendant at the time of the homicide would produce powder marks on the skin. It is claimed that he was not shown to be an expert. The doctor testified that he had been a physician and surgeon for about 17 years, and had had such experience as would enable him to say at what distance powder marks would be noticeable on the flesh from the firing of a pistol of 38-caliber Smith & Wesson; that he had seen a great many gunshot wounds, and powder marks and powder burns in connection therewith, and knew, of his own knowledge, the distance between the discharged weapons and the bodies fired upon. Upon this showing, we cannot say that the court erred in allowing the witness to speak. If the defendant desired to test the knowledge of the witness, and the correctness of his statement as to his ability to give an opinion, he ought to have cross-examined him before he was called upon to express such opinion. We entertain no doubt that the subject was a proper one for expert testimony, and cannot be classed with such matters as were discussed in People v. Smith, 93 Cal. 445, 29 Pac. Rep. 64. In People v. Lemperle, 94 Cal. 45, 29 Pac. Rep. 709, the witness was not shown to be an expert.

It is claimed that the evidence was immaterial, because the evidence shows, without conflict, that at the time the deceased received the wound he wore an undershirt, a white shirt, and a coat and vest, while the statement of the witness "plainly presupposes that the powder was not interrupted between the muzzle of the pistol and the abdomen of the deceased." In this we agree with counsel. It was certainly a waste of time to prove at what distance the pistol with which the wound was made would cause powder marks upon bare flesh, because the evidence, as stated above, shows that between the pistol and the flesh of the deceased, at the time the shot was fired, there were several thicknesses of cloth. But, as stated by counsel in his brief, "it is too plain a proposition to require argument that any powder escaping from the pistol would have lodged in the vest of the deceased, and that the skin over the abdomen would have been left unmarked," and we are unable to see how the jury could have been misled by the testimony. The jury knew that no one claimed there were powder marks upon the flesh of the deceased, and all the evidence there is upon the subject tends to show that there were none upon the vest or shirts.

Appellant contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence the dying declaration of the deceased. It is said that no sufficient predicate had been laid for its introduction. Dr. Wright testified that he had a conversation with Wagner, the deceased, and informed him that the wound was fatal; that in speaking of the character of the wound the deceased used a variety of expressions. At one time he said, "I can't stand this." He said to the doctor, "Can I get well?" The doctor said, "No, Mr. Wagner, you can't. You cannot recover." Very shortly after that he said: "I can't stand this. It will kill me. I am going to die,"—and a number of expressions of that import. He said to his brother, just before the statement was made, "Julius, I think I am going to die." About a half an hour before the dying declaration was made, he said to Dr. Smith: "Doctor, I know enough of anatomy to know I have received my death blow." The doctor said he hoped not. Wagner said, "Oh, I am badly hurt. I am shot in the bowels. I know it is all up." His statement was taken, three or four words at a time, while he was gasping for breath. We think this testimony shows that the declaration was made under a sense of impending death, and there is nothing to show a revival, or subsequent hope of recovery.

It is claimed that the court committed error in admitting in evidence the vest taken from Wagner's body after the same had lain in the grave for over five months; but Mr. Moore, the druggist, testified that he saw the vest at the graveyard when it was taken off the body, and it was then in the same condition as when he had examined it and brushed it just after the death of Wagner. The credibility of this witness, and the question whether the appearance of powder marks had been destroyed by lapse of time, and other circumstances, were matters for the jury to determine.

We do not think the court erred in allowing the witness Bradford to testify as to what the defendant said with reference to the shooting immediately after it occurred. The statement by the defendant, that Wagner "did it himself," appears to have been entirely voluntary, and is consistent with the defense set up at the trial.

The court did not err in refusing to allow the witnesses Merritt and Wyatt to state what Davis had told them in Coy's saloon. An attempt was made by the defendant to impeach his own witness, Davis, by evidence produced at the first trial, but, judging from the language of the court, the people and the defendant had stipulated to use only the testimony of Davis as taken at the last trial.

The court read to the jury section 1105 of the Penal Code,¹ and it is claimed that in doing so the court erred. People v. Bush-ton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. Rep. 127, 549, is the basis of this contention. We do not think the contention is sound, because coupled with this instruction were others which fully and clearly insisted upon the right of the defendant to have, in every step of the case, all reasonable doubts as to his guilt, or as to any fact essential to show guilt, resolved in his favor.

We do not find any error in the instruction of the court, admonishing the jury as to their duties. It simply called their attention to the importance to the public of having the laws properly executed, and the importance as well to the defendant of a careful and a dispassionate consideration of the evidence and the law, so that they might reach a result which would be "just to both sides, regardless of what may be the consequences." We see nothing in any portion of the charge which indicates hostility on the part of the court towards the defendant.

It was shown in the course of the trial that the case had been previously tried three times, the jury having disagreed in each instance. The court instructed the jury as follows: "Something has been said about the number of trials there has been in this case. You must in no sense consider that fact. You are sworn to try this case, and a true verdict render, according to the evidence you have heard in the case, and you will consider no other matters in your deliberations except the evidence and the instructions of the court. There is no limit to the number of times a case may be tried. When trials do not result in a verdict a case may be tried until a verdict is obtained." It is said that the jury had as much right to consider the fact that the case had been tried several times without a verdict as any other fact in evidence before them. We cannot assent to this proposition. It did not concern the jury, in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, what other juries had thought of the evidence before them. The jury engaged in trying a case have no more right to receive or consider the opinions of other juries than they have the opinions of any other person, and, besides this, the disagreement of former juries may not have been due to a difference of opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, but to a difference of opinion as to the degree of the crime which he has committed.

The court did not err in refusing to give instructions set forth in the brief. The right of the defendant, as a reasonable man, under the circumstances, to act upon appearances, was fairly presented to the jury. The instruction asked with respect to the suppression of evidence was entirely unwarranted by the testimony in the case. It was not claimed by any one that the bullet pierced the coat of the deceased. The fifteenth instruction refused was not warranted by the evidence, and was objectionable because it singled out, and gave prominence to, certain portions of the evidence. The charge, as a whole, is full and fair. Other points are made, which, in our opinion, do not require special consideration. Judgment and order affirmed.

LOWENBERG v. GREENEBAUM et al.
(No. 14,431.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1893.)
EXECUTION—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO LEVY—"SEAT" IN STOCK BOARD.

A "seat" in the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, which is a voluntary association, without capital stock or shares, and membership of which can only be secured, under its constitution and by-laws, by a vote of the members, is not subject to levy and sale under execution, and a purchaser at such sale acquires no title to such seat.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by William Lowenberg against Jacob Greenebaum, the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, and the Company of Associated Stockbrokers, to quiet the title of plaintiff to a seat in such board, and rights appurtenant thereto; for the appointment of a receiver; and for an injunction, etc. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

John R. Jarboe, W. S. Goodfellow, and Edward R. Taylor, for appellants. Wal. J. Tuska, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Judgment went in the court below for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. In January, 1888, Simon Kullman et al. recovered a money judgment for several thousand dollars against the defendant in the present action, Jacob Greenebaum, and on September 23, 1889, an ordinary writ of execution was issued on said judgment. The sheriff undertook, under said writ, to levy upon and sell, as personal property, the seat of said Greenebaum in an association known as the "San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board." He endeavored to accomplish this in the following manner: He delivered to the president and secretary of said association a copy of the said execution, "together with a notice that all moneys, credits, and effects of the defendant Jacob Greenebaum in the possession or under the control of the said San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, together with the seat, interests, and shares of the defendant Jacob Greenebaum in and to the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, were levied upon by virtue of said writ." He then advertised the said seat, interest, etc., for sale, for a period of six days; and on October 16, 1889, he sold the same to William Lowenberg, the plaintiff herein, he being the highest bidder. On the same day the sheriff gave to plaintiff a certificate of sale, which, after reciting the above facts, certifies that the sheriff had sold to plaintiff "all the right, title, and interest of Jacob Greenebaum, one of the defendants, in and to the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, and the seat, interest, and shares of the said Jacob Greenebaum in the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board." On said October 16th the plaintiff herein served notice, directed to said stock board, upon its president, which, after reciting said sale, demanded "to be admitted to the enjoyment and participation of all the rights, privileges, and interests heretofore enjoyed by the said Jacob Greenebaum in your board, and in the property thereof," and that an accounting be had, etc. The board paid no attention to the demand; and said Greenebaum has ever since continued to occupy his seat, with all its rights and privileges, in said board. Afterwards, on March 12, 1890, plaintiff brought this present action against said Greenebaum, making the said stock board, and also a corporation called the "Company of Associated Stockbrokers," parties defendant. The purpose of the action is to have plaintiff's title to said seat, and rights appurtenant thereto, quieted, a receiver appointed, an injunction issued, etc.

Plaintiff rests his title wholly upon said asserted levy and sale by said sheriff under said writ of execution, as aforesaid. But we do not think that by said sheriff's sale the said seat of said Greenebaum in said stock board, or any rights dependent thereon, were conveyed to plaintiff. The said San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board is a voluntary association, without capital stock or shares. The findings, and an agreed statement of facts, set forth very fully its constitution and by-laws, and show very clearly its character and purposes. There are stock boards in other American cities very similar to the one here in question, and they all seem to have been framed upon the same model. It is sufficient to state here a few of the features of the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, as follows: It is a voluntary association, consisting of not more than 100 persons. It does not itself do any stock business, but its purpose is to afford facilities for its members doing such business, each individually for himself. Each member has a "seat" in the board, and his seat represents, and is the sole basis of, his rights in said board, and entitles him to a place in the room provided by the association for the use of its members, to participate in its meetings, and to therein transact his individual business as a stockbroker. Occasionally the board, as an incident to its purpose of providing a place for the meeting of its members, has a surplus of money over its expenses, and sometimes divides said surplus among its members, and the owner of a seat is entitled to his proportion of such surplus when a dividend is declared. No person can become a member of said association, or be entitled to a seat therein, except he be elected by the members of the association according to its constitution and by-laws, under which "ten negative votes shall exclude." Its constitution declares that no member shall have any individual right or title to any of the property or assets of the association until after its dissolution, and the final winding up of its affairs by "its then remaining members." If a member in good standing desires to retire, he cannot dispose of his seat, except to a person whom the association shall elect to become a member; and at no time since the organization of the association has any member been authorized to sell his seat, "upon any terms whatever, except to such person as shall have been personally elected to membership in said association by the remaining members thereof." There are many other features of the association, not necessary to be here specially mentioned. The foregoing gives a clear notion of its general character. The plaintiff was never elected a member, and the association has always refused to recognize him in any way. The defendant Greenebaum remains in possession of the said seat, and is recognized as the lawful occupant thereof by the association. An attempted voluntary sale of the seat by Greenebaum to Lowenberg, the latter not having been elected a member of the board, and the association not having consented to the sale, would not have transferred the title to the seat, or to any of its incidents; and it is difficult to see how a simple sale under execution transferred something which the judgment debtor himself could not have transferred. Freem. Ex'ns, § 112, and cases there cited. Moreover, a creditor cannot have property of a debtor applied to the satisfaction of a debt except in the way provided by law; and there is no way provided by law by which such an intangible thing as a seat in the stock board above described—that is, a personal privilege of being and remaining a member of a voluntary association, with the assent of the associates—can be levied upon and sold under execution. Section 688 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that property may be levied upon under a writ of execution "in like manner as upon writs of attachment;" and section 542 provides what property may be taken on a writ of attachment, and in what manner various kinds of property may be so taken. But there is not in any subdivision of section 542 a method provided for attaching such a thing as this seat in a stock board. In Bank v. Robinson, 57 Cal. 523, this court expressly held that a patent right is not tangible property, which is the subject of seizure and sale on execution; and a seat in the stock board is certainly not more tangible than a patent right, for the latter can at least be sold and transferred by its owner at his own will, while the former cannot. The only case directly in point, cited by counsel on either side, is that of Pancoast v. Gowen, 93 Pa. St. 71. There a seat in a stock board similar to the one in question here had been levied upon under execution, and the court say: "A seat in a board of brokers is not property subject to execution in any form. It is a mere personal privilege, perhaps more accurately a license to buy and sell at the meetings of the board. It certainly could not be levied on and sold under a fi. fa. The sheriff's vendee would acquire no title which he could enforce." See, also, Freem. Ex'ns, § 110. Whether the respondent, by a creditor's bill in chancery, or by proceedings supplementary to execution under our Code, could reach appellant's right to a seat in the board, is a question not now before us. We merely hold that respondent did not acquire title to that seat, or to its incidents or appurtenances, by virtue of the execution sale hereinbefore mentioned; and under these views it would be useless to inquire into the relations between the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board and the other appellant, the Company of Associated Stockbrokers. As the respondent has no title to said seat, he has no interest in those relations. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

SULLIVAN et al. v. MOORHEAD. (No. 19,144.)

EQUITY—REFORMATION OF DEED—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action to reform a deed on the ground of the mutual mistake of the parties, or the mistake of the grantees and the fraud of the grantor, the evidence is conflicting as to the mistake, a finding that the deed was executed as a result of such mistake will not be disturbed merely because the plaintiffs examined the deed, which conveyed only a part, instead of the whole, of a certain lot, at the time it was executed, and defendant testified that it was his distinct understanding that he was to give only a part of such lot.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by James F. Sullivan and Lucinda A. Sullivan against J. M. Moorhead to reform a deed. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Hotchkiss and C. J. Heggerty, for appellant. Wilson & Lamme, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. October 10, 1889, the plaintiffs and defendant entered into an agreement for the exchange of lands, by which the defendant agreed to convey to the plaintiffs certain property in Los Angeles "known as lot ten, (10,) eleven, (11,) twelve, (12,) and thirteen, (13,) in the Pomeroy and Mills subdivision of the Hollenbeck tract, containing about two hundred (200) feet front, and one hundred and ten (110) feet in depth, together with the houses thereon, known as Nos. 706 to 712 New Main street, inclusive." In purported execution of this agreement the defendant, on the 17th day of December, 1889, made a conveyance to the plaintiffs of "lots No. ten, (10,) eleven, (11,) twelve, (12,) and part of thirteen, (13,) in block No. 2 of the Pomeroy and Mills subdivision of the Hollenbeck tract, containing about two hundred (200) feet front, and one hundred and ten (110) feet in depth, together with the houses thereon, known as Nos. 106 to 112 New North Main street, inclusive." The plaintiffs, having ascertained in February, 1890, that the deed of conveyance did not embrace all the land which the defendant had agreed to convey to them, commenced this action to compel the defendant to carry out the terms of his agreement, and for a revision of the instrument of conveyance so that the description therein would conform to the agreement of October 10, 1889. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and findings of fact were made in support of the averments in the plaintiffs' complaint, and judgment rendered in their favor. The defendant moved for a new trial upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision, and that the decision was against law, and for errors of law occurring at the trial. The new trial was denied, and from this order, and also from the judgment, he has appealed.

The main contention of the appellant is that, because at the time the deed was executed the plaintiffs examined the description therein, and were thus aware that it purported to convey only "a part of lot 13," there could have been no mistake on their part, and as the defendant testified at the trial that it was his distinct understanding that he was to give only a part of lot 13, there was no mutual mistake, and consequently no ground for a court of equity to reform the instrument of conveyance. For the purpose of determining, however, whether the instrument expressed the intention of both parties thereto, or whether the description inserted therein was by reason of a mutual mistake, or a fraud on the part of the appellant, the court was not bound to accept the statement of the defendant at the trial, or concluded by the fact that the plaintiffs had examined the instrument before it was delivered to them. If the court was satisfied from all the evidence, at the trial, that notwithstanding such examination the plaintiffs did not then understand the terms of the instrument, and were not aware that it failed to convey all the land which they were entitled to receive under their agreement, it was authorized to find that it was accepted by them under a mistake in this particular. The transaction between the parties took place at San Francisco, and the plaintiffs had not seen the land until after the execution of the deed. The defendant, in his negotiations with the plaintiffs, represented that the property he was to convey had a frontage of 200 feet, and each of the lots which he agreed to convey had in fact a frontage of 50 feet. The defendant had agreed to convey to the plaintiffs these four lots, and he himself testified at the trial that he said to the plaintiffs, at the time the deed was presented for examination, that the description therein was according to the agreement of October 10, 1889. The testimony of the plaintiff James that he always supposed that the deed gave him 200 feet is uncontradicted, and the fact that he read the deed is not conclusive against his having misunderstood its terms. If the evidence was sufficient to satisfy the court that the deed did not express the intention of the parties, and that the plaintiff had been mistaken in supposing that it did, the fact of his having read the instrument would not prevent the court from finding that it was made under a mistake. Higgins v. Parsons, 65 Cal. 280, 3 Pac. Rep. 881. Neither was the court bound to accept as conclusive the statement of the defendant as to his intention, since it was in direct contradiction to his written agreement, and inasmuch as he stated to the plaintiffs, at the time of the transaction, that the instrument was intended to be in execution of that agreement, the court was authorized to find that the mistake was mutual. As he had made an agreement to convey the four lots, it was incumbent upon him to show some subsequent agreement or circumstances by which he was relieved from this obligation; otherwise, the court was at liberty to regard his failure to include the whole of the lots in the conveyance as either a mistake upon his part, or a fraud upon the plaintiffs. Although the rule is that, in order to justify a court in decreeing the reformation of an instrument on the ground of a mistake, the proof of the mistake must be clear, convincing, and satisfactory to the court, yet a mere conflict of testimony as to the mistake does not necessitate a denial of the relief. Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, 73 Cal. 452, 15 Pac. Rep. 82; Wilson v. Moriarty, 88 Cal. 211, 26 Pac. Rep. 85. And the decision of the trial court upon such conflict of evidence is conclusive upon this court. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 334, 27 Pac. Rep. 186. The question of a mistake was the issue between the parties, and the court found, upon the conflict of evidence before it, that the instrument had been executed as the result of such mistake. We cannot say, from the evidence in the record, that the court was not justified in making such findings. The evidence offered by the defendant, and excluded by the court, was clearly immaterial to any issue in the case. The judgment and order are affirmed.

LIPPERT v. LASAR et al. (No. 14,923.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1893.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—TIME FOR FILING CLAIM—COMPLETION OF WORK.

A contractor agreed to excavate a cellar, and to erect walls of concrete, and steps to the street, and plaintiff did work thereon for said contractor. The work was accepted by the owner, as complete, July 26th; but in August a carpenter employed by the owner placed a frame in the cellar door, and plaintiff, at the owner's request, filled a small hole outside of the cellar. Held, that the lack of this additional work was a "trivial imperfection," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 1187, which provides that such imperfection shall not prevent the filing of the lien claim, and hence the filing of the claim August 29th was not within the statutory time of 30 days from the completion of the work.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by John Lippert against L. Lasar and others. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Alexander and E. I. Robinson, for appellant. John T. Humphreys and E. D. Peixotto, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce a lien upon a house owned by defendant Lasar, for labor done upon an addition to said house for the defendant Sonneckson, who, as original contractor, constructed said addition. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff, but the court granted a new trial, and this appeal is from the order granting a new trial.

Whether or not the plaintiff had filed his claim of lien within 30 days after the completion of the additional structure was the principal question at the trial, and is the only question presented on this appeal; it being admitted that the new trial was granted on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding that plaintiff's claim of lien was filed within the time required by section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, namely, within 30 days after the completion of the addition which the original contractor agreed to construct. The claim of lien was filed August 29, 1890, and I think a decided preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that the addition was completed on July 26, 1890. The addition to the house was a cellar under it. By the original contract, which was in writing, the defendant Sonneckson agreed to make the necessary excavation for the cellar, and to construct walls of concrete seven feet and six inches in height, and steps to the street, for $365. That all this work was done and accepted by the owner as completed on or before July 26, 1890, there is no controversy; but the evidence shows that the placing of a door frame in the cellar door by a carpenter employed by the owner, and about an hour's work by plaintiff, at request of the owner, in filling a small hole outside of the cellar, were done in August. The court, however, considered the lack of this additional work a trivial imperfection in the improvement, if imperfection it was, in the sense of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure,¹ and not such as would have prevented the filing of plaintiff's lien within 30 days after July 26, 1890; and the evidence contained in the record seems to justify this conclusion. I think the order granting a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

CLARKE v. WITTRAM et al. (No. 15,147.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1893.)

APPEAL—WHEN LIES—ORDER APPEALED FROM—CHARACTER NOT SHOWN BY RECORD.

On appeal from an order setting aside and quashing service of summons, the bill of exceptions showed the entry of a default on defendant's failure to appear, and the entry of the order appealed from two weeks later. There was no judgment roll, and the record did not show that judgment had ever been entered. Held, that it did not appear that the order appealed from was "a special order made after final judgment," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 963, allowing an appeal from such an order.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Alfred Clarke against Frederick Wittram and Hannah Wittram. From an order setting aside and quashing service of summons on said Hannah Wittram, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Alfred Clarke, in pro. per. Dunne & McPike, for respondents.

¹Code Civil Proc. § 1187, as amended in 1887, provides that any person, other than the original contractor, claiming a mechanic's lien, must file his claim within 30 days after the completion of the building or improvement, and that any trivial imperfection in the work shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of the lien claim.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal from an order setting aside, and quashing, service of summons. The record includes a bill of exceptions, which contains proof of the service of summons upon the defendant, and shows that default was entered upon the failure of defendant to appear and answer; also notice of motion to set aside and quash the service of summons, given two days after entry of the default, and an order granting the motion entered two weeks later. No judgment roll is contained in the record, and no pleading. The character of the suit does not appear, and we do not know whether the relief sought was of such a nature that upon default judgment might have been entered by the clerk without action on the part of the court, or not. The record does not show that judgment has ever been entered. Motion is made to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the order is not appealable. Appellant contends that the order is a special order made after judgment,¹ but, as we have seen, that nowhere appears. There is nothing in the nature of the order to indicate it. Ordinarily, such motions precede the entry of judgment; and, further, it is natural to suppose, if judgment had been entered, an order vacating it would have been included in the relief asked. Appellant, in his notice of appeal, describes the order as made after judgment, and insists upon this as showing that the order he has appealed from is such an order. But a party cannot make evidence for himself in that mode. If such fact existed, it should have been stated in the bill of exceptions. I think the motion should be granted.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

REVIEW ON APPEAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT —SETTING ASIDE DEFAULT.

An order setting aside a default, and permitting a defendant to plead after the time allowed by law has elapsed, will not be set aside, unless the court abused its discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Alfred Clarke against Hannah Wittram and others. From an order setting aside a default, and permitting said Hannah Wittram to plead, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

¹Code Civil Proc. § 963, allows an appeal from "any special order made after final judgment."

PER CURIAM. This appeal is from an order setting aside a default, and permitting one of the defendants to plead, after the time allowed by law had elapsed. We have examined the transcript, and find no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court.

EDWARDS v. HELTINGS et al. (No. 15,100.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1893.)

JUDGMENT—ACTION ON—PLEADING.

A complaint, in an action purporting to be on a judgment, by alleging that at a certain time a certain court, in an action therein pending between plaintiff and defendant, adjudged that defendant should pay to plaintiff a certain amount, does not plead a judgment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by T. C. Edwards against W. B. Hellings and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Henry I. Kowalsky and T. J. Crowley, for appellants. H. C. Firebaugh, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This purports to be an action upon a judgment. The complaint was demurred to upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also as ambiguous, uncertain, etc. The demurrer was overruled, and, defendants refusing to answer, judgment was entered for plaintiff. W. B. Hellings, one of the defendants, appeals.

The general demurrer should have been sustained, for the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action upon a judgment. The only averment in the complaint about a judgment is as follows: "That on the 21st of June, 1879, at this city and county, in the late fifteenth judicial district court in and for this city and county and state, in an action therein pending between this plaintiff and the above-named defendants, said court adjudged that the defendants should pay to plaintiff one thousand and eight hundred and seventy-three and 85-100 dollars," together with interest, etc. This court has been quite liberal in condoning defective and vulnerable pleadings, but the frontiers of liberality in this respect have not yet been pushed far enough to take in everything. In the case at bar, if we waive the point whether the words, "late fifteenth judicial district court," designate any court which we can recognize, still the complaint fails to plead any judgment constituting the present alleged cause of action. In this state there are several well-known methods of pleading a judgment; and, if the pleader desires simplicity, he need only follow section 456, Code Civil Proc., and aver that the judgment was "duly given." In the late case of Weller v. Dickinson, 93 Cal. 108, 28 Pac. Rep. 854, it was held that the words, "recovered a judgment," were sufficient; and, although the decision in that case was quite liberal, still it appeared there from the averment that there was a judgment. But we cannot imagine how the most accomplished pleader could manage to plead a judgment without using the word "judgment," and there is no apparent reason why he should try to do it. In the complaint in the case at bar there is no averment of any judgment; the only allegation touching that matter being that in an action, the nature of which is not stated, the court, at some stage of the action not specified, "adjudged" that the defendants therein "should pay" to the plaintiff a certain sum of money. Now, a judgment is "the final determination of the rights of the parties," and a complaint upon a judgment must show that the thing sued on was such a final determination. Such final determination is averred by the use of the word "judgment;" but the word "adjudged," while sometimes used together with "considered," "ordered," "determined," "decreed," etc., as one of the operative words of a final judgment, is also applicable to interlocutory orders and adjudications of a court. It is synonymous with "decided," "determined," etc. If, in a case tried without a jury, the judge should make his written findings, which would be his decision, it would be proper to say that he thereby "adjudged" so and so, but his findings would not be a judgment. In this case, therefore, there is no averment of a judgment, and consequently no averment of a cause of action. Judgment reversed.

Ex parte HONG SHIN. (No. 20,998.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 15, 1893.)

CITY ORDINANCES—VALIDITY—REGULATION OF OPIUM TRAFFIC—PRIOR STATE LEGISLATION—EFFECT.

1. Act April 16, 1880, makes it unlawful to retail opium without labeling the bottle or package with the name of the drug and the word "Poison," and without ascertaining that the person receiving the same is aware of its poisonous character, and that it is to be used for a legitimate purpose, and a record is required to be kept of these facts. Act March 11, 1891, provides substantially the same, and, in addition, that this shall not apply to physicians' prescriptions, nor to the sale of a single package containing no more than a dose. Held, that a city ordinance providing that no one should sell opium except upon the written prescription or order of a physician who is a regular graduate in medicine, and requiring the seller to label the bottle, and to keep a record of the name, age, and residence of the person receiving the drug, and of the physician prescribing it, was not void, as being in conflict with the acts of the legislature.

2. Where the same act violates a state law and a city ordinance, the person charged therewith may be tried for both offenses without any violation of the constitutional provision that no one shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense.

Department 1. Petition by Hong Shin for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

Lyman I. Morony, for petitioner. A. O. Collin and Davis Louderback, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The petitioner was convicted in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco of selling opium without a physician's prescription, under order No. 2085 of the board of supervisors, approved July 18, 1889. Section 1 of the ordinance provides that "it shall be unlawful for any apothecary * * * or any person whatever to sell * * * to any person in the city and county of San Francisco any opium, * * * except upon written prescription or written order of a practicing physician, as provided in this order, and except upon the day of the date of said prescription or order." Section 2 of the order provides that every person selling opium, etc., must keep a book, and record therein the sale, the name, age, sex, color of the person receiving the poison, the name and quantity thereof, as well as the name of the physician and the name and residence of the patient, and that there shall be attached to the bottle or parcel containing the article the name thereof, together with the name of the physician, the name of the druggist or other person who sells the article, and his place of business. Section 3 provides that the prescription or order must be dated and signed by a physician, who must be a graduate in medicine with a diploma from a regularly constituted medical institution, and must contain the name and residence of the patient and the residence or office of the physician. Section 9 makes it a misdemeanor to violate any provision of the order, punishable by fine, not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment, not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. An act to regulate the sale of certain poisonous substances, approved April 16, 1880, provided that it shall be unlawful for any person to retail certain poisons, including opium, without labeling the bottle or other package with the common name of the article, together with the word "Poison," and the name and place of business of the seller. The act makes it unlawful for any person to retail any of the poisons named unless upon due inquiry it is found that the person receiving the same is aware of its poisonous character, and that it is to be used for a legitimate purpose. The act also requires a record to be kept stating substantially the facts required by the order above named, and, in addition thereto, requires the seller to ascertain whether the name and address given by the person receiving the poison are the true name and address, and for that purpose to insist upon the person being identified. Any violation of this act is made a misdemeanor, and is punishable as such. St. 1880, p. 102. An act to regulate the practice of pharmacy and sale of poisons in the state of California, approved March 11, 1891, contains substantially the same provisions as those found in the act last above referred to, and, in addition thereto, provides that said provisions "shall not apply to the dispensing of poisons when prescribed by practitioners of medicine, nor to the sale of poisons if a single bottle or package does not contain more than an ordinary dose." The act provides that any person failing to comply with the requirements aforesaid shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $50. St. 1891, p. 89.

It will be seen from the provision above referred to that the state and municipality have both legislated upon the same subject. The state has endeavored to regulate the sale of certain poisons by requiring the seller to make certain inquiries and keep a record of certain facts, but it is not provided that opium cannot be sold except upon prescription of a physician furnished by the purchaser. In this respect the order of the board of supervisors goes beyond the requirements of the statute, and the question is whether or not the board have the right so to legislate upon the subject. There is no doubt that municipal by-laws may stand if not inconsistent with state laws, and that the by-law is not necessarily void simply because the legislature has regulated the same subject by law; but it must be in harmony with the general laws of the state and with the provisions of the municipal charter. "Whenever they come in conflict with either, the by-law must give way." Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) p. 239. Our constitution provides that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." Article 11, § 11. It is claimed by the petitioner that, inasmuch as the legislature has regulated the sale of certain poisons, including opium, by the acts above referred to, it is not within the power of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to make another regulation, or to prohibit the sale of opium; that an ordinance is in conflict with the general laws when it makes another and different regulation for the sale of an article of commerce than that provided by a statute of the state. The soundness of this contention we cannot admit. There may be different regulations without a conflict. The Revised Statutes of the state of New York provide that no keeper of an inn, tavern, or of any alehouse, or porterhouse, or grocery, nor any other persons authorized to retail strong or spirituous liquors, shall, on Sunday, sell or dispose of any ale, porter, strong or spirituous liquors, excepting to lodgers in such inns or taverns, or to persons actually traveling, in the cases allowed by law." The ordinance of the city of Brooklyn provided that no person should sell or dispose of any ale, porter, strong or spirituous liquors in said city on Sunday. It was claimed that the common council had exceeded the power conferred upon it in passing this ordinance, because the charter of the city authorized the city council to make only such ordinances, rules, police regulations, and by-laws as are not contrary to the laws of that state. The supreme court said: "The Revised Statutes simply prohibited the sale of spirituous liquors on Sundays to any but lodgers and lawful travelers. It might possibly have been competent for the common council under their general power to make the police regulations to extend the prohibition so as to make it total on that day. At any rate, there would not have been a direct conflict. But the Revised Statutes, in this particular, are not simply prohibitory; they are also expressly permissive. They authorize the vendition on Sunday to certain lodgers and travelers. It needs no reasoning to show that two provisions, the one permitting and the other prohibiting the same act, are in direct conflict with each other." Wood v. City of Brooklyn, 14 Barb. 426. So, in the action at bar, the legislature has simply prohibited the sale of opium and certain other poisons unless a certain record is kept. It has not directly authorized the sale of opium without the prescription of a physician; it has not legislated upon that subject at all, except in providing that, where a physician's prescription is presented, no other record need be kept. The city has gone further than the statute, and provided that no opium shall be sold without a prescription. While the regulation is different from that of the state, there is no conflict, and therefore it is not in violation of the provision of the constitution quoted above. There are the very best of reasons why cities should be authorized to impose penalties in addition to those inflicted by the laws of the state. "Particular acts may be far more injurious, while the temptation to commit them may be much greater, in a crowded city than in the state generally. They consequently require more severe measures for prevention. State laws are, of course, for the general good, and cannot always answer the peculiar wants of particular localities." Wood v. City of Brooklyn, supra. See, also, City of Burlington v. Kellar, 18 Iowa, 66; In re Sic, 73 Cal. 151, 14 Pac. Rep. 405; Ex parte Cheney, 90 Cal. 620, 27 Pac. Rep. 436. The offenses being different, there is no violation of the constitutional inhibition against putting one twice in jeopardy for the same offense. McInerney v. City of Denver, (Colo. Sup.) 29 Pac. Rep. 518.

It is claimed by the petitioner that the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, by order No. 1615, has provided for the legitimate sale of smoking opium, as said order provides for licenses for the sale of such opium graduated according to the amount of sales; that order No. 2085 was not intended to cover smoking opium; that the two orders can be read together, so as to give force to both without doing violence to the language of either, and the latter should not, therefore, be held to have repealed the former by implication; and, again, that if order 2085 does repeal order 1615, then it, in effect, prohibits the sale of smoking opium, because before a sale can be lawfully made there must be presented the written prescription of a physician that "smoking opium is not a medicine, and no respectable physician will give a prescription for it." The language of order No. 2085 covers all kinds of opium, and "any extract of opium or production thereof, * * * or any preparation or compound of which any of those substances, extracts, or products is an element or ingredient." There is no question, therefore, that all orders in conflict therewith are repealed. Conceding that the board of supervisors does not possess the power to prohibit the sale of smoking opium, the last point made by the petitioner is not sound. The court cannot say, as a matter of law or fact, that no respectable physician would give a prescription for smoking opium. The petitioner is remanded to the custody of the chief of police.

COX v. DELMAS. (No. 14,409.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1893.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—CONTRACTS—RESCISSION —DEMAND—PLEADING.

1. Where one sues for money received by defendant as attorney for plaintiff, and defendant, in his answer, denies having so received it, and claims that he received it in his own right, and that plaintiff had no interest in it, it is not necessary that the complaint should allege a demand, as a demand would have been useless.

2. The complaint in an action by a client against his attorney for money received in payment of the judgment obtained by plaintiff in an action conducted by defendant for him alleged the purchase of an interest in the claim on which the judgment was founded, from R., by defendant, for plaintiff; that thereafter defendant handed plaintiff a paper which recited that defendant was the owner of such interest, and entitled to collect it; and that, without any prior agreement, like that contained in the paper, plaintiff signed it, on the advice of defendant. Held, that the complaint did not state a contract between plaintiff and defendant, or, at least, not one requiring a rescission.

3. The paper referred to in the complaint recited that whereas defendant had, by sale and assignment, become invested with, and then held, the rights and interest of R. in the claim, it was covenanted and agreed by the parties that defendant was the owner thereof. It further recited that plaintiff "sells and assigns" such interest to defendant. Held, that these latter words did not change the character of the instrument, which was not a contract requiring rescission, but merely an admission of a condition caused by prior acts.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. Shafter, Judge.

Action by Jerome B. Cox against D. M. Delmas. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Garber, Boalt & Bishop, (Wm. F. Herrin and H. L. Gear, of counsel.) for appellant. Galpin & Zeigler, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover a certain sum of money alleged to have been collected by defendant, as attorney at law of plaintiff. The case was tried with a jury, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff for a little less than the amount sued for; and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The main features of the case are these: Prior to May, 1888, respondent had been engaged continuously, for several years in litigating, as plaintiff, in the courts of this state, the suit of Cox v. McLaughlin, which suit had been brought to recover a large amount alleged to be due from McLaughlin to Cox for work done and materials furnished for the construction of a certain railroad. In 1883 appellant herein was employed by respondent as one of his attorneys at law in conducting said suit, and was to receive, as compensation for his services as such attorney, 10 per cent. of the amount of the judgment that should be recovered against McLaughlin. He continued to be respondent's attorney in said suit until it was concluded and settled, in 1888. Prior to said employment of appellant by respondent, the latter had recovered a judgment in the trial court against McLaughlin, which was afterwards reversed in the appellate court; and some creditors of respondent, to the extent of three or four thousand dollars, had levied an execution upon said judgment and upon said cause of action, and the same had been sold to Michael Reese, since deceased, for about the amount of the claims of said creditors. Afterwards, respondent had assigned to said Reese $25,000 of his said claim against McLaughlin, for the purpose, as averred by respondent, of securing Reese for the money advanced for his said purchase of said judgment and right of action. One Cobb had also been formerly in the employ of respondent as attorney in said suit, and was to receive 10 per cent. of the judgment, and Cobb had assigned his claim to said Reese as security for a certain promissory note. These claims, founded upon said two assignments, were in February, 1884, assets in the hands of the executors of said Reese, then deceased. Early in February, 1884, respondent began negotiating with Joseph Rosenberg, one of the executors of the Reese estate, for the purchase of said $25,000 claims. That estate was then nearly settled, and the executors were desirous of closing it up, and Rosenberg agreed to sell said claims to respondent at private sale for $1,500, or thereabouts. Thereupon, respondent informed appellant of the existence of said claims, and that he (respondent) had an opportunity to purchase them for about $1,500. As to what then occurred touching the purchase of said claims, respondent and appellant disagree in their pleadings and testimony. Respondent says that he asked appellant's advice in the premises; that appellant offered to purchase said claims for respondent; that respondent assented thereto; that he brought about a meeting between appellant and Rosenberg in order to have the details of the purchase arranged; that thereupon appellant advanced the money, and purchased the claims for respondent; and that, at appellant's instance and request, the purchase was made in the name of his clerk, Franklin T. Bull. On the other hand, appellant denies that he advanced money to buy said Reese claims for respondent, and maintains that he bought said claims on his own account and as his own business speculation, and that respondent has no interest whatever therein. It appears that when Rosenberg reported the sale to the probate court the attorney of the heirs of McLaughlin, then deceased, made a higher bid for said claims, and appellant was compelled to raise his bid, so that he finally paid for said claims about $2,425; and that amount was paid by him on February 11, 1884, and an assignment of the claims was made by the executors to said Bull. On the 12th of February, respondent signed a certain written instrument, a copy of which, marked "Exhibit A," is attached to the answer, which appellant handed to him, already prepared, with a request that he sign it. Respondent avers and testifies that appellant informed him that it was necessary for him to sign this instrument in order to make the sale of said claims legal; that he feared that if the sale was not legal the claims might be resold and fall into the hands of the McLaughlin estate, which would greatly embarrass him; and that, relying on the advice and good faith of appellant, he executed it without communicating with other counsel, and without receiving any consideration therefor. Appellant, however, contends that respondent well knew the contents of said instrument, and executed it for the purpose which its language imports. (With respect to said instrument, it is sufficient to say, at this time, that in terms it acknowledges that appellant owns said Reese claims, and is entitled to recover the amount of the same out of any judgment that might be recovered by respondent in the said case of Cox v. McLaughlin.) In the case of Cox v. McLaughlin, judgment was rendered for plaintiff October 21, 1886, for $98,228.80, with legal interest from June, 1886; but on appeal this court, on May 1, 1888, affirmed the judgment, with the modification that interest should be allowed only from the date of the judgment in the lower court,—October 21, 1886, 18 Pac. Rep. 100. This made a great reduction of the amount of the judgment, and respondent was desirous of filing a petition for a rehearing, but, upon the advice of appellant, the intention of applying for a rehearing was abandoned. On May 21, 1888, the judgment, which then amounted, in round numbers, to $110,000, was paid in the office of appellant. Of this amount, respondent received, in round numbers, $63,000, and appellant retained $47,000. This amount retained by appellant included his own fee of 10 per cent. of the judgment, and also the $25,000 and the Cobb fee of 10 per cent., which had been assigned to Reese as aforesaid. By the judgment of the superior court, appellant was allowed his fee of 10 per cent., and the amount which he had expended for the purchase of the Reese claims, with interest thereon until date of settlement, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff for the balance of said $47,000.

The case seems to have been fairly tried upon its merits, and the jury, by its special verdict, found all the material issues of fact against appellant, and in favor of respondent. They found, with respect to the Reese claims, that respondent commenced negotiations with Rosenberg for their purchase; that appellant agreed to advance for respondent the necessary money to effect the purchase, and to buy them for respondent; and that the purchase was made in the name of Bull, at appellant's suggestion. They also found that appellant had not established the fact that the transaction was fair, and that no advantage had been taken of respondent. They also found that, at the time of the payment of the judgment in the case of Cox v. McLaughlin, the money in contest in the case at bar was paid to appellant, as attorney for respondent. Appellant contends for a reversal of the judgment upon grounds, most of which, whether tenable or not, may be fairly called technical. The force of the very able briefs of his counsel is directed mainly to the point that the judgment should be reversed because the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that its defects are such as could not be cured by the verdict, or by anything that appeared at the trial. The main points made against the general sufficiency of the complaint are that it contains no averment of a demand made upon appellant for the money in contest before the commencement of the action, and that it shows a contract between the parties, by which appellant was to have said money, and does not show a rescission of that contract.

There is a great deal of learning, and a great conflict of authorities, on the subject of the necessity of a demand before suit. It is clear that when a demand is an integral part of the cause of action, as when the duty to pay, or to deliver property, or to do some act, does not arise until after demand, then, as a general rule, a demand must be averred, but that when the time had come for doing the act, and it was the duty of the defendant to do it unconditionally, then no demand, other than the suit itself, is necessary. Of course, the difficulty lies in applying the rule to particular cases; but the reason of the rule requiring a demand is that it would be unjust and inequitable to subject a defendant to litigation without first notifying him of plaintiff's claim, so that he might have an opportunity of compliance with it without the annoyance and expense of a suit. There are authorities which hold that it is the duty of an attorney at law to pay money collected for a client as soon as he receives it, and that want of previous demand is no defense to an action brought by the client for such money, and there are others which hold that it is a defense only as to the matter of costs. But it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further, because it is well settled that previous demand is not required, when, as in the case at bar, it fully appears that it would have been unavailing, when it would not have changed the rights and relations of the parties, and would have been a mere useless and idle ceremony. This rule was well expressed in the opinion of this court in Parrott v. Byers, 40 Cal. 622, where the court say: "It is a familiar rule that, when the relations between the parties are such that a demand and a refusal is a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action, a denial in the answer of the relation on which the action is founded will dispense with the necessity of an averment in the complaint of a previous demand and refusal;" and "the law does not require a useless act to be performed, and when it is plain, from the answer, that, if a demand had been made, it would have been refused, it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to object that no demand was made." In the case at bar the appellant, in his answer, denied that he received the money herein sued for as attorney for respondent, and alleged that he received it in his own right, and as his own property, and that respondent had no interest therein. Moreover, it was proved at the trial, without objection, that respondent had demanded said money of appellant before the suit was commenced, and that appellant had promptly and absolutely denied that respondent had any right whatever therein. Under these circumstances, the position that the judgment should be reversed for the failure of the complaint to contain an averment of a previous demand cannot be maintained.

It is strenuously contended by appellant that the complaint is fatally defective because it shows a contract between the parties, by which appellant was to have the money sued for, and contains no averment of a rescission of such contract, and that, if respondent had any rights in the premises, his remedy was a bill in equity to rescind the contract. We do not think that this position is tenable. The complaint does not give, in haec verba, the document Exhibit A, a copy of which is in the answer. The complaint, after averring the sale of said Reese claims, and their purchase by appellant for respondent, as aforesaid, merely states that "after said sale, and within a few days," appellant handed to respondent "a paper," and requested him to sign it, saying that it was necessary, in order to make said sale legal, and that, having no fear that appellant "would not deal fairly with him in regard to the purchase of said claims," and relying on his advice and good faith, he "executed said paper at once, without communicating with other counsel, and without receiving any consideration therefor." And, as to the character of said "paper," it is merely stated that it contained a stipulation that appellant was the owner of said Reese claims, and entitled to collect, receive, and receipt for the same. It is further averred that, prior to the production of said paper, there had been no agreement between appellant and respondent, "the same as or similar to what was therein stated." Therefore, what the paper states on this subject is merely that respondent, without consideration, made a certain written declaration, acknowledgment, or admission that a certain condition of things existed. But such averments do not state any contract at all, and certainly not a contract of such dignity as to require rescission.

The foregoing are the main assaults made upon the complaint. The others do not require special notice. We think it clear that the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. But if we go beyond the complaint, and consider Exhibit A independently of any mere question of pleading, we do not think that it comes within the class of contracts which must be formally rescinded in order to avoid their force or effect. The rule which makes technical rescission necessary applies to a contract by which the party seeking to ignore it has received something of value, or obtained some advantage; and in such a case he is not allowed to retain the thing received, or the advantage obtained, and at the same time ignore the rights of the other party. He must give notice of rescission, and return, or offer to return, what he has received under the contract, and thus restore each party to his original status. But, in the case at bar, Exhibit A is not such a contract. In fact, it cannot properly be called a contract at all. It is not "an agreement to do or not to do a certain thing," and was founded upon no consideration. It was signed, according to the complaint, several days after the conclusion of the purchase of the Reese claims, and the jury found that it was signed the next day after such purchase. The exact time is immaterial, because the instrument itself shows that it was signed after said purchase. It recites that, "whereas, said party of the second part [appellant] has, by regular sale, assignment, and transfer, become invested with, and now holds, all the rights and interest which said Michael Reese held, as hereinbefore stated." The instrument then declares that it is covenanted and agreed by the parties that appellant is the owner of said claims. It is nothing more than a written admission of the existence of a condition caused by prior acts. It has all the formalities of a contract, but has no contract in it. If respondent had simply written upon a paper, "I acknowledge that appellant bought the Reese claims for himself," such paper would have had as much legal value as Exhibit A. Of course, in either form, the paper would be admissible in evidence for what it was worth, as an admission of a party, but there was no more necessity to rescind it than there would be to rescind a receipt. There was nothing for respondent to rescind. It is true that, in one part of Exhibit A, respondent is made to say that he "sells, assigns, and makes over" a certain part of the Reese claims; but those words do not change the character of the instrument, for he had nothing to assign. The paper itself set out that Reese was the legal owner of said claims; and appellant says that he fully examined into their validity before the purchase, and satisfied himself that they were good, and that the title to them was in the Reese estate. Therefore, after he had obtained an assignment of the claims from their owners, the Reese executors, the words "sells, assigns, and makes over," in Exhibit A, had no significance.

As to the legal merits of the case, we see no reason to disturb the judgment. The relation between attorney and client is a fiduciary relation of the very highest character, and binds the attorney to most conscientious fidelity,—uberrima fides. If, on his own account, he has any transaction with his client about the subject of the litigation, he must, with respect to such transaction, be able to give, and must give, to his client, "all that reasonable advice against himself that he would have given him against a third person." Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 278. This is a very hard thing to do, and there are authorities which hold that all such transactions are against public policy, and absolutely void. See Weeks, Attys. at Law, § 268 et seq., and cases there cited. We do not think that the current of authorities goes quite that far, but the utmost view that can be taken of the subject, favorable to appellant's contention, is this: that the attorney must show affirmatively that he gave full and proper advice in the premises, acted with entire fairness throughout the transaction, and took no advantage of his client. The latest expression of this rule is to be found in Felton v. Le Breton, 92 Cal. 469, 28 Pac. Rep. 490, where this court, through Mr. Justice Harrison, speaking of this subject, says: "In any attempt by the attorney to enforce an agreement on the part of the client, growing out of such transaction, the burden of proof is always upon the attorney to show that the dealing was fair and just, and that the client was fully advised." See, also, cases cited in opinion in Felton v. Le Breton. In the case at bar the appellant, no doubt, considers that the transaction here involved was entirely proper, and one which he had a perfect right to enter into, but the findings of the jury were against him, and we cannot say that the verdict had no support in substantial evidence. The case of McDowell v. Milroy, 69 Ill. 498, was a stronger case in favor of the attorney than the case at bar, for in that case it was admitted that the attorney had bought for himself; but the court says (we quote from the syllabus, which is a correct statement of the decision) that "when the relation of client and attorney actually exists, and the attorney, at the instance of his client, purchases a note which is secured by mortgage on the land of the client, at a considerable discount, the latter will be entitled to the benefit of the purchase, although the attorney may have bought for himself."

We do not think that the court erred in fixing the amount of the judgment according to the special verdict. "When a special finding of facts is inconsistent with the general verdict, the former controls the latter, and the court must give judgment accordingly." Code Civil Proc. § 625. Neither do we think that the special findings are contradictory, or that appellant was prejudiced by any absence of findings. There are no other points necessary to be noticed. This case has been ably and exhaustively argued by counsel on both sides, and it would be impossible, in an opinion of reasonable length, to discuss all the positions taken, or to notice the leading authorities cited. After a full consideration of the whole case, we see no sufficient reason for disturbing the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

FITZGERALD, J., and DE HAVEN, J., did not participate in the foregoing decision.

WIEBOLD et ux. v. RAUER et al. (No. 14, 926.)

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Henry Wiebold and Mary D. Wiebold, his wife, against J. J. Rauer, John F. Burris, and others, to cancel a certain mortgage executed by Burris to Rauer, consolidated with an action by J. J. Rauer against Henry Wiebold, Mary D. Wiebold, and John F. Burris, to foreclose such mortgage. From a decree canceling and annulling the mortgage, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, Rauer appeals. Affirmed.

G. H. Perry, (Naphthaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, of counsel,) for appellant. W. C. Kennedy, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a consolidated action to cancel a certain agreement, and have declared satisfied a certain mortgage. The court rendered judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant J. J. Rauer appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

There are numerous assignments of error in the record, but the main point presented in the briefs of appellant is that the evidence does not justify the findings; the only other point being that the findings do not support the judgment. We think, however, that the evidence is clearly sufficient to justify the findings that defendant Burris committed the fraud charged, and that appellant was a party to said fraud; and it would serve no useful purpose to review the evidence here. It is also clear that the findings are full enough, and amply support the judgment. Judgment and order affirmed.

(No. 15,006.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1893.)

HIGHWAYS—OBSTRUCTION—JUDGMENT—WHEN SUPPORTED BY FINDINGS.

In an action to abate an alleged obstruction of a street the court found that defendant was the owner and had been in possession of the land claimed as a street for more than 20 years; that prior to such ownership and possession it had been used continuously for more than 20 years as a street, but was not so used after that time. Held that, in the absence of a further finding that the owner ever intended to dedicate such land for a public street, or acquiesced in or had knowledge of such use, a judgment for defendant was supported by the findings; Pol. Code, § 2619, which provided that "all roads used as such for a period of more than five years are highways," having been enacted after such user ceased, and repealed before the action was brought.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by the city of Monterey against Maria Malarin and others to abate a nuisance caused by the obstruction of a highway, and to enjoin defendants from maintaining the same. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appealed on the judgment roll. Affirmed.

W. A. Kearney, for appellant. S. F. Geil and W. M. R. Parker, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, J. This is an action by the city of Monterey, a municipal corporation, to abate an alleged public nuisance caused by the obstruction of an alleged public highway of that city, and to enjoin the defendants from further maintaining the same. The complaint, in substance, alleges that plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession and control of the land therein described, and that the same is a public street within its corporate limits; that defendants have erected and maintained upon said street certain buildings and fences which obstruct the street and are a nuisance. These allegations are specifically denied by the answer. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll alone.

The court, in its decision, found: "(2) That plaintiff was not at the time of the commencement of this action, nor at any time before or since, the owner, or entitled to the possession or control, of the strip of land described in plaintiff's complaint, or any part thereof. (3) That the defendant Maria Malarin is the owner in fee simple of the tract of land described in the complaint, and that the other defendants herein occupy and possess said tract as the tenants of said defendant Maria Malarin. (4) That the defendant Maria Malarin and her grantors have been in the actual, open, notorious, exclusive, continuous, and adverse possession of all of the land described in the complaint herein as owners, and have exercised acts of ownership over the same, since 1870, and have during all that time builded, kept, and maintained valuable buildings and improvements on the same. (5) That such buildings and improvements have, during all the time since the year 1870, been by said defendant Maria Malarin erected and maintained in such a manner as to entirely obstruct and prevent any use of the land described in the complaint, or any part thereof, as a public street or highway. (6) That that portion of the land set out in the complaint described as follows, to wit, [description omitted,] was open and uninclosed, and was a convenient way of travel for the public from Alvarado to Tyler street, and it was traveled and used continuously and uninterruptedly by the public as and for a public highway or street in said city of Monterey for more than twenty years immediately prior to the year 1870, and the same was known as 'Spence' or 'Pence' street, but since the year 1870 no part of the said land has been traveled over or used in any respect by the public as a street or otherwise; that neither the board of supervisors of Monterey county nor the city authorities of Monterey city have ever accepted the said land as a street or road or highway. (7) That no part of the land described in the plaintiff's complaint is a public street known or called 'Spence Street,' or any other street, or any part of a public street, within the corporate limits of the city of Monterey or elsewhere; and that the buildings, houses, sheds, and fences erected and maintained upon said premises are not an obstruction or an encroachment on any public street, and do not constitute a nuisance in any public street or highway. (8) That prior to the year 1835 the pueblo of Monterey was the owner in the fee of the lands and premises described in the complaint herein; that in said year said pueblo, by its legally constituted authorities, conveyed its title to Jose Maria Herrera as a pueblo lot; that since said conveyance the defendant Maria Malarin has by mesne conveyances from said Jose Maria Herrera acquired and now holds the whole of the title so conveyed from said pueblo for said tract of land."

It is claimed by appellant that the findings do not support the judgment. This claim is urged upon the ground that the use of the strip of land described in the complaint by the public as found by the court in its sixth finding was such as to constitute it a public street, within the meaning of section 2619 of the Political Code; that said section is in the nature of a statute of limitations, therefore a finding by the court of knowledge by the owner of such user was not material or necessary. The section referred to provided that "all roads used as such for a period of more than five years are highways." This section was enacted subsequent to 1870, and was repealed by the act approved February 28, 1883. Nor was there any such general or local law upon the subject applicable to or concerning public highways in Monterey county prior to 1870. The intention of the owner was therefore absolutely essential in order to constitute a dedication to the public use of the strip of land in question, and the acceptance and user thereof by the public for this purpose are indispensable to the validity of the dedication, but such acceptance may be shown by mere user, without any formal action in relation thereto by the municipal authorities. As there is no finding by the court that the owner ever intended or offered to dedicate to the public the strip of land referred to for a public street, or ever acquiesced in or assented to the use thereof for such purpose, or ever had any knowledge of such use by the public, or that the municipal authorities ever performed any act or recognized or asserted any right whatever thereto, it follows that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

In re BLINN.

ADAMS v. BRADLEY. (No. 15,126.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 11, 1893.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—REMOVAL.

Hitt. Gen. Laws, §§ 5794, 5795, provide that when one of several executors or administrators shall die, become lunatic, or otherwise incapable of executing the trust, or his letters shall have been revoked according to law, the other shall proceed and complete the trust, and if all be so disabled the probate court shall issue new letters. Section 5979 empowers the probate judge, on learning of certain grounds for removal,—inter alia, incompetency to act,—to suspend the executor or administrator, and cite him to show cause why his letters should not be revoked. Held that, where a sole administratrix has been adjudged insane by the county court, she has become "incapable," and not merely "incompetent to act," and the record of said court being sufficient evidence of her insanity, in the absence of proof that she has since recovered, the probate court may grant new letters without citation to her to show cause.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Proceedings by W. J. Adams, guardian, to sell the interest of Helen B. Blinn, an insane person. H. W. Bradley, Jr., made a bid for the property, on certain conditions as to title. The guardian accepted the bid, and reported it for confirmation. From the judgment confirming the sale, Bradley appeals. Affirmed.

Jarboe & Jarboe and R. H. Countryman, for appellant. Selden S. & Geo. T. Wright, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The court below granted an order for the sale of the interest of Helen B. Blinn, an insane person, in certain real estate. Appellant, Bradley, made a bid in writing therefor of the sum of $24,750, "subject to confirmation by said court: provided that the title to said lot is perfect and merchantable, and is free from all liens and incumbrances of every kind and character. * * * If the title is not perfect as of record, or said property is incumbered, and the incumbrances are not removed after five days' notice thereof, then said deposit is to be immediately returned. The undersigned to have five days after the receipt of complete abstract of title of the said lot in which to examine the same." Respondent accepted the bid, with the said conditions attached, reported the sale to the court, and asked for confirmation. Appellant filed objections to the confirmation, which objections were submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of facts, whereupon the court made an order confirming the sale to appellant, and directing a conveyance, from which order this appeal is taken. The facts appear in the bill of exceptions, and, somewhat condensed, are as follows:

In 1872, Samuel P. Blinn died intestate, leaving said Helen P. Blinn, his widow, and three minor children. The widow was duly appointed administratrix, was qualified, and letters of administration were regularly issued to her. Shortly thereafter, and before she had made any progress in the settlement of the estate, she was adjudged insane by the county court of the city and county of San Francisco, and sent to the state asylum for the insane. Thereupon, William H. Patterson was appointed her guardian, but the records in that proceeding do not show that he ever qualified as such. George B. Bradford was duly appointed and qualified as the guardian of the children. Shortly after Mrs. Blinn had been adjudged insane, Patterson, as her guardian, and Bradford, as the guardian of the children, petitioned the probate court for the appointment of Bradford as administrator of the estate of Samuel P. Blinn, alleging the usual jurisdictional facts, and that Mrs.

Blinn had been adjudged insane by the county court, and was then confined in the state insane asylum; that Patterson had been duly appointed and qualified as her guardian; and praying that a day be fixed for the hearing, and that the clerk give notice thereof by posting. Upon this petition, Bradford was appointed, thereafter qualified, gave notice to creditors, and administered the estate. The order for his appointment recited that it was upon the petition of Bradford, as guardian of the children, but did not refer to Patterson as the guardian of Mrs. Blinn; that the applicant, Bradford, appeared in person and by his attorney, W. H. Patterson; found that the clerk had posted notices as required by law; that Mrs. Blinn was insane, and had been so adjudged, and revoked her appointment. The record is silent as to whether any citation or notice of these proceedings were served upon Mrs. Blinn, and, aside from the averment in the petition that Patterson had been appointed and qualified as her guardian, is also silent as to the fact that she had a guardian. The insanity of Mrs. Blinn was at that time of short duration. After she was restored to sanity, she applied to the court for an allowance for her support, recognized Bradford as the administrator, consented to the allowance of his commissions, and participated in the final settlement and distribution of the estate. Her present incompetency occurred subsequently. Upon these facts, appellant contends that the probate court had no jurisdiction to revoke the letters granted to Mrs. Blinn; that she had never been suspended or removed from her office as administratrix; that the appointment of Bradford is void; that the estate of Samuel P. Blinn has never been administered; and that, hence, the title to the property is not such as he is bound to accept, under the conditions of his bid. It is conceded by respondent that the record does not affirmatively show either that Mr. Patterson ever qualified as the guardian of Mrs. Blinn, or that any citation was issued or served upon her to show cause why her letters of administration should not be revoked; but respondent contends that even if the proceedings for the appointment of Mr. Bradford as administrator were defective, by the acquiescence of Mrs. Blinn in the appointment after she was restored to sanity, and her participation in the final settlement and distribution of the estate, she is now estopped from questioning the validity thereof; the proceeding for the sale of the real estate here in question being a proceeding by her through her guardian, and for her benefit.

We think that the court had jurisdiction, and that the appointment of Mr. Bradford was regular. The proceedings resulting in the appointment of Mr. Bradford were had before the Code of Civil Procedure was enacted. Sections 5794 and 5795 of Hittell's General Laws (corresponding to sections 1425 and 1426 of the Code of Civil Procedure) are as follows: "5794. In case any one of several executors or administrators, to whom letters shall have been granted, shall die, become lunatic, be convicted of an infamous offense, or otherwise become incapable of executing the trust, or in case the letters testamentary, or of administration, shall be revoked, or annulled, according to law, with respect to any one executor or administrator, the remaining executor or administrator shall proceed and complete the execution of the will or administration. 5795. If all such executors or administrators shall die, or become incapable, or the authority of all of them shall be revoked, according to law, the probate court shall issue letters of administration with the will annexed, or otherwise, to the widow or next of kin, or others, in the same manner as is directed in relation to original letters of administration. The administrator so appointed shall give bond in the like penalty, with like sureties and conditions as hereinafter required of administrators, and shall have the like power and authority." These sections, it will be seen, do not prescribe the grounds upon which the authority of an administrator may be revoked, nor the mode in which the revocation may be accomplished. The twelfth chapter of the act, sections 5979 to 5984, (2 Hitt. Gen. Laws,) does that. Section 5979 is as follows: "Whenever the probate judge has reason to believe from his own knowledge, or from credible information, that any executor or administrator has wasted, embezzled, or mismanaged, or is about to waste or embezzle the property of the estate committed to his charge, or has committed, or is about to commit, a fraud upon the estate, or has been incompetent to act, or has permanently removed from the state, or who has wrongfully neglected the estate, or has long neglected to perform any act as such executor, or administrator, it shall be his duty, by an order entered upon the minutes of the court, to suspend the powers of such executor, or administrator, until the matter can be investigated." The sections following provide for the appointment of a special administrator during such suspension, if deemed necessary, and require the suspended administrator to be cited to appear and show cause why his letters should not be revoked. When considered together, these provisions do not seem difficult of construction. The power or jurisdiction of the court to appoint a new administrator may be exercised upon the happening of the death, insanity, or conviction of an infamous offense of the former administrator, or upon the revocation of his power and authority by the court. The insanity of Mrs. Blinn at the time of Bradford's appointment is not questioned, but only the proceedings resulting in his appointment. In case of the death, insanity, or conviction of the former administrator, such death, insanity, or conviction must be judicially ascertained by the probate court before a new appointment can be made, but such fact may properly be ascertained by the court in a proceeding under a petition for the appointment of a new administrator. In case of the death of the former administrator the fact is properly presented to the court in a petition for the appointment of a new administrator, and upon the hearing the fact may be established by witnesses. In case of the conviction of the former administrator of an infamous offense, the fact may be presented in the same manner, and proved upon the hearing by the production of the record of his conviction. No citation to the convict is necessary, as it is the fact of the conviction, when shown to the court by proper allegation and evidence, which authorizes the court to make the new appointment. The convict is not a necessary party to the proceeding. He has had his day in court, and is conclusively bound by the record. No one would contend for a moment that it is necessary in the probate proceeding for the appointment of a new administrator to again charge him with the offense, and try him upon that charge before a jury, and have a verdict of guilty in the probate court. So, in the case of insanity, not only the insane person, but all who deal with him, are bound by the record of the court of competent jurisdiction adjudging him insane, unless they can show that after the adjudication, and before the transaction in question, he had been restored to sanity. No such restoration is claimed in this case. Hence the proper mode of presenting the fact of Mrs. Blinn's insanity was pursued. It was properly alleged in a petition for the appointment of Mr. Bradford as administrator, and the record of the county court adjudging her insane was competent and sufficient proof of the fact, and that was the only fact to be ascertained to authorize the court to proceed to the appointment of a new administrator. Upon the question of her sanity, Mrs. Blinn had had her day in court. She was bound by that adjudication. If she had not been adjudged insane prior to the proceeding for Mr. Bradford's appointment, it would have been necessary to have brought her regularly before the court as a party to the proceeding, since she must have been presumed to be sane, and entitled to a hearing upon that question.

Appellant contends, however, that the statute required that she should be cited; that the word "incapable," used in sections 5794 and 5795, and the word "incompetent," used in section 5799, are synonymous; that under the latter section the person "incompetent to act" must be cited to show cause before his authority can be revoked. The legislature has classified death, insanity, and conviction of an infamous offense under the designation "Incapable," and other matters affecting the integrity or qualification for the discharge of the duties of an administrator as "incompetency." The embezzler, the thief, the man who hesitates at no fraudulent scheme to despoil an estate, or who is so careless and indifferent as to habitually and grossly neglect his duties, may have capacity to properly discharge all the duties of an administrator, but the man who is dead or insane or civiliter mortuus is "incapable." Whether the word "incompetent" was wisely chosen or not, the context leaves no room to doubt the sense in which it was used, and that it was used to designate a different class from those characterized as "incapable." Nor is this view inconsistent with Schroeder v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 344, 11 Pac. Rep. 651, cited by appellant. There it was held that the provision of the Code of Civil Procedure, that, by the marriage of an administratrix, "her authority is extinguished," is the equivalent of, "she ceases to be competent." In such case the mental and physical capacity of the administratrix is not affected by the marriage, but the statute extinguishes her authority. It is true the court there held that she "may be proceeded against for suspension and removal under section 1436, Code Civil Proc., and the sections immediately following;" but the closing sentence of the opinion shows that the proceeding "for suspension and removal" is referred to as a convenient and orderly one for ascertaining the fact of the marriage where doubt existed. If we clearly distinguish between the direct legal effect of the death, insanity, marriage, or conviction of crime upon the authority of the administrator, and the finding of these facts as necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court to appoint a successor, all difficulty is removed. Appellant also cites Estate of Moore, 68 Cal. 281, 9 Pac. Rep. 164. In that case, Thomas W. Moore, the administrator, was adjudged insane by a competent court, and sent to an asylum. About a year later he was discharged from the asylum, and under a direct proceeding under section 1766, Code Civil Proc., he was found and adjudged to be of sound mind. Afterwards, the widow of intestate filed her petition in the probate court, alleging, among other things, that Thomas W. Moore had been adjudged insane, and since that time no order had been made, appointing any one as administrator, and asking that she be appointed. It was held that an entire or absolute vacancy was not created when respondent, Thomas W. Moore, was sent to the asylum; that he became incapable of executing the trust for the time being, and if, during that time, she had applied for letters, they would doubtless have been granted, but having been restored to sanity, and recognized by the court and others as such administrator, the application came too late. It is not necessary to determine, in the case at bar, whether insanity creates an absolute vacancy, or, if it does, whether it occurs prior to the judicial ascertainment of the fact by the probate court, for it is not questioned here that Mrs. Blinn was insane at the time Mr. Bradford was appointed, while the Case of Moore expresses the opinion that, if Mrs. Moore's application had been made while the insanity of the former administrator continued, letters would have been granted to her. There is therefore no conflict between that case and the opinions we have expressed in this. The probate court, having found that Mrs. Blinn was insane, and had been so adjudged by the county court, had jurisdiction to appoint Mr. Bradford, and no citation to Mrs. Blinn was necessary. She was entitled, as heir, to notice of the hearing, but that was given by posting the usual notice. The conclusion we have reached makes it unnecessary to consider the effect of her subsequent acquiescence in the appointment and proceedings of Mr. Bradford as administrator, and also renders immaterial the question whether Mr. Patterson in fact qualified as her guardian. The judgment or order confirming said sale to appellant, from which this appeal is taken, should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment or order confirming said sale to appellant is hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BEEVERS. (No. 20,975.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1893.)

BIGAMY—VALIDITY OF MARRIAGE.

1. Under Civil Code, § 82, declaring that the marriage of one below the age of consent can only be annulled by that party, and that, if he or she freely cohabit with the other after attaining the age of consent, the marriage is valid, one who has married a girl below the age of consent cannot, after remarrying, plead that fact to the charge of bigamy.

2. A marriage by consent, followed by "a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations," as described in Civil Code, § 55, is as sufficient a basis for a prosecution for bigamy as one by consent, "followed by a solemnization."

3. In a prosecution for bigamy, on a defense that the first marriage was illegal, the judgment roll of a suit for divorce by the first wife against the accused, granted by the court, and pending on appeal in the supreme court, is incompetent evidence, and, if admitted, prejudicial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

Prosecution of John A. Beevers for bigamy. Verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon. New trial denied. Defendant appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Frank H. Short, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, William H. Layson, First Dep. Atty. Gen., W. D. Tupper, and H. H. Welsh, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Appellant, Beevers, was convicted of bigamy, and now prosecutes an appeal to this court from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. It is insisted that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. Beevers, being of the age of 20 years, and Lou Jacobs, being of the age of 14 years, desirous of marrying, eloped from Hollister, San Benito county, and went to the town of Monterey for the purpose of being married upon the high seas, this course being adopted with a view to escape the difficulties to marriage presented by the girl's tender years. Upon their arrival at Monterey, the sea was boisterous, no boat could be procured, and the plan was abandoned. It was thereupon orally agreed between them that they should live together as husband and wife, and that, upon their return to the home of their parents, both should state the fact to be that they were married upon the sea. Thereafter they returned to Hollister, and to all their friends declared the fact in accordance with their previous agreement, and further stated that the certificate of marriage had been lost. These statements were repeated upon all occasions for many months, and it was only a short time prior to the inception of this prosecution that the true facts were disclosed to the public. Immediately upon their return to Hollister they lived together as husband and wife, represented themselves as such at all times, were known to the neighborhood as married people, and conducted themselves as married people usually do. Their affairs were conducted upon these lines for nearly four years, during which time a child was born to them, but, differences having arisen, a separation ensued, and subsequently Beevers married one Clara Bates, and his prosecution and conviction upon a charge of bigamy were the result.

It is claimed that the foregoing evidence is insufficient to prove such a marriage between these parties as to form the basis for a charge of bigamy, and, as one of the grounds for such claim, it is insisted that the girl was but 14 years of age at the time the agreement of marriage was entered into, and, consequently, was incapable of giving consent thereto, the statute fixing the capacity of females for consent at the age of 15 years. Appellant's contention cannot be sustained. Section 82 of the Civil Code declares that the marriage can only be annulled by the party who did not possess the capacity to consent, and expressly recognizes the validity of the marriage if, after attaining the age of consent, such party freely cohabits with the other as husband or wife. In Shaffer v. State, 20 Ohio, 1, it is held that marriage by a person under the age of consent, if followed by cohabitation after arriving at the proper age, is sufficient to support a prosecution for bigamy. In other states it is held that such marriage, unless subsequently disaffirmed by positive action, is sufficient to support the charge. Walls v. State, 32 Ark. 565; Beggs v. State, 55 Ala. 108; Cooley v. State, Id. 162. In the present case these parties lived together as husband and wife almost three years after the girl arrived at the age of consent, and a full ratification of their prior acts and agreement was the result. We have been cited to no law, and know of none, that would entitle a guilty husband to escape a charge of bigamy upon such a pretext.

It is insisted that a marriage sufficient upon which to base a charge of bigamy must be a regular, solemnized, and authenticated marriage, as provided by the statute, but with this contention we cannot agree. Section 281 of the Penal Code declares that "every person, having a husband or wife living, who marries any other person, * * * is guilty of bigamy." In this case the second marriage is conceded, and defendant's guilt is dependent upon the fact as to whether or not Lou Jacobs was his wife at the time he contracted the second marriage. Section 55 of the Civil Code declares: "Marriage is a personal relation, arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." It will thus be seen that consent to marry, followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations, constitutes marriage. The meaning of the phrase "mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations" was exhaustively discussed in the case of Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. Rep. 26, 131. It was again under consideration in Kilburn v. Kilburn, 89 Cal. 46, 26 Pac. Rep. 636; and its legal signification is there clearly and succinctly declared. In the present case there was no solemnization, but there was consent, followed by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations; and, under our statute, those elements conjoined result in a marriage as binding in morals and in law as though it was solemnized by priest or judge. In the one case we have consent, followed by solemnization; in the other, consent, followed by the mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations. The crime of bigamy is committed when a person marries who has another husband or wife living at the time. The mere form of the first marriage is entirely immaterial. The vital inquiry is, is such a person a husband or wife? The solution of that question being in the affirmative, one element of the crime is proven, and the inquiry passes to the second marriage. The policy of the law recognizing and authorizing this form of marriage is not for the court to support or condemn. It is known to all that it is becoming a common practice with the people, entirely too common; but, if bigamy, adultery, and kindred crimes cannot be founded upon such marriages, inducements are offered to the lawless which cannot fail to be seized upon, and which will undoubtedly end in most pernicious results. There is no authority, to our knowledge, opposed to the foregoing views upon this question. The differences among the courts have arisen alone as to the amount and character of evidence necessary to prove the marriage. It is conceded everywhere that an actual marriage must be proven to support the charge of bigamy, a great number of the cases holding that cohabitation and repute, standing alone, are not sufficient to prove the marriage. This was the common law, and was based upon the principle that the presumption of innocence of crime overcame the presumption of marriage following cohabitation and repute. Many cases hold that the admissions of marriage by a defendant, coupled with cohabitation and repute, are sufficient to sustain a finding of actual marriage. State v. Hughes, 35 Kan. 626, 12 Pac. Rep. 28; State v. Britton, 4 McCord, 256; Oneale v. Com., 17 Grat. 583; Williams v. State, 44 Ala. 24; Scoggins v. State, 32 Ark. 205; State v. Gonce, 79 Mo. 600. Section 1106 of the Penal Code, which prescribes the character of evidence that may be introduced upon the charge of bigamy to prove marriage, is directly in line with the principles declared in the foregoing cases, although it is not necessary to invoke the provisions of that section in the present case, for here the facts disclose an actual marriage in accordance with section 55 of our statute. The sufficiency of the evidence in this case to support a conviction for bigamy as to the first marriage is fully indorsed in Hayes v. People, 25 N. Y. 390, and State v. Bittick, 103 Mo. 183, 15 S. W. Rep. 325. In Case v. Case, 17 Cal. 598, following the law, it was held that repute and cohabitation were not sufficient to prove marriage, the defendant in that case being charged with adultery. No statute authorizing marriage in the manner prescribed by section 55 of the Code was upon the books when the question was decided by the court in that case. Neither do the exigencies of this case require us to enter into a discussion as to the true result to be deduced by reason of the presumption of innocence coming in conflict with the presumption of marriage, arising from general repute and cohabitation, viewed in the light of section 55 of the statute; but it may be stated that, if the principle of estoppel is ever recognized in criminal law, the application of it to a defendant under such circumstances, in the interests of the wronged spouse, the unfortunate offspring, and good morals, would prove a most wholesome rule.

The court committed error in admitting in evidence the judgment roll in the civil action of Lou Beevers vs. John A. Beevers. The action was brought against defendant for divorce, and a default was taken. At the time the judgment roll was offered in evidence the case was upon appeal to this court, and it follows necessarily that the findings of fact and other recitals therein contained were inadmissible as evidence upon any question involved in this prosecution. Woodbury v. Bowman, 13 Cal. 635; Murray v. Green, 64 Cal. 369, 23 Pac. Rep. 118. The adjudication of the superior court that these parties were husband and wife, and a decree being entered dissolving the bonds of matrimony, were matters which probably had great weight with the jury. The question as to the marriage was the contested issue, and this evidence pointed directly to that element of the case. Coming from a source so grave, it must have prejudiced defendant's rights. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. FAGAN. (No. 20,938.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CONDUCT OF TRIAL—VIEW BY JURY.

On a prosecution for the larceny of cattle, it is error for the court, jury, counsel, and officers of the court to go to a neighboring corral to examine the brands on certain cattle, when such examination is not conducted as a part of the regular trial,—neither the cattle nor the brands being offered in evidence, nor defendant given an opportunity to object,—since Pen. Code, § 1119, authorizing the court to order the jury to be conducted to the place in which the offense was committed, or other material fact occurred, does not apply to such case.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Frost Fagan was convicted of the larceny of cattle, and appeals. Reversed.

James H. Budd, L. J. Maddux, and Robt. Farrell, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and L. W. Fulkerth, Dist. Atty., (T. A. Coldwell, of counsel,) for the People.

TEMPLE, C. The defendant was indicted jointly with his father, whose appeal was recently disposed of here, (People v. Fagan, 33 Pac. Rep. 60,) and William Ducker. They had separate trials, and the cases, as presented in the record, differ widely. By this record it appears that one F. Weyer had about 200 head of cattle on the Booth ranch, in the county of Stanislaus, 22 miles west of Modesto. On the 2d day of October, 1891, 21 head were missing. Nothing was known as to the mode or cause of the disappearance, but on the 8th or 9th of the same month seven animals were found by William Grummett on the Howard ranch. Grummett had charge of Howard's stock, and had some belonging to himself. At the suggestion of Howard, he put the strays in with his own. On the 13th four more animals appeared, and were taken by Grummett. Howard, on the 16th of the month, having heard of Weyer's loss, notified Purvis, sheriff of the county, of the presence of the cattle. On the next day, Purvis and McGinnis, a deputy constable who was looking for the cattle, and had offered a reward for their recovery and the apprehension of the thief, supposing them to have been stolen, went to Howard's ranch, and examined them. The animals had been freshly marked, and the brands altered. The marks were a crop off one ear, and an underslope of the other. Weyer's brand consisted of a mark resembling a capital L, when turned one way, and, inverted, resembled the figure 7. The cattle were thus branded. It had been changed by connecting the horizontal line with the perpendicular mark at each end, making it a square. Thus altered, both marks and brand bore a close resemblance to the marks and brand used by the defendant. The sheriff told Grummett to keep the cattle until some one called for them, and then immediately notify him. These cattle were subsequently identified as a portion of the 21 head which had been lost by Weyer. Defendant lived with his parents at Modesto. His father had recently taken up some land in the coast range, about nine miles from Howard's, intending, as he said, to homestead it. His father had a small cabin there, and had gone there about the 1st of October. Defendant's witnesses testified to facts which, if true, proved that defendant was at home on the night of the 2d of October, and also on the 3d and 4th of that month. Defendant had cattle of his own, and, according to his testimony, on the 14th of October drove some 15 head into the coast range near his father's cabin, and remained there at his father's place until his arrest, on the 20th. On the 18th, Grummett visited the Fagan cabin, and told defendant about the 11 head which were at Howard's, describing their marks and brands, when, according to Grummett's testimony, defendant said they were some cattle he had recently purchased and re-marked, and said he would take them away. Defendant, on the stand, denied having said that he had recently bought or marked any cattle, and said he knew nothing of the cattle lost by Weyer. He had neither taken nor marked any of them. He said, however, he had lost some of his cattle, and was looking for them. He testified that 10 head of his were never found. The 11 head were taken from Howard's place on the 19th of October, about noon, while Grummett was at dinner. During the afternoon, Grummett missed them, and found that a gate which had been locked had been lifted from its hinges; that there were cattle tracks through the gate, and also those of a horse. He telegraphed to Purvis, who came over that evening, bringing McGinnis with him. They, with Grummett, followed the tracks to a canyon leading into the coast range, called "Ingram Canyon." Three ravines, not far apart, lead into the mountains. Washington canyon is the more northerly, then Curran canyon, and then Ingram. High ridges divide them from each other. They terminate near together at a mountain called "Oso," near which Grummett and his brother had a place. About 4 o'clock in the morning of the 20th they reached the Fagan cabin, where they found the 11 head in a corral within a few feet of the cabin. In the cabin they found the defendant and his father, in bed, while William and Ed. Ducker were lying by the cabin on the outside. When asked by the sheriff if the cattle were his, defendant replied that they were not; that they were strays, and he did not know how they got into the corral. Charles Fagan said that he and Will Ducker put them into the corral, and that Frost knew nothing of it. At the trial, Ducker testified that defendant was cooking supper when the cattle appeared there, not driven by any one, and muddled their spring, whereupon Charles Fagan and he put them into the corral. The defendant also said that he had about 30 head of cattle in the range, and some of the posse made search, and found 2 head near Mt. Oso, which were marked and branded in the same mode as the 11 head. Afterwards, November 21st, 3 more were found near Mt. Oso, 3½ miles from the Grummett cabin. They were marked and branded similarly to the 11 head. They were taken to Modesto, and placed in Mr. Young's corral, and on the trial were identified as Weyer's cattle, and as having been missed on the 2d of October; but they were not part of the 11 head, with the larceny of which, it was assumed at the trial, defendant was charged.

The court required the prosecution to say whether they prosecuted the defendant for a larceny committed by the taking from the Howard place on the 19th, or from the Booth ranch on the 2d. The district attorney said he claimed that the taking was from the Booth ranch on the 2d. If, therefore, it can be said that the defendant was found in possession of the cattle at all, it was not until 18 days after the taking; and it was only from the circumstances recited that it could be inferred that even then defendant had any possession or control of them, by himself, or jointly with his codefendants. And the evidence was conflicting as to the existence of every one of these circumstances, except the fact that the cattle were found in his father's corral while he and three others were at the cabin. It is impossible to make out from the statement in what respect the defense claimed that the marks and brands upon the cattle alleged to have been stolen differed from the defendant's marks and brands. But a great deal of evidence was put in upon the subject upon both sides, much of which consisted in illustrations upon the blackboard, or the examination of sensible objects, the force of which we cannot appreciate. To enable the jury to compare these marks and brands, there was exhibited to them, against the objections of the defense, a hide alleged to have been taken from an animal claimed by the defendant. It was not the hide of an animal alleged to have been stolen, but was exhibited merely to prove what the defendant's marks and brands were. I think the evidence insufficient to show that the hide was from a steer belonging to the defendant, or that it had not been tampered with, but I pass to what I deem a still plainer error.

After examining the earmarks upon the hide, the court, with the jury, clerk, sheriff, and counsel went to Young's corral to examine the three head which had been found, November 21st, near the Grummett place, in the coast range, of course, for the purpose, in part, of comparing the marks with those upon the hide. These three animals the defendant was not charged in the information with stealing, nor was it shown, by direct evidence, at least, that he had ever seen them, or that he knew anything about them. This action of the court was against the objection of the defendant. This course is not authorized by section 1119 of the Penal Code. The cattle and the marks were not offered in evidence, so as to afford the defense an opportunity to object, nor had they the opportunity to call the attention of the jury to variances between the marks and those of the defendant. Upon this point, see People v. Fitzpatrick, 80 Cal. 539, 22 Pac. Rep. 215.

When the defendant was on the stand, the following occurred: "Question. What is there about this hide? Answer. This hide? Q. Yes, sir. A. Well, I don't know whether it is the same bullock or not. Sam Miller sold a bullock that belonged to me. Mr. Fulkerth: We shall object to that, that it is immaterial what there is about that hide. They can dispute the conversation, if they want to. The Court: That is your hide. Mr. Ferral: What is there to this hide that has been offered in evidence? So he may have the right to explain any connection he has with it. The Court: I think that it is too general a question. I will sustain the objection. (The defense reserved an exception.)" I take it that the remark of the judge, "That is your hide," was merely intended to tell the witness that it was the hide offered in evidence. The question, with the explanation, which must be taken as a part of it, was not too general. It could hardly be made more specific without being objectionable. The objection made and sustained was that it was immaterial, as the defendant could only deny the conversation in which the defendant was reported to have said that the marks on the animal killed were his. The defense, having taken an exception, pressed the matter no further. What explanation could have been given, we do not know; but many possible ones may be imagined, which would have destroyed the entire value of the evidence, if believed by the jury. That the evidence was most material is evident. The identity of the marks and brands recently made on the cattle with the marks and brand of defendant was the most important fact testified to for the people, and the exhibition of the hide and the marks and brands on the cattle in Young's corral was the most forceful evidence of the fact. For this reason the judgment and order must be reversed.

The exceptions to the instructions are mainly the same as those made in the recent case of People v. Fagan. In that case the court deemed it unnecessary to consider and determine these questions. It is not more necessary to do so in this case.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

SHIVELY v. SEMI-TROPIC LAND & WATER CO. (No. 19,141.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1893.)

SALE OF LAND—RESCISSION—RECOVERY OF PAYMENTS—PLEADING—ASSIGNMENT OF CLAIM.

1. When a contract for the sale of land is rescinded by the parties, the vendee has a right to recover back payments made, though the contract provided that on default in payment the vendee shall forfeit all rights and payments already made.

2. A complaint in an action against the vendor to recover payments made alleged that defendant sold the land to other parties, who took possession and made lasting improvements thereon, and that by reason of such sales the defendant had rescinded his contract of sale to plaintiff's assignor. Held, that these facts did not show a rescission or abandonment of the contract, as defendant had not necessarily thereby placed it out of his power to comply with the terms of the contract.

3. The failure of the complaint to show a rescission of the contract by defendant was cured by the admission of the answer that defendant had rescinded it.

4. An assignment to plaintiff by the vendee of all interest in moneys paid by him under the contract was not a violation of the provision of the contract prohibiting its assignment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Henry L. Shively against the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company, a corporation, for money had and received.

Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Willis, Cole & Craig and H. A. Barclay, for appellant. Henry Bleecker and Geo. I. Cochran, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. On the 10th day of October, 1887, Lewis Shively purchased a tract of land from the defendant under a written contract for the sum of $4,004. $1,334.66 was paid in cash; the balance was to be paid in three installments, the last payment being due on the 10th of October, 1889, and the deferred payments, if not paid when due, were to bear interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum until paid. The first payment was the only one made by Shively, and nothing further was done by either party to the contract until the defendant, on the 8th day of April, 1890, and after all the payments had been due, wrote a letter to Shively, notifying him to pay up, or return the contract, or the defendant would foreclose. Subsequently, the balance of the money not being paid, defendant sold the land to other parties. Prior to the bringing of this suit said Lewis Shively assigned to the plaintiff all his right, title, and interest in the claim and contract in question, and to all sums of money paid by him under said contract. This action was commenced in October, 1891, and is in the nature of an action for money had and received, to recover back the first payment made by Lewis Shively under the contract. Judgment went for plaintiff, and this appeal is taken from the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial.

Respondent rests his case upon the claim that appellant, having sold the land to other parties, thereby rescinded the contract, and rendered itself liable for a return of the money already paid. Appellant insists that Shively's failure to pay the deferred payments when due or when demanded was such a default upon his part as to relieve appellant of any further obligation towards him. Appellant states in his answer that by reason of respondent's default as to the nonpayment of the installments due it treated the contract of sale as rescinded, and thereupon sold the land to other parties. While in a subsequent portion of the answer there is a denial of the allegation that defendant rescinded the contract by reason of such sale, yet the pleading, taken in connection with the balance of the record, indicates that a rescission by defendant was fully admitted. This is conclusively shown by an answer to an interrogatory of the court, wherein counsel for appellant said: "We treated the contract as rescinded, and after about a year and a half sold the land to other parties. That is alleged and admitted in the pleadings." The general principle involved in this case, as disclosed by the pleadings and facts stated, has been directly passed upon by this court in a number of recent decisions, and the law upon the question must be deemed settled beyond dispute. These cases hold that, when a contract of sale and purchase of land is abandoned or rescinded by the parties, the vendee, though in default, may recover back installments paid of the purchase money, less the actual damage to the vendor occasioned by his breach of contract. Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280; Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749; Phelps v. Brown, 95 Cal. 572, 30 Pac. Rep. 774; Bradford v. Parkhurst, 96 Cal. 102, 30 Pac. Rep. 1106. The contracts of sale forming the basis of litigation in the foregoing cases contained a forfeiture clause quite similar to the one here under consideration, and that provision has never been upheld. The assignment to plaintiff of the cause of action evidenced by this litigation was no violation of those provisions of the contract prohibiting its assignment. This is not an action arising under the contract, but an action for money had and received. See Joyce v. Shafer, (Cal.; decision filed February 17, 1893,) 32 Pac. Rep. 320.

It is insisted that the general demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. The complaint alleged that the defendant sold the land to other parties, who took possession as owners thereof, and made large and lasting improvements thereon, and that by reason of such sales the defendant had rescinded said agreement. These facts are all that is alleged as to the rescission by defendant, and we think them wholly insufficient to support a cause of action based upon rescission. Rescission or abandonment of the contract by defendant gives plaintiff his cause of action, but a transfer of the land to third parties of itself does not constitute such abandonment or rescission. It does not necessarily follow from such transfer that defendant has placed it out of his power to comply with the terms of the contract. Such transfer creates no breach of the contract. Non constat but plaintiff's rights were expressly reserved by its terms. Defendant as yet has not defaulted, and might not suffer default when the balance of the purchase price was tendered, and a deed demanded; and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the money paid until he shows the default of the defendant. This question was directly presented in Joyce v. Shafer, supra, and it was there held that a conveyance by the vendor was not a breach of the contract, and a demurrer was sustained to the complaint for that reason. We are entirely satisfied with the principle laid down in that case. If this question were to be tested by the sufficiency of the complaint alone, a reversal of the cause would be the result; but defendant's answer, as already shown, sets out the failure of plaintiff to pay the amounts due, and states that for that reason it treated the contract as rescinded, and sold the land to other parties.

Such allegation supplies all that the complaint omits, and gives plaintiff a good cause of action. When defendant treated the contract as rescinded, and sold the land to other parties, it became liable for the amount of money received from plaintiff, less the actual damage suffered by reason of plaintiff's breach of the contract. That a defective complaint may be cured by admissions of the answer is well settled. Mr. Pomeroy, in his work upon Remedies & Remedial Rights, (section 579,) says: "When the plaintiff has failed to state material facts, so that no cause of action is set forth, but these very facts are supplied by the averments of the answer, the omission is immaterial, and the defect is cured."

We find no other matters demanding our attention. For the foregoing reasons let the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.

REITER v. ROTHSCHILD. (No. 15,045.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1893.)

ACTION AGAINST EXECUTOR—MONEY PAID TO TESTATOR AS SECURITY—EVIDENCE.

1. Plaintiff leased property of R., and gave him $500 as security for the lease, he agreeing to pay it back on the expiration of the lease. R. died before the expiration of the lease, and H., who was appointed his executrix, filed an inventory, which recited: "Moneys belonging to said deceased which has come to the hands of the executrix * * * $500, held as security for lease from" plaintiff. H. died after the termination of the lease. Held, that it was not necessary to present a claim for the $500 against the estate of R., but that an action might be maintained therefor against the estate of H.

2. In view of the sworn statement of H., the finding of the court that she had in her possession the money deposited by plaintiff is supported by the evidence, though her executor testified that he made such statement, and that as a matter of fact it was not true, but was made because they felt she was morally liable for the money.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Catherine Reiter against Joseph Rothschild, executor of Hannah Rothschild, deceased, to recover money deposited by plaintiff with H. Rothschild, whose executrix was Hannah Rothschild. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. Rothschild, for appellant. Wm. G. Cousins and Wm. B. Sharp, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order denying new trial. From the findings and undisputed evidence it appears that on December 29, 1886, Henry Rothschild by indenture leased to the plaintiff the premises known as No. 835 on Sacramento street, San Francisco, for the term of three years and five months, beginning January 19, 1887, at a monthly rental of $125. On the same day the parties to the lease executed another instrument in writing, wherein it is recited as follows: "And whereas, as security for the prompt payment of the rent therein reserved and agreed to be paid by the said party of the second part to the party of the first part, at the times and on the conditions therein mentioned, and to and for the faithful compliance on her part with and performance of all the terms, covenants, promises, and agreements mentioned and set forth in the said lease, which said lease is here referred to and made a part of this agreement, the said party of the second part has paid to, deposited, and left with H. Rothschild the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) in gold coin, to be kept, used and employed by him only for the uses and purposes herein stated: Now, this agreement witnesseth that if the said party of the second part shall [well] and truly pay all rents and perform and execute all the promises, covenants, and conditions of the said lease, as therein contained on her part, then, and in that event, at the expiration and completion of the term of said lease, the said H. Rothschild hereby agrees to pay back the said sum of five hundred dollars ($500) to the said party of the second part." It was further stated that, in case the tenant did not perform her covenants, Rothschild was authorized to retain the $500 as liquidated damages. On the same day Mrs. Reiter delivered the money to Rothschild, receiving the following receipt: "Received, San Francisco, December 19, 1886, of and from Catherine Reiter, the sum of five hundred dollars, to be kept, used, and employed by me according to and upon the terms and conditions of the foregoing agreement, and in pursuance thereof. H. Rothschild. Witness: E. O. Hisgen." Mrs. Reiter entered into possession under the lease, occupied the premises for the full term, and upon its termination, June 19, 1890, quietly surrendered the premises to the representatives of H. Rothschild. It is agreed that she paid her rent when due, and did in all respects perform all the agreements, promises, conditions, and covenants on her part in the lease. Before the expiration of the term, however, to wit, May 4, 1889, Henry Rothschild died testate, and on May 24th of the same year his widow, Hannah Rothschild, was appointed executrix of his will. The usual notice to creditors was published by her prior to June 24, 1889. June 10, 1889, Hannah Rothschild, as executrix of the will of Henry Rothschild, returned and filed an inventory of said estate, verified by her oath, as required by law, in which the following appears: "Moneys belonging to said deceased which have come to the hands of the executrix as follows: Cash, $1,307.50; $500, held as security for lease from Catherine Reiter, paid December 29, 1886, $500.00." The verification states that the foregoing inventory contains a true statement of all the estate of said deceased which has come to her knowledge and possession, and particularly of all moneys belonging to said deceased. No claim of any kind was ever presented by plaintiff, or for her, against the estate of Henry Rothschild, deceased.

After the expiration of the term of the lease, to wit, October 26, 1889, Hannah Rothschild died intestate. November 18, 1889, Joseph Rothschild was appointed administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Henry Rothschild, and March 10, 1890, the administration of said estate was closed, and the administrator discharged. November 18, 1889, Joseph Rothschild was also appointed executor of the will of Hannah Rothschild, deceased, and duly qualified, and is still such executor. September 16, 1890, the plaintiff presented her claim against the estate of Hannah Rothschild in due form to the executor, by whom it was rejected September 29, 1890. This suit was brought to have judgment establishing her claim against that estate. Defendant denies that he received or has the money sued for. If Hannah Rothschild, therefore, received the $500 deposited with Henry Rothschild by plaintiff, she must have converted it to her own use. As a witness the defendant says that he thinks plaintiff ought to have the money, but he says, as a lawyer and as executor, he thinks he should not pay it unless she establishes a legal claim to it. She ought to have presented the claim to the estate of Henry Rothschild, and, not having done so, he cannot pay it. This suggests the question raised on this appeal.

1. It is first suggested that it is averred in the complaint that the money was received by Hannah Rothschild as executrix, and it is claimed what she held as executrix must belong to the estate. The complaint also avers that Hannah Rothschild held the money for the use of the plaintiff. This is a very comprehensive allegation. It would be supported by any evidence which proves that she had money which, in equity and good conscience, she ought to pay to plaintiff. It was not necessary to aver that she received the money as executrix, yet in this case it was literally true, and the allegation does no harm. The leasehold estate had not terminated when Henry Rothschild died. Of course, there still remained something to be done by plaintiff, for the performance of which the money was held as security. In the absence of a showing we must presume that the premises and the lease still belonged to the estate, and Hannah Rothschild, executrix, would be entitled to retain the money until Mrs. Reiter had fully performed her covenants. When that was done, as it was, while Mrs. Rothschild was executrix, the estate had no further interest in it, and Mrs. Rothschild was then a mere bailee of the money for Mrs. Reiter, and an action might have been maintained against her for it without demand. Quimby v. Lyon, 63 Cal. 394. If this be so, it is evident that it was not necessary to present the claim against the estate of Henry Rothschild, even if plaintiff might have elected to do so. See, on this subject, Gunter v. James, 9 Cal. 658; Lathrop v. Bampton, 31 Cal. 24; Roach v. Caraffa, 85 Cal. 437, 25 Pac. Rep. 22; Rowland v. Madden, 72 Cal. 17, 12 Pac. Rep. 226, 870; Von Schmidt v. Bourn, 50 Cal. 616.

2. It is claimed by the appellant that there was no evidence to sustain the finding of the court that Hannah Rothschild had in her possession the money deposited by plaintiff. In view of the sworn statement of Hannah Rothschild, quoted above, it is difficult to comprehend this contention; but the point seems to be that defendant was himself the only one having personal knowledge of the matter, and he was a witness at the trial. He testified, among other things, that he had personally attended to the business for Henry and Hannah Rothschild, who were his parents. He drew the lease and the agreement, received the money from Mrs. Reiter for his father, and handed it to his father. He testified that Henry Rothschild put the money with his own, did not keep it separate, and that Mrs. Rothschild did not receive the $500, or any portion of it, either as an individual or as executrix. He says: "She never included it in the inventory, and it never appeared there, because she never received it." He prepared the inventory himself, as the attorney of Mrs. Rothschild, and further testified in regard to the statement contained in it: "Question. And yet you let her sign that? Answer. Yes, sir; upon my advice that she should charge herself with the money, although she never got a dollar of it. I took the position that she was morally, if not legally, liable for this money, although she never got the money. It was upon the further theory that she was the sole devisee under the will, and I told her if she never received that money, although I knew she had not, she should pay it if she took it out of her own pocket, and so advised her." For an explanation this is certainly not a success. If true, it shows that Mrs. Rothschild did intend to make herself personally liable for the money. But the statement was made under oath, and no reason can be imagined for swearing to such a statement, unless she had the money, and denied that, or at least doubted, whether it belonged to the estate. It is not necessary nor is it usual to state the debts in the inventory, and certainly the defendant, as an attorney, could not doubt that Mrs. Reiter had both a moral and a legal claim against the estate of Henry Rothschild for the money, and that it was unnecessary for her protection to state anything about it in the inventory. And then the statement, made from a conscientious desire to secure to plaintiff money justly due her, might result in her injury, if it can now be shown to be false; for, if the statement were true, plaintiff had no occasion to present her claim against the estate of Henry Rothschild. It is, after all, only a question as to whether there was a substantial conflict in the evidence. I think the finding in accordance with the evidence, and advise an affirmance of the judgment and order.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

GAMBLE v. TRIPP et al. (No. 15,083.)

APPEAL — EXCEPTIONS — INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — CONTRACT OF SALE — RESCISSION FOR FRAUD — LACHES.

1. Specifications in the bill of exceptions "that the court erred in finding that the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint were true, and all the denials and allegations of the defendant's answer were untrue, inasmuch as the testimony does not show such a state of facts," and "that the findings are not borne out by the testimony, fraud and misrepresentation in law having been proven by the defendant," are insufficient, under Code Civil Proc. § 648, requiring an exception on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to specify the particulars in which it is insufficient.

2. A rescission of a sale, on the ground of fraud, $4\frac{1}{2}$ months after the fraud was discovered, is not, in the absence of excuse for the delay, the prompt action required by Civil Code, § 1691, to justify a rescission.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by James Gamble against Dwight K. Tripp and the Western Savings & Trust Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Tripp appeals. Affirmed.

Galpin & Zeigler, for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. On the 29th day of July, 1875, the defendant Dwight K. Tripp executed and delivered to the plaintiff his promissory note for $5,885, payable 60 days after date, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month from maturity until paid. The consideration for the note was the sale by the payee to the maker of 2,140 shares of the capital stock of the Western Savings & Trust Company, a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and doing a banking business in the city and county of San Francisco; and, to secure payment of the note, the certificates of the stock were left with the said company in pledge for the plaintiff. On the 15th of February, 1876, the plaintiff commenced this action to recover the amount due on the note, and to obtain a decree directing the sale of the said stock and the application of the proceeds of the sale to the payment of the judgment. On the 29th of the same month, the defendant Tripp filed his answer to the complaint, alleging that, to induce him to purchase the said stock, and for the purpose of defrauding him, the plaintiff made to him certain representations and statements as to condition and affairs of the said company, which were false, fraudulent, and untrue, and known by the plaintiff to be so at the time they were made, and that, relying upon such representations and statements, he was induced to purchase the said stock, and, in payment thereof, to execute the said note; and also alleging "that, as soon as he became fully informed of the condition and situation of the said Western Savings & Trust Company, and of the false and untruthful and fraudulent statements of the said plaintiff, he notified him thereof, and offered to surrender and deliver to him the said 2,140 shares of stock, and demanded the return of said note given therefor, revoking and rescinding his said agreement;" and the prayer was "that the contract existing between defendant and plaintiff sued upon be rescinded, and that the said plaintiff be ordered to surrender said note to this defendant, and that the said codefendant, Western Savings & Trust Company, be directed to surrender and deliver to said plaintiff the said 2,140 shares of stock," and for general relief. The case was tried in December, 1891, and the court, among other things, found "that all the allegations and averments of the plaintiff's complaint are true, and all the denials and allegations of the defendant's answer are untrue; that the plaintiff did not at or before the making and delivery to him by defendant of said promissory note, or ever, make to the defendant any representations or statements which were false, fraudulent, or untrue, or made for the purpose of defrauding the defendant, or that the defendant was induced to or did rely upon such alleged false and fraudulent representations or statements in respect to said Western Savings & Trust Company, or any or either of them; that the defendant, after the commencement of this action, and not before, offered to rescind said transaction, and to return to plaintiff said 2,140 shares of said capital stock of said company, and demanded the return to him of said promissory note;" and, as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment as prayed for in his complaint. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount due on the note for principal and interest, aggregating $17,404.05, and for costs of suit, and also directing a sale of the stock, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the amount found due. From this judgment the defendant appealed, and has brought the case here on a bill of exceptions.

1. The appellant contends that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and hence that the judgment should be reversed.

The only specifications found in the bill of exceptions as to the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings are as follows: "That the court erred in finding that the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint were true, and all the denials and allegations of the defendant's answer were untrue, inasmuch as the testimony does not disclose such a state of facts;" "that the findings are not borne out by the testimony, fraud and misrepresentation in law having been proven by the defendant and his witnesses." These specifications are clearly insufficient to meet the requirements of section 648 of the Code of Civil Procedure,¹ and the findings cannot therefore be reversed on this ground. If it were otherwise, however, the same result would necessarily follow. The evidence was conflicting in many respects, but that introduced by the plaintiff was amply sufficient to justify the findings.

2. The appellant further contends that the stock, when transferred to him, was of no value, and hence that there was no consideration for the note, and he had a right to rescind the transaction without returning the certificates. In support of this position, counsel cite Gifford v. Carvill, 29 Cal. 589. The case cited was an action upon two promissory notes given for a part of the purchase money for shares of stock in a mining company, and the defense was that the defendant was induced to purchase by the false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiff as to the value of the mines owned by the company issuing the stock. The court, speaking of the rescission of contracts, said: "When the article is absolutely valueless for any purpose, it is not necessary to return it. This is on the ground that an article absolutely without any value is not the subject of a contract; that it cannot afford any consideration for a promise, and the contract is nudum pactum—absolutely void, ab initio—for the want of a consideration to support it. But it is not enough that it shall be without value to the defendant. If it is or may be of any value to either party, or if the detention would produce any loss or injury to the other party, the contract must be rescinded, and the property returned within a reasonable time after the discovery of the fraud." In this case there was no averment in the answer, or proof at the trial, that the stock sold by plaintiff to defendant was of no value at the time of the sale. On the contrary, it appears to have had a market and a supposed real value at that time. This being so, the defendant could only rescind his contract by doing so promptly upon discovering the facts which entitled him to rescind, and by restoring or offering to restore to the plaintiff everything of value which he had received under the contract. Civil Code, § 1691. The defendant testified: "I believed when I bought the stock that the bank was sound, and doing a legitimate banking business, as I was induced to believe from plaintiff's representations to me, and I accepted the position as director of the company or bank. In the course of a short time, and before my note became due, I discovered the true condition of the bank, and that the representations made by the plaintiff were false and untrue." The note became due on the 27th of September, and the discovery was therefore before that time. The court found, in effect, that the defendant made no offer to rescind until after the commencement of the action, and this finding is not assailed. More than 4½ months then elapsed between the time of defendant's alleged discovery and his offer to rescind. This, in the absence of some excuse shown for the delay, was certainly not the prompt action required by the Code, and therefore cannot be availed of. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

SERVICE OF PROCESS—AMENDMENT OF COMPLAINT—EFFECT—PRESUMPTIONS ON APPEAL.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 432, providing that if the complaint be amended a copy of the amendments or amended complaint must be served on the defendants affected thereby, applies to amendments made after the parties have been brought into court; and if the amendment is made before service on defendants the summons may issue as in other cases, and require defendants to appear and answer "the complaint filed" without referring to the amendment.

2. On appeal from a judgment which recites due service, and shows nothing inconsistent therewith, it will be presumed that the court authorized the issuance of summons on the amended complaint on which judgment was given.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by J. J. Dowling against Moses Comerford and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellants. Parker & Eells, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to foreclose a street assessment, and the appeal is taken by Moses and Ann Comerford, against whom judgment was entered upon default, from the judgment upon the judgment roll. April 10, 1890, an amended complaint was filed, and an amended summons issued. The amended summons required defendants to appear and answer "the complaint filed therein, or judgment by default will be entered against you according to the prayer of the complaint;" and they were notified "that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the court for the relief therein demanded." It also contained a full and correct statement of the relief demanded in the complaint.

It is contended that summons must be issued "on" the original complaint, and, if the complaint be amended, a copy of the amendment must be served on all defendants affected thereby. Sections 405, 416, 432, Code Civil Proc., are relied upon to support this proposition. 405 provides simply that an action is commenced by filing a complaint; 416, that summons may be served by delivering to defendant a copy of the summons and a copy of the complaint, except in certain specified cases; and 432, that if the complaint be amended the court may require it to be filed as amended, and that a copy of the amendments or amended complaint must be served on the defendants affected thereby. This last requirement is evidently the chief reliance for this contention. It, however, has reference to amendments made after the parties have been brought into court, and it does not follow that, if amendments had been made before all the parties had been served, the summons might not, nevertheless, be served as in other cases. New parties might be brought in, and in such case I see no reason why summons might not be served on the new defendants in the same mode as would have sufficed had they been made parties originally. Section 432 was not designed for such a case, and does not require a mode of service differing from other cases. The summons refers to the complaint on file, and not in terms to the amended complaint. I think this the proper mode, even when the complaint has been amended, although it would have been sufficient had the reference been in terms to the amended complaint. In neither case would there have been anything misleading. When an amended pleading is filed, which entirely takes the place of the former one, it becomes the complaint, answer, or demurrer, as the case may be, and such a reference is not at all uncertain or ambiguous. It does not appear that there was any order allowing the complaint or summons to be amended, and authorizing the service of the amended complaint instead of the original; but the appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, and the respondent could not furnish such order if it existed. Its existence will therefore be presumed in support of the judgment, which recites due service, and shows nothing inconsistent with the fact that such order was duly made. Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 606, 29 Pac. Rep. 220. I recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

HUNT v. SWYNEY, (SHARP, Intervener.)
(No. 14, 958.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1893.)

EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY—RESULTING TRUST.

1. S.'s clerk, Y., took an assignment of mortgage from him, foreclosed it, and took the property in his own name. S. having died, Y. contended, as against his widow, that he had bought the mortgage, and foreclosed it for himself. The widow asserted that she had bought it from her husband, and had it assigned to Y. for foreclosure. On direct examination, Mrs. S. was asked whether at the time in question Y. was her agent for collecting rents. Y.'s accounts were then put in evidence, showing large credits for rents collected for her, and charges for the notary's fee on the assignment of the mortgage, for taxes on the same, and expenses of foreclosure and sale. Held, that the question was proper as an introduction of the accounts.

2. Where a witness responsively answers a question in the affirmative, and then proceeds to state other irresponsive matters, a motion to strike out the whole answer is rightly denied.

3. Y., who had been the clerk of S., deceased, and Mrs. S.'s rent collector, took an assignment of mortgage from S., foreclosed it, and took title to the land in his own name. Mrs. S. thereafter claimed the land as having bought the mortgage from her husband, and had it assigned to Y. to foreclose. Y. maintained that he had bought and foreclosed the mortgage for himself. The record of the foreclosure case showed that Y., cross-examined, had admitted his agency for Mrs. S. in the matter, and that the price of the mortgage was applied on a debt due from S. to his wife. Held, that the court was justified in finding him a trustee, who could have no possession adverse to Mrs. S.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by John Hunt, executor of the will of George F. Sharp, deceased, against Thomas N. Swyney, to establish a trust in favor of testator's estate in certain lots held by said Swyney. Honora Sharp, testator's widow, intervenes, claiming the trust for herself. Judgment for intervener. Defendant appeals.

Eugene N. Deuprey, for appellant. Arthur Rodgers and Matt I. Sullivan, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appeal by defendant, Swyney, from a judgment in favor of the intervener, Honora Sharp, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. An action was commenced October 17, 1887, by plaintiff, as the executor of the will of George F.

Sharp, deceased, against the defendant Swyney et al., to compel said Swyney to convey to plaintiff a certain lot in the city of San Francisco, and to recover the value of the use thereof, alleging that said Swyney held the title in trust for the estate of his testator. Honora Sharp, the widow of said George F. Sharp, filed her complaint in intervention August 17, 1888, alleging the same facts, except that Swyney held the property in trust for her, and that she, and not the estate, was the owner, and entitled to a conveyance and to recover the rents and profits. On December 21, 1880, Alfred Rising and wife executed to George F. Sharp their note for $3,500 for money loaned, and a mortgage upon the lot in question to secure the same. On December 10, 1881, Sharp assigned the note and mortgage to defendant, Swyney, who foreclosed the mortgage, and upon a sale under the decree, in July, 1882, bid the amount of the judgment, and became the purchaser of the lot in controversy. Swyney assigned the certificate of purchase to one Pennie, to whom the sheriff executed a deed, but Pennie afterwards conveyed the lot to defendant, Swyney. George F. Sharp died in October, 1882. For three years last before Sharp's death Swyney was his law clerk, and during the same time was the agent of Mrs. Sharp in collecting the rents of her separate property. Plaintiff claimed that the note and mortgage were assigned to Swyney in trust, for collection for the benefit of Mr. Sharp. Defendant, Swyney, claimed that he purchased and paid for the note and mortgage and foreclosed it for his own benefit, and the intervener, Mrs. Sharp, claimed that the consideration of the note and mortgage was her separate money, which her husband had invested for her, taking the note and mortgage in his own name; that the assignment to Swyney was without consideration and in trust, for foreclosure, collection, and purchase for her exclusive benefit. Swyney's answer put in issue the material averments of the intervener's complaint, and pleaded the statute of limitations.

The findings fully sustain the contention of the intervener, but it is contended by appellant that in several material matters they are not justified by the evidence. So far as the findings are adverse to defendant's claim that he purchased the note and mortgage, and was the owner of them in his own right, and not in trust for the use and benefit of any person other than himself, the evidence, while conflicting, could lead to no other reasonable conclusion than that reached by the court. The particulars in which the testimony of the intervener is least satisfactory, and which are largely commented upon by appellant, are those which relate to the question whether the trust was for the benefit of herself or her husband; but the trust having been found on sufficient evidence, that is a question which does not materially concern the appellant, though the findings in that respect are sufficiently supported. Appellant also specifies several particulars in which he contends the court erred during the trial.

The judgment roll in the case of Swyney v. Rising et al. was properly received. The copy of the note set out in the complaint omitted the words, "at the same rate," but the complaint was amended in that respect by leave of the court. Upon direct examination Mrs. Sharp was asked: "During the year 1881, from December 1st down to and including the month of October, 1882, was Mr. Swyney, the defendant in this action, your agent in collecting rents for you?" Objection was made that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and not pertinent to any of the issues. The objection was overruled, upon the ground that it was introductory. The specifications do not show that any motion was afterwards made to strike out, while the record does show that defendant's accounts were put in evidence, showing not only that large amounts of rents were collected by the defendant for her, thus tending to show that she had moneys of her own, but also showing, among other things, that in his accounts to her of rents collected he charged her for the notary's fee for acknowledging the assignment of the Rising mortgage to himself, and for recording it, for paying the taxes on the mortgage, and for all the expenses of foreclosure of that mortgage, including a witness fee to himself and the expenses of sale. In view of this evidence the preliminary question leading to its introduction was entirely proper. The witness, in answer to a question, said, "Yes, sir;" and proceeded to state other matters not responsive to the question, the material parts of which appear in other portions of her testimony, and which, so far as material, were harmless. The motion by appellant was to strike out the whole of the answer as not responsive. The motion was properly denied. A part was responsive, and therefore all the answer could not be stricken out.

Two other errors of law are stated in the specifications, being rulings upon the admission of testimony, and marked "D" and "E." I can see no valid objection that appellant could urge to either. Both questions were pertinent to the controversy between Mrs. Sharp and the estate, and, if erroneous upon any ground, it is not perceived how they could prejudice the appellant. These exceptions are stated in appellant's brief, but no comments of any character are made.

The remaining points relate to the findings, and have been disposed of, except that relating to the plea of the statute of limitations. Upon that issue the court found that the intervener did not discover that Swyney claimed to own the premises until shortly before, and less than three years before, she filed her complaint in the cause, and that defendant actively and by artifice concealed from her the fact that he asserted a claim to the premises. Swyney was examined as a witness in the foreclosure case of Swyney v. Rising et al., and upon cross-examination was asked: "How much did you pay Mr. Sharp for that mortgage? Answer. Mr. Sharp was paid $3,500. Q. How much did you pay? A. I paid that amount. Q. Who from, his wife? A. Yes, sir; I hold that for Mrs. Sharp. I am Mrs. Sharp's agent, and before the assignment of the mortgage was made Mr. Sharp was indebted to Mrs. Sharp for something like $4,000. Mrs. Sharp instructed me that Mr. Sharp would assign to me a mortgage, and in consideration of that assignment I was to remit to him the amount of that indebtedness, $3,500." It is clear from this evidence, given by Mr. Swyney at the time of the transaction, that he acted in the matter as the agent of Mrs. Sharp, who was the purchaser of the mortgage from Mr. Sharp, and that the foreclosure and purchase at sheriff's sale were for her benefit. It is not alleged that he ever purchased the property from her, nor paid to her the consideration she paid her husband for the mortgage. Sustaining, as he then admitted, the confidential relation of agent, Mrs. Sharp being the equitable owner of the mortgage and of the property paid for by the judgment, he could not acquire title to the property thus held by him in trust by adverse possession, without a clear and unequivocal repudiation of that trust, and an assertion of his own claim of title brought to her knowledge. The finding of the court upon the plea of adverse possession is justified by the evidence. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

CALIFORNIA ACADEMY OF SCIENCES
v. FLETCHER. (No. 14,906.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1893.)
ARBITRATION AND AWARD—JUDGMENT ON AWARD.

Code Civil Proc. § 1283, provides that a submission to arbitrators may stipulate that it be entered as an order of the superior court, being filed with the county clerk, who shall thereupon note it in his register of actions, setting out the names of the parties and arbitrators, the date of the filing, and the time, if any, limited for the award. A submission was delivered to the clerk April 22d, and marked by him "Filed." The same day he noted in his register the names of the parties, and date of submission, and on May 12th added, in brackets, the names of the arbitrators, and the time limited, noting the time of the change of entry. The award had been made and filed April 23d, and judgment was rendered thereon May 14th. Held, that the clerk's entries were regular enough to support the judgment, the "thereupon" of the section being less strict than "immediately," and the submission itself stipulating that it might be entered as an order "at any time."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Arbitration between the California Academy of Sciences, and W. M. Fletcher. Judgment on the award for Fletcher. The academy appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Burnett, (Lester G. Burnett, of counsel,) for appellant. L. E. Bulkeley and William H. Jordan, (Aylett R. Cotton, of counsel,) for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant, a corporation, and the respondent, a contractor, having certain differences about a building contract between the parties, did on April 15, 1891, enter into a written agreement, by which they submitted said differences to arbitration. By the submission the arbitrators were to determine certain enumerated issues, and were to find what, if any, balance of money was due from appellant to respondent; and it was stipulated therein "that the award to be made by said arbitrators or a majority of them, they all being present, shall in all things, by us, and each of us, be well and faithfully kept and observed." The submission also contained this clause: "And it is hereby agreed that the submission to arbitration may be entered as an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, at any time." On April 23, 1891, the arbitrators made their written award, by which they passed on all the issues submitted to them, and found that appellant owed respondent $7,453.30; and the award was on said April 23d filed with the clerk of said court. Afterwards, on May 7, 1891, the board of trustees of appellant passed a resolution by which it was declared that they revoked said submission to arbitration, and a notice of such resolution was served on respondent's attorney on May 9th. On May 14, 1891, judgment was entered in the superior court upon the award. Appellant afterwards moved to set aside the award, and it appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying its motion to set it aside.

Section 1283 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows: "It may be stipulated in the submission that it be entered as an order of the superior court, for which purpose it must be filed with the clerk of the county where the parties, or one of them, reside. The clerk must thereupon enter in his register of actions a note of the submission, with the names of the parties, the names of the arbitrators, the date of the submission when filed, and the time limited by the submission, if any, within which the award must be made. When so entered, the submission cannot be revoked without the consent of both parties. The arbitrators may be compelled by the court to make an award, and the award may be enforced by the court in the same manner as a judgment. If the submission is not made an order of the court, it may be revoked at any time before the award is made." The main contention of the appellant is that the clerk did not make such an entry of the submission in his register of actions as is required by the second sentence of said section 1283, and that, therefore, there was no jurisdiction to enter judgment upon the award, and appellant had the right to revoke the submission after the award had been made. What the clerk did, that is material here, is as follows: The submission was delivered to him April 22d, and was marked by him "Filed." He also, on the same day, made the following entry in his register of actions: "32,809. Dept. No. 6. W. C. Burnett, California Academy of Sciences, and W. M. Fletcher, 1891, April 22d. Agreement to arbitrate filed." And on May 12th he added to this entry as follows: "(Arbitrators, Seth Babson, J. B. Lo Romer, and J. B. Gonyean. Time limited by the submission to award before May 1, 1891. Changes in entry made May 12, 1891, 9 A. M.)" It will be noticed that the first entry, made April 22d, did not contain the names of the arbitrators, or the time limited for the rendering of the award, and that in other respects it complied with section 1283; but this entry, and the amendment made to it on May 12th, clearly constituted a sufficient compliance with that section, even though it be held that a strict compliance is necessary.

In determining whether there was authority for entering the judgment, the attempt of appellant to revoke the submission may be left out of view. The general rule is that neither party can revoke a submission to arbitration after the award has been made, and that rule is not in any way changed by the provisions of our Code. It is provided in section 1283, with respect to cases where it is stipulated that the submission may be entered as an order of court, that after the clerk has entered the proper order "the submission cannot be revoked without the consent of both parties;" but this provision is a restriction, and not an enlargement, of the right of revocation. At common law either party could revoke before award; but under the Code a party who has stipulated that the submission be made an order of court cannot revoke before the award, after the clerk has made the proper court order. On the other hand, in such a case, "the arbitrators may be compelled by the court to make an award." But in no case does the Code give the right of revocation after award, and with respect to that right the Code does not provide for two kinds of arbitration, as contended by appellant. Of course whether a judgment can properly be entered upon the award, or whether the prevailing party must be remitted to his common-law remedies, is another question. Viewing the question, therefore, without consideration of the attempted revocation after award, we think that there was jurisdiction to enter the judgment. If it be admitted that the clerk did not quite fully enough perform his ministerial duty in the premises by his first entry of April 22d, still his addition to said entry made May 12th, constituted, with the first entry, a full compliance with the statute, and the amendment or addition was made before the judgment. So, when the judgment was entered, it rested upon a full entry in the register of actions of everything required by the Code to be entered there. The entry is not required to be made at any particular time. "Thereupon," as used in section 1283, does not mean "immediately." Moreover, it was stipulated that the order "may be entered at any time." The objection that the oaths taken by the arbitrators do not, in form, sufficiently comply with section 1285 of the Code, is overcritical, and has not force enough in it to upset the award. We think, upon this point, that there was a substantial compliance with the Code, although it is astonishing that parties, when instituting and conducting statutory proceedings, will not look at the statute, and follow its language, instead of trusting to their memories, or their general notions of what is sufficient. There are no other points in the case which require special notice. Judgment and order appealed from affirmed.

(No. 14,495.)

EXECUTION—ACTION AGAINST GARNISHEE.

Code Civil Proc. §§ 716-721, provide that after execution issued, on a showing, by affidavit or otherwise, that a person owes the judgment debtor more than $50, the judge may order such person to appear, and answer to the debt. If he admit it, he may be ordered to apply the amount on the judgment. If he deny it, and the judge finds such denial bona fide, he may authorize the judgment creditor to bring suit against him for the debt. Held, that this remedy is exclusive, and cannot be supplied as a precedent to direct suit, by mere garnishment on execution.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by Julie Herrlich and John F. Hanlon against C. H. Kaufmann and others for certain moneys due from John McKenzie—an insolvent, who had assigned to said Kaufmann—to Margaret McDonald, plaintiffs' judgment debtor. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant Kaufmann appeals. Reversed.

Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for appellant. Chas. F. Hanlon, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. John McKenzie was a stockbroker, and on December 3, 1886, made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors to the defendant C. H. Kaufmann, pursuant to the provisions of the Civil Code on the subject. Prior and down to the assignment, McKenzie had been doing a stock business with one Margaret McDonald, and owed her, or some one for whom she was acting, several thousand dollars. Julie Herrlich, the plaintiff in the case at bar, recovered a judgment (the date of which is in dispute) against said McDonald for $6,210.86; and on December 31, 1886, she had an execution issued upon said judgment, and under said execution a notice of garnishment was served on the defendant Kaufmann, notifying him that all moneys in his hands, due Mrs. McDonald, were levied upon and attached. There was another execution and notice of garnishment, of a similar character, in December, 1887, and another in January, 1889. Thereafter, in February, 1889, this present action was commenced by said Julie Herrlich to recover from Kaufmann the amount alleged to be due to said Margaret McDonald on account of her dealings with McKenzie. Other parties were made defendants, and John F. Hanlon was made a plaintiff, upon the allegation that he owned a fractional part of the judgment in the case of Herrlich v. McDonald. The court found that there was due to Mrs. McDonald, upon her said stock business with McKenzie, the sum of $5,769.52, and judgment was rendered against Kaufmann for that amount, the judgment being "that the plaintiffs have and receive of and from the defendant C. H. Kaufmann the sum of $5,769.52, and that execution issue therefor." Kaufmann appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying him a new trial.

Appellant contends that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. He also makes a number of other points, as, for instance, that Kaufmann being an assignee under the Code, the money was in custodia legis, and not subject to levy; that Mrs. McDonald could not have maintained this action, and therefore, as plaintiffs can have no greater right by virtue of the garnishment than their judgment debtor had, they cannot maintain it; that the court erred in refusing to make certain assignees of Mrs. McDonald defendants; that as the notice of garnishment was served December 31, 1886, the cause of action founded on it was barred before the action was commenced; that the judgment in Herrlich v. McDonald was rendered in November, 1881, and was itself outlawed; and that various fatal errors were committed in rulings upon the admissibility of evidence. But these and other points made by appellant we do not deem it necessary to discuss, because, in our opinion, the complaint does not state a cause of action. It also appears that, before the notice of garnishment, McDonald had made an assignment (claimed by respondent to be fraudulent) of her debt from McKenzie to one Scott, and notified Kaufmann thereof; that Scott assigned to one Potter, and Potter, in turn, to one Davis; that one Knowlton, before said garnishment, commenced an action against McKenzie, Kaufmann, and others, praying that the various sums due the several creditors of McKenzie, in Kaufmann's hands, be ascertained, that the plaintiff herein intervened in said action, but afterwards withdrew her intervention, and that judgment was rendered therein that said Davis was entitled to the moneys sued for by plaintiffs in the case at bar. There are other complications, also, not necessary to be here mentioned.

The complaint goes upon the theory that the plaintiff herein, Herrlich, having a money judgment against Mrs. McDonald, and having, upon an execution thereon, served Kaufmann with a notice of garnishment, thereby acquired as direct a cause of action against the latter as in any case where indebitatus assumpsit would lie. But this is not the law. There is, at common law, no privity between a judgment creditor and his debtor's debtor; there is no contract relation between them, and no relation of any kind which, of itself, gives the former a direct cause of action at law against the latter. Formerly, assets of a judgment debtor, which could not be effectively seized by the sheriff under an execution, such as a debt owing to the defendant, could be reached, upon a proper showing, through a court of equity, by means of a creditor's bill or suit; but in this state, and in most of the other states, a legal remedy is afforded by statutes providing for proceedings supplementary to execution, and the general rule is that when there are such statutory proceedings they must be pursued. The Code of Civil Procedure of this state, from section 716 to section 721, specifically provides how a judgment creditor may proceed against a debtor of his judgment debtor. Those sections provide, in brief, that after the issuing of an execution, upon a showing by affidavit or otherwise that a person is indebted to the judgment debtor in an amount exceeding $50, the judge may order such person to appear and answer concerning such alleged indebtedness. If he admits the indebtedness he may be ordered to apply the amount thereof to the satisfaction of the judgment. If he denies any indebtedness, and the denial seems, after a hearing, to be bona fide, the court or judge may authorize the judgment creditor to institute a suit against such person to recover such alleged debt. Now, in the case at bar, the plaintiffs entirely ignored these statutory provisions, and without procuring an order for appellant to appear and answer, and without any order authorizing them to commence an action against appellant, brought this suit upon the theory of a direct liability of appellant to them, as hereinbefore stated.

It has been several times held by this court that the statutory proceedings supplementary to execution are a substitute for a creditor's bill. In Adams v. Hackett, 7 Cal. 201, the court say: "In reference to the chapter prescribing the mode of proceedings supplementary to execution, it seems clear that those provisions were intended as a substitute for what was called 'a creditor's bill.' This is so stated by the practice commissioners in their original note to this chapter in the New York Code. The design was, in the language of those commissioners, 'to furnish a cheaper and easier method.' The different sections of this chapter, when taken together, form a consistent and harmonious whole, and, when fairly and liberally carried out, afford a cheaper and easier method than the former one, by creditor's bill." In Bank v. Robinson, 57 Cal. 522, the court say: "Proceedings under sections 714 to 721 and section 574 of the Code of Civil Procedure were intended as a substitute for the creditor's bill, as formerly used in chancery. Adams v. Hackett, 7 Cal. 201; Lynch v. Johnson, 48 N. Y. 33. So that any property which was reached by a creditor's bill may now be reached by the process of proceedings supplementary to execution." In Habenicht v. Lissak, 78 Cal. 357, 20 Pac. Rep. 874, the court say: "In Bank v. Robinson, 57 Cal. 520, it was held that the proceedings supplemental to execution are intended to take the place of the creditor's bill." See, also, McCullough v. Clark, 41 Cal. 302; High v. Bank, 95 Cal. 386, 30 Pac. Rep. 556. Also, Graham v. Railroad Co., 10 Wis. 459; Hexter v. Clifford, 5 Colo. 168; and cases cited in note to Lathrop v. Clapp, 100 Amer. Dec. 501, in support of the statement therein made, that "in nearly all of the states these proceedings supplemental to execution are regarded as a substitute for the creditor's bill of the chancery practice." It is not necessary, however, to go to the length of saying that a creditor's bill could not be sustained here under any circumstances, for there might, perhaps, be cases in which the statutory proceedings would not afford adequate relief. But they must be pursued, unless in those exceptional cases in which it appears that equity must be invoked because legal remedies are unavailing. The law is correctly stated in Freeman on Executions, (section 394,) where the author says that proceedings supplementary to execution "supplant proceedings in equity, unless some special ground exists upon which to invoke the power of chancery," and in the case at bar there was no such ground. "A code of procedure is usually understood as presenting remedies which are exclusive in their nature, and which, when applicable to the relief sought, exclude or supplant all other modes of redress." Freeman, Ex'ns, supra. And there is no need here of inquiring how strictly the statutory provisions must be followed, because in the case at bar there is no pretense that they were followed at all. The case of Roberts v. Landecker, 9 Cal. 262, cited by appellant, is not in point. In that case, Landecker had been garnished on a writ of attachment, and it was averred that at the time of notice of garnishment he had in his possession goods of the defendant, which he afterwards fraudulently disposed of, and converted to his own use. The practice act made the garnishee on attachment "liable to the plaintiff" for the property in his hands at date of garnishment, and the court construed this to mean a statutory liability upon which a direct action could be brought, and held that proceedings supplementary to execution did not apply to it. But there is no such provision respecting a garnishment upon execution, and the court makes the distinction. Speaking of the sections relating to proceedings supplementary to execution, the court in that case says: "There is nothing in the chapter concerning attachments that refers to these sections, and nothing in the proceedings supplementary to the execution that properly applies to the peculiar circumstances of this case. * * * They (the plaintiffs) sue upon a statutory liability for the value of the property. The proceedings supplementary to execution have another object in view. They seek to subject the property itself to sale under execution, or the debt to collection." The provisions of the statute at that time were the same as those now embraced in the Code.

But if it should be conceded that in a case like the one at bar the statutory provisions could be ignored, and relief sought in a court of equity by means of a creditor's bill, still the complaint here is entirely insufficient. Before equity can be invoked in such a case, it must be shown that remedies at law have been exhausted, or would be unavailing; and with certain exceptions, of which the case at bar is not one, a necessary averment in a creditor's bill is that an execution has been returned unsatisfied. Bank v. Robinson, 57 Cal. 522; Mesmer v. Jenkins, 61 Cal. 153; Harris v. Taylor, 15 Cal. 350. "When a judgment creditor desires to bring a creditor's bill for the purpose of reaching assets which are not subject to execution at law, he must generally take out execution upon his judgment, place it in the sheriff's hands, and wait till that officer makes a return thereon, showing that he can find no property subject thereto. By this means he completely exhausts his legal remedies, and shows that they are unavailing. Then, and not before, he may successfully invoke the aid of equity to reach equitable assets." Freeman, Ex'ns, § 428, and notes. "It is a necessary result from the whole theory of the creditors' suit that jurisdiction in equity will not be entertained when there is a remedy at law." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1415, and notes. Now, in the complaint in the case at bar, there is not only a failure to aver the return of an execution nulla bona, or at all, but there is an affirmative averment that the judgment debtor, Mrs. McDonald, has always been "fully able to pay the whole of said judgment and execution, and has, and always has had, ample moneys and properties to make said payment." The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded.

DALEY v. QUICK. (No. 14,119.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—DANGEROUS PREMISES—INJURIES TO TENANT—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS OF LESSOR'S AGENT—KNOWLEDGE OF TENANT—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—KNOWLEDGE OF AGENT.

1. A tenant of an upper story of a building and wood shed is not entitled to recover damages of the lessor for injuries caused by the falling of the wood shed, on the ground that defendant, after the lease was made, falsely represented to plaintiff that such wood shed was safe, where plaintiff had been occupying the premises for 18 months previous to the injury, during which time he frequently expressed doubts as to its safety, and had as much opportunity as defendant to discover the defect.

2. A lessor is not bound by the representations of an agent to a tenant as to the safety of the leased building, where such agent does not have charge of renting the premises, but is employed by such lessor to make repairs on his buildings when called on by his tenants.

3. Under Civil Code, § 1709, providing that "one who willfully deceives another, with intent to induce him to alter his position to his injury or risk, is liable for any damage which he thereby suffers," such lessor, if bound by the false representations of such agent, is not liable for such injuries, in the absence of evidence that the agent did not believe, or had no reasonable ground for believing, the representations to be true.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Dennis Daley against John Quick for personal injuries caused by the falling of a wood shed on defendant's premises, of which plaintiff was tenant. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and from an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. Morgenthal, for appellant. Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Appeal from an order granting a new trial. Plaintiff rented from the defendant, who was the owner thereof, from month to month, a portion of the upper floor of a dwelling house, known and designated as "No. 3 Tehama Street," San Francisco, and took possession on or about March 21, 1887. Plaintiff continued to occupy the premises as a tenant of the defendant until October 25, 1888, on which last-named day, while in the act of piling three pieces of wood, weighing in the aggregate about 150 pounds, in a wood shed situate upon the upper floor, and contiguous to the rooms occupied by him, the floor gave way, and plaintiff fell with it to the ground, whereby his foot was fractured and his ankle dislocated. The complaint, after setting out the ownership of defendant, the tenancy and occupancy of the plaintiff, proceeds, in substance, to charge that defendant, with a view to retaining plaintiff as a tenant, falsely and fraudulently represented to him that the wood shed was safe and secure, and suitable as a place to store firewood; that plaintiff did not know the fact, but, believing the statements to be true, was thereby induced to continue the tenancy, and to place the wood therein, whereby he was injured; that defendant knew the condition of the property, and that it was unsafe and dangerous, and, with full knowledge of all the facts, falsely and fraudulently, and with intent to defraud plaintiff, made the representations, etc. The answer negatives all the allegations of the complaint tending to establish neglect, fraud, misrepresentations, or any representations in the premises. Plaintiff had a verdict of $1,000. Defendant moved for a new trial, which motion, as before stated, was granted, and plaintiff appeals.

The following is the opinion of the learned judge who presided in the court below, rendered upon granting the motion for a new trial, and which appears in the transcript:

"This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while he was a tenant of defendant. It appears from the complaint that the defendant, being the owner of certain premises, let them to plaintiff on the 21st day of March, 1887; that appurtenant to said premises was a wood shed, designed to be used in connection with the occupation of said premises as a dwelling, that on the 25th day of October, 1888, while the plaintiff was in the act of putting wood in said shed, the underpinning thereof gave way, and said shed fell to the ground, a distance of about twelve feet, carrying with it the plaintiff; and that, by reason thereof, he suffered personal injuries. It is further alleged that the defendant made certain representations to the plaintiff regarding the safety and suitableness of said wood shed for the purpose for which it was intended. These representations, it is claimed, were false, and known to be false by the defendant at the time, and fraudulently made by him for the purpose and with the intent of inducing the plaintiff to rent said premises and occupy them as a dwelling, the advantage accruing to the defendant thereby being the rental or return for the use of said premises. The answer of defendant put in issue, among other things, the allegations relating to the defendant's conduct and representations. Upon a trial, verdict was found in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant now moves for a new trial. Under the ruling of Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 Pac. Rep. 260, and Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58, 22 Pac. Rep. 304, without these allegations of fraud and misrepresentation the complaint would fail to state a cause of action. Holding that it became the duty of the defendant, when he offered the premises for the occupation of human beings, to put them in a condition fit for such occupation, it could not be assumed that he failed in this duty, because of the long lapse of time between the commencement of the tenancy and the time of the accident causing the injuries. This, then, became the subject of proof, and the record does not show that any was offered. The plaintiff, however, distinctly disavows this as the theory of his right to recover. He does not claim that his right of action springs out of the neglect of the defendant to make the premises fit for occupation by human beings, but he says that after he had rented the premises, and before he had used the wood shed, the defendant, through an agent, represented to him that the wood shed was safe for the storage of wood, and that he relied upon such representation, which was in fact false, and made for the purpose of inducing him to occupy said premises, and to store wood in said shed. The defendant, upon this motion, contends that there is no evidence to warrant the verdict upon this or upon any other ground; and, further, that if any representations were made upon the subject, they were not made by the defendant, or by any one authorized by him, directly or ostensibly, as agent or otherwise, to make them.

"The principle of caveat emptor applies to cases of this character. The obligation imposed by statute upon a lessor of property intended for the occupation of human beings to put it in a condition fit for such occupation must be limited by the rules and considerations ordinarily governing men in such matters. A lessor of such property would be liable for injuries resulting from defects in the premises known to him and unknown to the lessee, because arising from some cause not extraneous, if he allowed the lessee to occupy the premises in ignorance of the risks. This principle is illustrated in the case of Baxter v. Roberts, 44 Cal. 187. Whenever the defect is inherent, and unknown to the lessor, he is not accountable; nor can he be held when he has done all that a reasonably prudent man would have done towards fitting the place for occupation. It is as much the duty of the lessee to satisfy himself that the premises are safe as it is of the lessor to make them so; and when it would appear from an examination, such as an ordinarily prudent man would make before venturing to reside in or upon the premises, that they were unsafe, and the defect rendering them so discernible, the lessee is presumed to have had notice of such defect, and accepted the risks incident thereto if he occupies the premises. Now, to apply this rule to the case. There is no testimony tending to show that the wood shed was unsafe at the beginning of the tenancy, except that one year and a half after that time it fell down with the plaintiff, unless it be the declaration by the plaintiff to the supposed agent of the defendant, on the day after he moved in, that the platform upon which the shed was situated was 'a little shaky.' It does not appear wherein it was shaky, but it does appear that the joist underneath the shed gave way at the time plaintiff was hurt, and this was the cause of the accident. There was no evidence other than the mere fact that it gave way that the joist was not properly secured. This counsel for plaintiff considered unnecessary to prove, basing his action upon the fact that the shed was unsafe at a time when the supposed agent of the defendant assured the plaintiff in answer to an inquiry that the shed was safe. The idea seems to be that, having been so assured, plaintiff was not called upon to look further than the assurance; that, if he had not been so assured, he would have examined for himself, and discovered the defect and unsafeness of the shed. I cannot presume that he would have discovered the defect. The total lack of evidence showing what it was leaves it an open question as to whether it was inherent and undiscoverable, or extraneous and open to detection. But assume that he would have discovered it, and thus been enabled to avoid the injuries; was he justified in relying upon the assurance from him, in view of the fact that he suspected the safety of the shed from the time he took the house, and continuously spoke of its unsoundness up to the time he was hurt? Under the circumstances I do not think so. He evidently doubted the truth of the assurance, or he would not have continued his inquiries, and there was no occasion for him to accept them. The statute gave him the right to repair the shed at the defendant's expense, provided the repairs did not exceed the amount of one month's rent, if the defendant failed to do so after notice to repair, or he could vacate the premises. He did not demand that the premises be repaired, but contented himself with the inquiry as to whether they were safe or not. He took the opinion of the supposed agent of the defendant as to their safety, and did not consult his own intelligence in the matter. The color of reason in his favor upon this point rises from the fact that he testifies that he did not have access to that part of the premises which would have enabled him to examine the joist of the shed, and that the defendant's so-called 'agent' did not have such access. But he does not show that he ever tried to gain access to that part of the premises, or that he could not have done so by applying to the defendant or to the tenant occupying that part of them. It, however, appears that this part of the premises was occupied by tenants of the defendant, and that he had no more access to them than the plaintiff had, and that they were used by the ashman, and that wood and coal were kept there. The place was accessible by a door from the outside, and through Hines' (the grocer's) premises. Hines was a tenant, and kept the key to the door outside. It is plain that, had the plaintiff made the least effort to examine the understructure of the shed, he could have done so. He presumed that this so-called 'agent' of the defendant had examined it, or knew its condition, because of his frequent appearance about the premises, and his supervision and repair of them when called upon by the tenants. This brings us down to the question as to whether this person was the agent of the defendant in that sense that would authorize him to bind the defendant by his representations, admitting for this purpose of the question that he did make representations which would bind him. The evidence shows that he did not let the premises,—another agent had charge of that,—but that he did make repairs whenever called upon to do so by the tenants. He was clearly the agent for that purpose, but he was not made the judge of whether repairs were necessary or not, nor was he authorized to assure the tenants that the premises were safe. They could call upon him to repair, and he would make the needed repairs; but, if he did not do so, they would have had the option of making the repairs (those within the rule named) or vacating the premises. His failure to make needed repairs which were called to his attention, or his assurance that they were not necessary, did not take away from the tenant the right to make the repairs himself or to vacate. His assurance that they were unnecessary was equivalent to a refusal to make them, and its effect cannot be explained further.

"Since no cause of action has been shown against the defendant on account of any breach of duty in his capacity strictly as landlord or lessor, it becomes important to determine whether, losing sight of that relation, except in so far as it incidentally forms a part of the subject, the representations made to the plaintiff were sufficient to sustain an action upon the ground of fraudulent deceit. Section 1709 of the Civil Code provides that 'one who willfully deceives another, with intent to induce him to alter his position to his injury or risk, is liable for any damage which he thereby suffers.' A 'deceit,' within the meaning of this section, is defined as 'the suggestion as a fact of that which is not true by one who does not believe it to be true.' If this be the ground relied upon, the evidence is wholly insufficient to show, taking the representations to have been false, that the person making them did not believe them to be true. 'The assertion as a fact of that which is not true by one who has no reasonable ground in believing it to be true' is also a sufficient deception to have an action upon. But in this case there is no evidence tending to show that the person making the representations had no reasonable ground for believing them to be true. We have seen that it was not the duty of the defendant or his agent any more than that it was the duty of the plaintiff to discover the defects in the shed, and it is nowhere shown that the so-called 'agent' of the defendant had any less reason to believe that the shed was safe, and to so declare, than the plaintiff had in relying on the representations. This observation also applies to the third subdivision of the section of the Civil Code (section 1710) defining deceit, namely: 'The suppression of a fact by one who is bound to disclose it, or who gives information of other facts which are likely to mislead for want of communication of that fact.' The evidence does not show that any such fact was suppressed, or that any fact in connection with the subject was communicated to the plaintiff which was calculated to throw him off his guard, or to shut off further investigation. To entitle him to rely upon the representations, it must have appeared that it was the duty of the defendant to possess the information inquired for, and, by reason of their relation, to impart it to the plaintiff. It does not appear that either of these requisites existed, and I hold that no case for deceit has been proven. I am also satisfied from a careful review of the evidence that the person making the representations was not authorized directly or by the conduct of the defendant to make them. He was not the agent of the defendant for any such purpose. It follows from the foregoing that the motion for a new trial must be granted, and it is so ordered. Garber, J."

The foregoing contains a correct exposition of the law applicable to the case, and is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court, and for the reasons given therein the order appealed from should be affirmed.

SULLIVAN v. SULLIVAN. (No. 15,054.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1893.)

CONTRACTS—SUFFICIENCY OF CONSIDERATION—EQUITABLE LIEN—WHEN ARISES.

1. The fact that plaintiff loaned decedent money with which to pay premiums on a policy of insurance on his life, which was payable to the latter's wife, gives plaintiff no lien on the policy, nor right of action against decedent's widow.

2. A debt owing by defendant's deceased husband to plaintiff, which is barred by limitations, is not such consideration as will support an agreement by her to pay the amount of the debt.

3. A promise by an executor to look among the papers of deceased for one belonging to plaintiff, and to surrender it to her, is not sufficient consideration for a contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Frank J. Sullivan, executor, against Margaret Sullivan. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. H. Jordan, for appellant. F. J. Sullivan and E. P. Cole, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover $854, the complaint being in two counts,—the first on a special written agreement, and the second for money had and received for the use of plaintiff. The plaintiff is the executor of the will of his father, John Sullivan, who died in July, 1882; and the defendant is the widow of Michael Sullivan, deceased, who was a brother of John Sullivan.

It is alleged in the complaint that "on the 10th day of January, 1890, the defendant, being indebted to the estate of John Sullivan in the sum of $854 for money before that time advanced by John Sullivan, in his lifetime, to pay certain premiums on a policy of insurance on the life of Michael Sullivan, issued by the New York Life Insurance Company, for the sum of $7,500, and payable to defendant, which said policy was in the possession of said John Sullivan, and was among his papers, and it requiring a great deal of time and labor to discover and find the same, and the said insurance company having refused to pay said policy unless the same was found and surrendered to it," the plaintiff and defendant entered into the following agreement: "This agreement witnesseth: Whereas, certain moneys amounting to over $854, United States gold coin, were paid by John Sullivan, in his lifetime, for and on account of a policy held by the New York Life Insurance Company, No. 138,638; and whereas, said company will not pay the amount of money due by the death of Michael Sullivan, brother of said John Sullivan, until said policy is surrendered; and whereas, Frank J. Sullivan, executor of the estate of John Sullivan, deceased, is willing to look up said policy, and surrender the same, provided Margaret Sullivan, the beneficiary in said policy named, will give said Frank J. Sullivan, executor, an order on said New York Life Insurance Company (A. G. Hawes, agent) for said sum of $854, conditioned on the finding and surrender of said policy to said insurance company, and guaranties the same: Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, hereby agree to the above terms, and A. G. Hawes, agent of the New York Life Insurance Company, hereby agrees to reserve said sum of $854 from the amount due Margaret Sullivan, beneficiary, said amount to be subject to the order of said Frank J. Sullivan, executor of the estate of John Sullivan, deceased. Witness our hands and seals this 10th day of January, A. D. 1890. Frank J. Sullivan, [Seal.] Executor of the Estate of John Sullivan, ^{her} Deceased. Margaret Sullivan. X [Seal.] ^{mark.}

Witness: P. J. G. Kenna. Witness to mark of Margaret Sullivan: P. J. Sullivan." It is then alleged that thereafter the plaintiff looked for, and after great difficulty found and delivered, the policy according to the agreement, and thereupon demanded of defendant an order on said insurance company for the said sum of $854, which she refused to give; but that she demanded and received from the insurance company the full sum of $7,500 due on said policy, and that she has ever since refused to pay plaintiff said sum of $854, or any part thereof. The answer of the defendant admits that the policy was in the custody of John Sullivan for safe-keeping immediately before his death, and that upon his death it passed into the possession of the plaintiff, as his executor; but avers that upon the death of her husband, Michael Sullivan, she was entitled to the possession thereof, and that it was the duty of the plaintiff to deliver it to her on her demand, without any compensation whatever; but that upon such demand the plaintiff had refused to deliver it to her, or even to look for it among the papers of his father's estate, except on the condition that she would sign the agreement above set out. She admits that she executed the agreement for the purpose of getting possession of the policy; but avers that there was no consideration whatever for the agreement on her part, and denies that on the 10th day of January, 1890, or at any other time, she was indebted to the estate of John Sullivan in any sum for money advanced by John Sullivan to pay premiums on said policy. The court found for the plaintiff upon all the issues of fact, and rendered judgment in his favor for the sum demanded. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The court found generally that the complaint was true and the answer false, and specially found as follows: "That defendant, at the time she signed said contract, knew of and admitted that John Sullivan had paid in his lifetime a large sum of money to keep alive the said policy of insurance for the benefit of defendant, and that $854 had not been repaid to the said John Sullivan, or to plaintiff; and that plaintiff and defendant, before said contract was executed, agreed and settled that the sum of $854 was the amount unpaid, and said defendant voluntarily offered and promised to pay the same as just and correct, to obtain possession of said policy, which was then in the possession of plaintiff, and which had been left with said John Sullivan in his lifetime by defendant and her deceased husband, Michael Sullivan; and thereupon said defendant executed the agreement set out in the complaint, and thereupon plaintiff, after much labor and trouble in searching for said policy, delivered the same to defendant." And, as a mixture of facts and conclusions of law, further found "that plaintiff, as the executor of John Sullivan, deceased, had a lien on said policy to secure the sum of $854, premiums advanced and paid by said John Sullivan for the benefit of defendant, and to keep said policy alive; and defendant was not entitled to the possession of said policy until said sum of $854 was paid." As contended by appellant, there is no evidence that John Sullivan, during his lifetime, advanced or paid any money as premiums on the policy, or on account of the policy, for or at the request of the defendant, or even with her knowledge or consent; and, consequently, no evidence that she was ever indebted to the estate of John Sullivan in any sum for the alleged advancements or payments on account of said policy. No such fact is recited in the agreement and there is no other evidence touching the question, except the testimony of the plaintiff, as follows: "Question. What was the indebtedness that you found Margaret Sullivan to owe? Answer. I cannot recall now the facts at all. As I take it, Margaret Sullivan was not the party at all. It was Michael Sullivan whose receipts were shown by her son; and I didn't know * * * that Michael Sullivan had paid John Sullivan anything until this young gentleman showed me the receipts, which I recognized to be in my father's handwriting, and we struck a balance,—that is, there was a certain amount of indebtedness that I claimed to be due from Michael Sullivan, and I showed him the receipt for money paid by John Sullivan, and then he showed me receipts for money which had been paid by Michael Sullivan to John Sullivan, and the difference between the receipts is what was stated in this memorandum of agreement. * * *

This statement of account was a matter of indebtedness between Michael Sullivan and John Sullivan prior to the death of John Sullivan. The estate of John Sullivan had paid nothing to Mrs. Margaret Sullivan, as far as I know. John Sullivan, in his lifetime, never paid anything for Mrs. Margaret Sullivan." This seems conclusive that the debt, if any debt there was, which the defendant agreed to pay, was a debt of her husband, Michael Sullivan, and not her debt. Nor is there anything in the complaint, findings of fact, or the evidence, to warrant the legal conclusion that the estate of John Sullivan ever had a lien of any kind on the policy of insurance. The plaintiff testified: "I don't know anything about the circumstances under which John came into possession of that policy. * * * It had never been assigned to John Sullivan." No copy of the policy is contained in the record, but it was admitted by both parties that it "contained the name of Margaret Sullivan as beneficiary." Nor does it appear when Michael Sullivan died; but it may fairly be inferred that he died in the latter part of the year 1889. If Michael Sullivan was indebted to John Sullivan for money advanced or paid in the lifetime of the latter, the debt was barred by the statute of limitations long before the execution of the agreement upon which this action is founded; and, conceding that this agreement contains a promise of the defendant to pay that debt, the remaining question is, was there any consideration for the promise? The plaintiff testified that "the consideration of this agreement is expressed in the agreement. The agreement expresses the consideration, and there were no other considerations than those expressed in the agreement." Yet, in his brief he contends that there was "a moral obligation, founded upon an antecedent valuable consideration," which constituted a good consideration for the agreement, though no such moral obligation founded upon an antecedent valuable consideration is expressed in the agreement. Nor did the court find, or the evidence tend to prove, any antecedent valuable or good consideration for the agreement. The defendant was under no kind of obligation to pay a debt of her deceased husband for which she had never before been liable, either as principal or surety, even though such debt had not been barred by the statute of limitations. Whart. Cont. §§ 494, 512-514; Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57. Surely not after the debt had been barred. Rosenberg v. Ford, 85 Cal. 610, 24 Pac. Rep. 779. And this is all that need be decided in this case. The only consideration expressed in the agreement, other than the alleged moral obligation, is plaintiff's promise to look for, find, and surrender the policy. This it was his duty to do, on demand of defendant, without compensation. After the maturity of the policy by the death of her husband, if not before, the defendant was entitled to the possession of it, unless the plaintiff, in his character of executor, had a lien on it. Whether the finding of the policy among the papers of the estate required more or less labor must have depended upon the degree of care or negligence with which the plaintiff had kept it, for which the defendant was not responsible. But it does not appear why a search of more than 10 minutes was necessary to find it. It is well settled that neither a promise to perform a duty, nor the performance of a duty, constitutes a consideration of a contract. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ROWE v. BLAKE et al. (No. 15,042.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1893.)
JUDGMENT—ENFORCEMENT BY ACTION—WHEN ALLOWED.

An action may be brought on a judgment entered in an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage, by which the indebtedness of defendant to plaintiff was ascertained and declared a lien on the mortgaged land, and a sale of the land to satisfy the judgment was ordered.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by William B. Rowe against P. H. Blake and others to enforce a judgment. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. H. Henderson, (James D. Thornton, Jr., of counsel,) for appellant. Wm. H. Fifield, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. December 31, 1879, judgment was entered in the late twenty-third district court of the city and county of San Francisco, in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants, in which the amount of the indebtedness of the defendant Blake to the plaintiff was ascertained and declared to be a lien upon certain lands, and directing a sale of the lands to satisfy the said indebtedness. This judgment was entered of record January 26, 1880, and on the 30th of December, 1884, the plaintiff brought the present action, and in the amended complaint therein alleges "that said judgment and decree has not been satisfied in whole or in part by execution or otherwise, and said property has not been sold, and said judgment and decree is still in full force and of binding effect, unmodified and unreversed;" and asks for a judgment that the lands therein described be sold to satisfy the amount of said indebtedness. The defendants demurred to this complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, their demurrer having been sustained, judgment was entered in their favor, from which the plaintiff has appealed. The amended complaint contains also averments of certain facts in excuse of the delay in prosecuting the action, some of which have supervened since the filing of the original complaint, and to which defendants have demurred on the ground of uncertainty. But, in the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to consider either these averments or the demurrers thereto. It is contended by the respondents that an action cannot be maintained in this state to enforce a judgment for the foreclosure of a mortgage; that the only remedy of the plaintiff in such judgment is its enforcement by a sale within five years from its entry; and that, failing to effect such sale, the judgment ceases to be operative. In Ames v. Hoy, 12 Cal. 11, it was held that an action could be maintained in this state upon a domestic judgment, and in Stuart v. Lander, 16 Cal. 373, it was held that such an action would lie, although the time within which an execution might issue had expired. Respondents seek to distinguish these cases from the present by the fact that they were brought to recover a specific sum of money that had been fixed by the prior judgment, whereas the present action is brought to procure a sale of the same property which the prior judgment directed to be sold. We are unable, however, to perceive any substantial reason for denying the right to maintain this action that would not be applicable in the other cases. There is certainly nothing in the opinion in Ames v. Hoy that warrants such distinction. It is there said: "The chief argument is that there is no necessity for a right of action on a judgment, inasmuch as execution can be issued to enforce the judgment already obtained, and no better or higher right or advantage is given to the subsequent judgment. But this is not true in fact, as in many cases it may be of advantage to obtain another judgment in order to save or prolong the lien." The Code of Civil Procedure defines a civil action as a proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, and declares that it arises out of an obligation by which one person is bound to do or not to do a certain thing. Sections 22, 25, 26, Code Civil Proc. Whether the judgment be regarded as the evidence of a contract between the parties or as the creation of an obligation upon the defendant, the correlative right of the plaintiff which is created thereby may be enforced by a civil action. By the former judgment it was determined that the plaintiff had the right to have the land therein described sold for the purpose of paying the indebtedness of the defendant Blake, and there was also created thereby an obligation upon the defendant to subject the land to a sale for the satisfaction of this indebtedness, and this obligation is as well defined and as binding upon the defendant as is the obligation upon a defendant to pay the amount of a money judgment recovered against him. The obligation upon a defendant to pay a specific sum of money out of his general estate, which an ordinary money judgment implies, differs in kind, rather than in nature, from the obligation to subject a specific parcel of land to the payment of a specific sum of money; and the reasons for enforcing this implied obligation or promise by an action are as cogent in the one case as in the other. The judgment herein sought to be enforced has nothing in its terms, nor is there anything in the statutes of this state, which limits the mode for its enforcement. The provisions of section 681, Code Civil Proc., limiting the issuance of an execution for the enforcement of a judgment to the term of five years, is but a limitation upon a certain mode for its enforcement, and does not purport to limit or qualify the right to its enforcement in any other mode. The right to bring an action upon a judgment or decree is recognized by that Code as the subject of a civil action, and may be brought within five years. Section 336, Id. The provisions of this section are applicable to domestic judgments, (Mason v. Cronise, 20 Cal. 211,) and the time thus limited begins to run from the entry of the judgment, (Trenouth v. Farrington, 54 Cal. 273.) Under the chancery practice, bills to carry decrees into execution were frequently entertained. Story, Eq. Pl. § 429; 2 Daniel, Ch. Pr. *1585. As in this state there is only one form of civil action for the enforcement of a private right, (Code Civil Proc., § 307,) the rules which, under a former system, prevented the enforcement of a decree in equity by a proceeding at law are inapplicable. The action of Ames v. Hoy was based upon a decree rendered in a suit in equity. The judgment is reversed.

CLEARY v. FOLGER. (No. 15,103.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1893.)

SALE OF LAND—RESCISSION—LAW OF THE CASE—NONSUIT—ESTOPPEL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where the vendee of land notifies the vendor that he cannot and will not complete the purchase, the vendor need not offer to perform, and by failing to do so does not authorize the vendee to consider the contract as rescinded, so that he can recover the payments made by him.

2. The fact that on an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit the court treats certain facts as established, does not make these facts the law of the case, so that defendant cannot on a new trial prove a different state of facts.

3. A judgment against plaintiff at the close of his evidence on the ground that he has not made out his case is a judgment of nonsuit, though part of the evidence introduced by him was a stipulation with defendant which provided that it could be used as evidence by either party.

4. The withdrawal of defendant's cross bill for specific performance would not estop him to claim damages under the prayer of his answer.

5. Allowing defendant to prove damages because of plaintiff's failure to complete his purchase is harmless error where he was not allowed to recoup for the reason that plaintiff did not make out his case, and there was therefore nothing against which defendant could recoup.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Michael Cleary against J. A. Folger, Jr., to recover an installment paid on a contract for the purchase of land. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. McFadden, for appellant. R. M. Fitzgerald and F. S. Stratton, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is the second appeal in this case. 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280. The former appeal was from a judgment of nonsuit, and the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for trial. In the lower court the defendant amended his answer, adding a claim for recoupment against the demand of plaintiff. On the last trial the defendant proved and the court found that before the time for performance arrived, according to the terms of the contract, plaintiff had notified defendant that he could not and would not complete the purchase, or pay anything further on account thereof. The court therefore held that defendant was excused from offering to perform, and had not made default, and had not, therefore, authorized plaintiff to consider the contract rescinded. The evidence justified this conclusion, and, of course, it follows that plaintiff cannot maintain his action.

The appellant contends that certain facts were considered by this court as established on the first appeal, and that it was error to allow such facts to be controverted at the trial, as they had become the law of the case. But in this contention appellant's counsel entirely misapprehends what is meant by the "law of the case." That doctrine is merely that when this court has decided that from the facts presented by the record certain legal conclusions follow, such legal conclusions must be accepted by the parties upon a retrial, if the same facts are again established. This will not prevent the parties, however, from proving an entirely different state of facts upon the retrial, and, in so far as the facts proven are different, the case will not be controlled by the first decision. As the first appeal was from a judgment of nonsuit, which this court held was erroneous, it would necessarily follow that the defendant should then have an opportunity of putting in his case. The former decision was merely that, taking plaintiff's evidence as true, it made a prima facie case for plaintiff. But plaintiff maintains that the first judgment was not a judgment of nonsuit, because, he says, plaintiff put in evidence a stipulation as to certain facts, in which it was stipulated that it could be used by either party. This, he says, constituted evidence for the defendant, which he claims would prevent a nonsuit, and necessitate a judgment on the merits. Conceding the rule to be as claimed, still there is nothing in this contention. All the evidence put in by plaintiff is available to defendant as evidence for him, and it makes no difference whether plaintiff proves his case by testimony or by admissions and stipulated facts. If, when he has put it in, it does not make out his case, a nonsuit is proper. The first judgment was strictly a judgment of nonsuit.

On the last trial defendant put in evidence tending to show damage because of the failure of plaintiff to complete the purchase. This was objected to by plaintiff, and is here assigned as error. Counsel says he cannot comprehend how damages can be recovered for the breach of a stipulation in a contract which has been canceled by mutual consent, or has been abandoned by both parties. How can there be a right of action upon a contract which has become nonexistent, and when, because it has become nonexistent, payments made upon it are without consideration, and may, therefore, be recovered as money had and received to the use of the payor? Of course, under such circumstances, no such action could be maintained, and I think it hardly fair to say that it has ever been so held in any authoritative decision. No such claim was asserted on the former appeal, and no such question was before the court. The remarks alluded to were evidently made in momentary forgetfulness of the main idea advanced in the opinion, to wit, that the contract had been abandoned and canceled. In none of the subsequent cases in which the suggestion is cited with apparent approval was any such question involved, and all that is said is plainly obiter. See Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749; Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 Pac. Rep. 429; Phelps v. Brown, 95 Cal. 572, 30 Pac. Rep. 774. In each of these cases the citation is rather to the doctrine, coupled with the statement in regard to recoupment, to the effect that, when both parties have failed to perform the contract, either may elect to consider it rescinded and recover moneys paid upon it. But if such be the law of this case, it would justify the admission of the evidence complained of, unless there be other grounds of objection. Plaintiff claims that such ground there is, because the defendant had by consent dismissed a cross complaint, in which he asked for specific performance of the contract, each party paying his costs; and he cites as authority for the proposition Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542, and Parnell v. Hahn, 61 Cal. 131. Notwithstanding these authorities, I think it is at least doubtful whether the mere withdrawal of the claim to equitable relief under the circumstances can operate as an estoppel upon defendant's right to claim damages. It left defendant still an answer in which he claimed damages, to wit, the installment paid. In one point of view the decision may be understood as holding that, while defendant cannot retain the installment as liquidated damages, he may retain sufficient to cover actual damage. But defendant did not recover any damage under this plea, the court holding that the agreement had not been canceled or abandoned, and that, therefore, plaintiff could not recover the installment paid, and there was, therefore, nothing against which a recoupment could be made. It would seem to follow that before plaintiff can complain of this evidence as injurious error he must show his right to recover the money he had paid. As we have seen, he did not make out such a case, and therefore, whether the ruling were right or wrong, he was not injured. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

COLTON LAND & WATER CO. v. SWARTZ et al. (No. 19,131.)

JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—EFFECT OF APPEAL—RECORDED MAP AS EVIDENCE—LOCATION OF LAND.

1. Where a judgment roll offered in evidence contains two judgments, the last in point of time will be treated as the true and final judgment, and the prior judgment will not be considered as forming part of the roll so as to affect its admissibility.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. § 942, providing that an appeal does not stay the execution of a judgment unless an undertaking is given as therein provided, one claiming under an execution sale cannot be deprived of the right to use the judgment roll as evidence in support of his title during the pendency of an appeal from the judgment, unless such undertaking was given.

3. The map of an "addition," which is of record in the office of the county recorder, is not inadmissible in evidence because not acknowledged.

4. The fact that a tract of land is within the limits of a city may be shown by oral testimony.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Ejectment by the Colton Land & Water Company against Daniel Swartz and others. From a judgment for defendants, and order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. R. Gray, for appellant. Frank F. Oster, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Ejectment for a lot of land in the city of Colton. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed. The title of the defendants is derived from the plaintiff through a sale under an execution issued upon a judgment against it in favor of the San Bernardino National Bank, rendered by the superior court of San Bernardino county; and, unless the judgment under which that sale was had is valid, the judgment herein should have been in favor of the plaintiff. The appellant contends that the superior court had no jurisdiction to render the judgment under which the sale was had, and that the execution issued thereon and the sale by virtue thereof were void and ineffective to transfer any title to the property sold. The action of the San Bernardino National Bank against the present plaintiff was commenced March 27, 1889, and, a demurrer to the complaint therein having been overruled, judgment was ordered in favor of the plaintiff as asked in the complaint, and entered May 29, 1889. Subsequently the plaintiff herein filed an answer to the complaint, and upon the issues presented by its answer a trial was had, and findings filed by the court, upon which judgment was entered November 21, 1889. Upon this judgment an execution was issued, and by virtue of a sale thereunder is derived whatever title the defendants have to the demanded premises. When this judgment roll was offered in evidence the appellant objected to its introduction, upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and now urges that the court erred in admitting it, and that it is not entitled to be considered as evidence in establishing the transfer of title to the land, for the reason that the judgment of May 29th was the final judgment in the case, and that, upon its entry, the court lost jurisdiction to enter any other judgment in the action, so long as that remained upon its record; and that, inasmuch as there was no evidence introduced showing that it had been vacated or set aside, the judgment of November 21st was void, and not the basis of an execution or sale.

1. A judgment roll is defined in section 670, Code Civil Proc., and consists of the papers therein enumerated. This "roll" does not depend upon the fact that the clerk has fastened these papers together, nor do any other papers which the clerk may have joined with those which the statute declares shall constitute the judgment roll become a part of such roll by reason of having been so joined. The papers thus designated as forming the judgment roll are those which are elsewhere mentioned in the Code as a part of the proceedings culminating in the judgment. The "judgment," of which a copy is to be included in the "roll," is the judgment defined in section 577, Code Civil Proc., as "the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding;" and, as there can be but one "final determination" in an action, it follows that there can be but one judgment in the judgment roll, and that if during the proceedings in an action a judgment shall be set aside, and another one thereafter entered, only this last judgment can form a part of the judgment roll, just as, when the complaint or answer is amended, only the amended pleadings or those upon which the cause was tried form the "pleadings" which are a part of the judgment roll. In Paige v. Roeding, 96 Cal. 388, 31 Pac. Rep. 264, the plaintiff appealed from the judgment, and brought up in the judgment roll a judgment that had been entered in the records of the court. The respondents caused to be certified to this court a judgment that had been previously entered in the same cause, and claimed that this prior judgment was the only one that could be considered. It was held, however, that the statute clearly contemplates that there shall be but one judgment in a judgment roll, and that, if two are found therein, the last in point of time is the only one which can be considered as a part thereof. When, therefore, the defendants offered in evidence "the judgment roll" in the action of the San Bernardino National Bank against the plaintiff herein, as is stated in the statement on motion for a new trial, it must be assumed that the judgment roll so offered consisted of only the papers which are designated by the statute as constituting the judgment roll; and also that, if there were any other papers bound up with that, they were not considered by the court as forming a part of said roll, and consequently could not impair its admissibility in evidence. Neither does the fact, found by the court, that a judgment between the parties had been previously rendered in the same action, impair the effect of this judgment, which forms a part of the judgment roll. If upon a direct appeal the fact that a prior judgment does not impair the efficiency of the judgment appealed from, (Paige v. Roeding, supra,) much less can such prior judgment be invoked to impeach a subsequent judgment when the same is collaterally attacked. The court had jurisdiction of the parties to the action and of the subject-matter, and upon a collateral attack every presumption will be indulged in support of its judgment. If necessary, therefore, it will be assumed that the former judgment was vacated by consent of the parties, and that an order showing such consent and the vacating of the judgment appears in the minutes of the court. Any entry in the minutes vacating the judgment, whether by consent of the parties or upon an order of the court after a new trial had been granted, would form no part of the judgment roll, and it was not necessary to offer any evidence to show that the former judgment had been annulled. Carpentier v. Oakland, 30 Cal. 439; Drake v. Duenick, 45 Cal. 455; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. Rep. 1074; Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 560, 27 Pac. Rep. 411. "Circumstances may have arisen wherein the trial court would have been justified under the law in setting aside the first findings and judgment, and in filing the second findings and judgment; and, with no showing to the contrary, we must assume that such circumstances did arise." Paige v. Roeding, 96 Cal. 391, 31 Pac. Rep. 264.

2. The sale under this judgment was made December 23, 1889, and the sheriff's deed issued to the purchaser June 24, 1890. On the 21st of November, 1890, the plaintiff herein appealed from the judgment of November 21, 1889, in favor of the San Bernardino National Bank, and now contends that by virtue of such appeal the judgment was not admissible in evidence. No such objection, however, was made at the trial, and, as it does not appear that the fact of an appeal from the judgment had been shown at the time when the judgment was offered in evidence, it was not embraced in the objection that the judgment roll was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The judgment was not offered as evidence of any issue in the case, or for the purpose of showing that the matters in controversy in this action had been determined in another action, but as a collateral fact in support of the execution, and for the purpose of showing that at the time the execution under which the sale was made issued a judgment had been rendered, and was then in force. Section 681, Code Civil Proc., provides that an execution may be issued for the enforcement of a judgment at any time within five years after its entry; and section 942 provides that an appeal does not stay the execution of the judgment, except upon giving the undertaking therein provided for. For the purpose of recovering possession of the property purchased at a sale under such execution it is necessary to introduce in evidence the judgment as the basis of the execution, and if the enforcement of the judgment has not been stayed the fact that an appeal therefrom has been taken does not prevent the judgment from being received in evidence and considered.

3. The objection that the deed from the San Bernardino National Bank (the purchaser at the execution sale) to the defendant Swartz does not show upon its face that the grantor was a corporation does not deserve any consideration. If in fact the grantor was a corporation, the proper execution of the deed to the grantee would transfer all its title to the land therein described; and if it was not a corporation, any statement in the deed that it was would not make it such. This objection to the introduction of the deed was not taken at the trial, the only objection being that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; and it is well settled that under this general objection a party cannot upon appeal urge an objection which is merely formal or special, and which, if it had been pointed out when the evidence was offered, might have been obviated. Crocker v. Carpenter, (Cal.) 33 Pac. Rep. 271. The court, in finding 6, finds that the San Bernardino National Bank was a corporation, and the seal affixed to the deed was evidence that it was a corporate act. Burnett v. Lyford, 93 Cal. 117, 28 Pac. Rep. 855. If the plaintiff would claim as a fact that the grantor was not a corporation, it was incumbent upon it either to make the objection when the deed was offered in evidence, or to offer evidence to that effect. The recitals in the judgment roll and in the sheriff's deed, as well as the identity of the name of the grantee in the sheriff's deed with that of the grantor in the deed offered in evidence, together with the recital in such deed that the property was the same as that conveyed by the sheriff, giving its place of record, supports the finding that the grantor was a corporation.

4. The court did not err in receiving in evidence the map of Colton addition, which was produced from the county recorder's office. The plaintiff, in its complaint, described the land sued for as the north half of block No. 36, "as designated on a map of Colton addition, filed in the office of the recorder of said county on or about the 12th day of October, 1887, at the request of P. A. Raynor." The property conveyed by the sheriff is described as the north half of block 36, Colton addition, a plat or map of which addition "is of record in the office of the county recorder of San Bernardino county, state of California;" and the map offered in evidence was shown to be a map of Colton addition, which appears in volume 6, p. 10, Book of Maps, Records of San Bernardino County, and purported to have been recorded on the 12th day of October, 1887, at the request of P. A. Raynor. The objection that the map was not acknowledged so as to entitle it to record is without merit. A map is not an "instrument" which affects the title or possession of real property, within the meaning of the recording act, (Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564;) nor is it an instrument which is to be executed by the party who prepares it, (Code Civil Proc. § 1933,) or of which an execution can be acknowledged. There is no provision in the statute which requires a map or plat to be recorded in the county recorder's office, but section 123 of the county government act (St. 1883, p. 325) declares that the recorder "must keep all books, records, maps, and papers deposited in his office;" and a map thus deposited within the recorder's office is properly referred to in an instrument of conveyance as being "of record" therein, and may be received in evidence, even though it be not acknowledged. It is only requisite to offer evidence sufficient to connect the map referred to with the map produced, as in the case of a map produced from any other custody.

TOWN OF SANTA MONICA v. ECKERT
et al. (No. 19,156.)

WRIT OF PROHIBITION—EFFECT OF REFUSAL—APPEAL—JURISDICTION.

1. Where a writ of prohibition is asked for to restrain a court from proceeding on the ground that it has no jurisdiction, the denial of the writ, without any decision on such question, does not take away the right to have it considered on writ of review.

2. An appeal cannot be considered where the amount in controversy, as shown by the ad damnum clause of the complaint, is less than the jurisdictional amount of the supreme court, and the "legality" of the license tax for which the action is brought is not questioned, but the contention is that a license already obtained covered the premises.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by the town of Santa Monica against Robert Eckert and others. From a judgment of the superior court reversing a judgment for defendants, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Thomas B. Brown, for appellants. Richard R. Tanner, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by the town of Santa Monica, a municipal corporation of the sixth class, in the recorder's court, to recover the amount of a license alleged to be due from the defendants for keeping a saloon, the amount of the license fee fixed by the ordinance being $300. In the complaint, plaintiff alleged the amount required to be paid to be $300, but remitted all in excess of $299.99, for the avowed purpose of giving the recorder's court jurisdiction. Upon the trial in that court defendants had judgment, from which the plaintiff appealed to the superior court, and the trial in that court resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for said sum of $299.99, and costs, from which judgment, and an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal.

The point principally relied upon by appellants for a reversal is that the superior court had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, because, as they contend, the recorder's court from which the appeal was taken had no jurisdiction. This contention is based on the fact that the ordinance of the town of Santa Monica fixed the amount of the license at $300, a sum beyond the jurisdiction of that court, and that plaintiff could not legally remit any portion of that sum for the purpose of giving jurisdiction. After the appeal was taken to the superior court, the defendants applied to this court for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court from proceeding in the cause, upon the ground that it had no jurisdiction. The writ was denied, and respondent contends that the denial of the writ was an adjudication that the superior court had jurisdiction of the case brought into it by appeal. But that conclusion does not follow. It will not issue where there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Code Civil Proc. § 1103. In this case, if the superior court had jurisdiction, there could be no appeal from its judgment, as the amount demanded was less than $300; but there was still left an adequate remedy by a writ of review. The writ of prohibition will not ordinarily issue where certiorari will lie, unless it appears that the applicant for the writ will necessarily be injured if the court sought to be prohibited is permitted to proceed at all, as that court may, before final judgment, discover its want of jurisdiction, and dismiss its proceedings; while, if it should proceed to final judgment, the party is not injured by the entry of a void judgment, and proceedings to enforce such judgment may be prevented, and the judgment declared void under a writ of review. The mere denial of the writ of prohibition, where the question of jurisdiction, as in this case, was not decided, does not take away the right to a writ of review. Defendants' answer raised no question as to the "legality" of the license tax, but only the question of their liability to pay it, upon the ground that they already had a license which covered both bars, and the answer was not verified, as required by section 838, Code Civil Proc. Williams v. McCartney, 69 Cal. 556, 11 Pac. Rep. 186. As the legality of the license tax was not involved, and the amount in controversy, as shown by the ad damnum clause of the complaint, is less than $300, this court has not jurisdiction of the appeal, and therefore cannot consider the question of the jurisdiction of either of the courts below. The appeal herein should be dismissed.

RORKE v. SAN FRANCISCO STOCK & EXCHANGE BOARD. (No. 14,981.)

SAN FRANCISCO STOCK EXCHANGE — FAILURE OF MEMBER TO PAY DEBTS — SUSPENSION — PROCEDURE — TIME OF PRESENTING CLAIM BY CREDITOR — ARBITRATION COMMITTEE.

1. The constitution and by-laws of a stock exchange provide that any member failing to meet his engagements shall be suspended; that if he does not settle within six months his seat shall be sold for the payment of creditors; that the board will take no cognizance of contracts that remain unsettled five days after due, "unless continued by mutual consent;" and that where a member fails to comply with his stock contracts his creditors must report said default to the president of the board within 48 hours. No claim, unless so reported, shall ever after be recognized or enforced by the board. Held, that the 48-hour limitation applies only to contracts for purchase or sale of stocks in the board, and not to open accounts, where stocks are carried for the debtor for months, assessments paid thereon, interest charged, and dividends credited to the account, etc.

2. Such constitution and by-laws also provide that all differences as to claims between members shall be referred by the president, unless otherwise ordered, to committees for arbitration, which shall report in writing within 15 days after their appointment, and their report shall stand as the award of the board. Held that, though there was no dispute between the parties to such account, it was properly referred to such committee for "investigation" or "settlement."

3. In a proceeding by such debtor to compel the board to restore him to membership from which he had been suspended, it appeared that on his failure to pay the account the creditor requested a committee of investigation; that two days thereafter the committee reported the amount of the indebtedness; that two days afterwards such creditor reported the claim unpaid; that such member was then suspended; and that six months thereafter, the claim remaining unpaid, his seat or membership in the board was sold to pay his debts. Held, that such member was properly suspended, and was not entitled to be restored to membership.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Application by Benjamin B. Rorke for a writ of mandate to compel the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board to restore him to membership therein. From a judgment in favor of such board, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, Rorke appeals. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellant. Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The proceeding in the court below was had under an alternative writ of mandate, issued on the application of appellant to the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, (an unincorporated association,) commanding it to restore the applicant, Benjamin B. Rorke, to membership in said association, and to all the rights, privileges, and immunities pertaining thereto, or that it show cause, etc., why it had not done so. Respondent appeared and showed cause, whereupon a trial was had, and judgment rendered in favor of the association. Rorke moved for a new trial. His motion therefor was denied, and he prosecutes this appeal from the order.

The San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board is a voluntary association of individuals, and as such is, and for over 20 years has been, engaged in the business of buying and selling stocks in the city and county of San Francisco, and has adopted and is governed by certain articles of agreement known as its "constitution and by-laws," which have been agreed to and subscribed by each and all of its members, the appellant herein included. Plaintiff was a member of the board, as were S. B. Wakefield and A. W. Foster, doing business under the firm name of S. B. Wakefield & Co. On the 29th day of July 1885, plaintiff was suspended from membership of respondent, and on the 31st day of January, 1886, more than six months having elapsed, and he not having been restored, his membership or "right to a seat in the board," as it is termed, is claimed to have reverted to the board, and was by it sold to meet his liabilities to Wakefield & Co. and other members of the board, to whom he was indebted. Plaintiff claims that the act of defendant in depriving him of membership was illegal, and in contravention of its constitution and by-laws. Prior to July, 1883, plaintiff herein had various transactions with Wakefield & Co. in buying and selling stocks, and Wakefield & Co. had paid out for plaintiff various sums of money in purchasing and carrying for him stocks, so that on said last-mentioned day plaintiff was indebted to the firm in the sum of $5,137.42, which he promised but failed to pay. On the 25th day of July, 1885, there was due and owing to Wakefield & Co. from the plaintiff $4,994.92, which, as the court found, had been by mutual consent of the parties continued from the time the same accrued up to the last-mentioned date. On said 25th day of July, 1885, the said firm of S. B. Wakefield & Co. presented to the president of defendant a written request for a committee to investigate the matter in dispute between them and the plaintiff herein, and on said day the vice president of defendant (said Wakefield being president) appointed a committee of three to investigate and report. Such action was had that the committee reported to defendant on the 27th day of July, 1885, that plaintiff was indebted to Wakefield & Co. in the sum of $4,994.92. This report was unanimously adopted by defendant. On the 29th day of July, Wakefield & Co. reported the delinquency of plaintiff to the board, and thereupon plaintiff was suspended from his seat or membership in the said board.

The constitution and by-laws of defendant are in evidence in the case. They are too voluminous to be copied at length, and, except those under which the contention here arises, may be referred to as follows: Any member failing to meet his engagements in the board shall be suspended until he has settled with his creditors. If he settles within six months he may be restored by a two-thirds vote. If he does not settle in six months his seat is to be sold, and proceeds applied to payment of his creditors, as therein provided. The seat and privileges of every member is a continuing security to all members with whom he may deal, for the performance of his contracts and the fulfillment of his engagements. The following articles of the by-laws are given at length: Article 17: "Limitation of Contracts. This board will take no cognizance of contracts that remain unsettled five days after they become due, unless continued by mutual consent." Article 25: "Default must be reported within forty-eight hours, and claim filed within thirty days thereafter. In cases where a member of the board shall fail to comply with his stock contracts it shall be the duty of his creditors to report said default to the president of the board within forty-eight hours after said defalcation becomes known to them. No claim or contract, unless so reported, shall ever after be recognized or enforced by this board. During the suspension of a member no such report shall be required. All claims of members and nonmembers against said delinquent member must be filed with the secretary of the board within thirty days after he has been reported, and must be accompanied by a detailed statement of the account. No claims, unless so filed, shall ever after be recognized or enforced by this board." Article 49: "Investigation of Claim by Arbitrating Committees. All differences, investigations of claims, or settlement of accounts between members, or between members and nonmembers, shall be referred by the president, unless otherwise ordered, to committees of arbitration, consisting of at least three members. Said committees shall report in writing, within fifteen days from date of appointment, unless further time be granted; and their report, if adopted, shall stand as the award of the board."

The contention of appellant is that by failing to report the default of Rorke to the board within 48 hours after it became known to them, as provided by section 25 of the by-laws, Wakefield & Co. lost all right to recognition, and the board had no authority to suspend appellant. Counsel for respondent, on the other hand, claim that section 25 relates to contracts entered into for the purchase or sale of stocks in the board, the price agreed to be paid therefor, the delivery and payment for stocks so purchased, (questions, most of which are to be solved by reference to the records of the board; questions which can be more readily solved while transactions are fresh in the memory of the parties in interest and members, and when mistakes, if any, can be more certainly corrected,) and that it has no application, and was not intended to apply, to cases like the present, where stocks were carried for appellant for months, assessments paid thereon, interest charged up, and dividends, if any, credited to the account, etc., to what in fact was an open and running account between Wakefield & Co., as brokers, and appellant, who, while himself a broker, and liable as such, was a customer of Wakefield & Co., at least to this extent. So long as Wakefield & Co. and appellant by mutual consent permitted the open account to run, there was no default on the part of appellant to be reported within the meaning of article 25 of the by-laws. It was only upon the ascertainment of the balance due by the committee of arbitration, and a failure to meet it, that the default occurred. The court below evidently did not regard section 25 as having any application to transactions of the character involved here. In this, I am of opinion, it was correct. "In cases where a member of the board shall fail to comply with his stock contracts, it shall be the duty," etc. The section was evidently intended to meet cases in which the member has contracted as a broker in the board to purchase or sell and deliver stocks; contracts which are within the knowledge and jurisdiction of the board and its members. The transaction between appellant and Wakefield & Co. commenced by the employment of appellant by Wakefield & Co. to purchase and sell stocks for them in the board on a commission, during which employment he purchased on his own account certain stocks for which the firm paid, and which, in the language of the guild, they carried for him, and which in July, 1885, culminated in an indebtedness on his part for the sum of $4,994.92. Thereupon Wakefield & Co. called for arbitrators, under article 49 of the by-laws, who reported the indebtedness as above stated, and within two days thereafter they reported his delinquency.

The contention of appellant is that there was no dispute between the parties to settle, and hence no occasion for a committee of arbitration. The answer is that section 49 provided not only for "differences" between parties, but for an "investigation of claims or settlement of accounts," and is the mode by which the board becomes informed of the amount due and owing by its members, and is the method adopted by which the debtor may have a hearing, and the board obtain authentic knowledge upon which to base its subsequent action. It is not clear, however, that there was no dispute. Foster, the surviving partner of Wakefield & Co., who was a witness, says: "I presented our claim against Rorke to the committee for consideration. Rorke was present, and his protest was that the account was wrong; that the figures were not correct; that something was the matter with the account. The committee then adjourned for two days. At the second session he did not have any evidence that the account was wrong." This looks very much like a dispute between the parties as to the balance due on the account. The court found that the indebtedness of appellant to Wakefield & Co. was by their mutual consent continued from the time the same accrued until reported, etc. The whole course of dealing between the parties indicates this. Appellant testified that he expected to pay it off by securing commissions from the firm, as he had theretofore done. The whole proceeding whereby appellant was suspended from his seat or membership in the board, and his right thereto sold to satisfy the lien thereon for debts contracted by him as a member, seems to have been in obedience to the constitution and by-laws of the association; and, having failed for six months to settle up the claims against him, and seek restitution, his membership in defendant ceased, and all his rights appertaining thereto were extinguished. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

CLARKE v. MOTT et al. (No. 15,153.)

INSOLVENCY—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that a debtor, when called on to pay his notes when due, replied that he was unable to pay them; that he had tried to raise the money, but could not,—warrants a finding that he was insolvent.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Petition of C. W. Mott and others to have Alfred Clarke adjudged an insolvent debtor. From an order so adjudging him, he appeals. Affirmed.

Witnesses Hutton and Stewart both testified that, when demand was made on Clarke for the payment of certain of his notes, he replied that he was unable to pay them; that he had tried to raise the money, and was unable to do so.

Alfred Clarke, in pro. per., (Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, of counsel,) for appellant. Wilson & McCutcheon, Page & Eells, W. T. Baggett, and Warren Olney, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by Alfred Clarke from an order of the superior court adjudging him to be an insolvent debtor. We can discover from the record only two points legitimately before us: (1) Did the court err in overruling the demurrer to the petition? And (2) does the evidence warrant the finding of appellant's insolvency? As to the first point, appellant has pointed out no defect in the petition, and we see none. As to the second point, the facts testified to by the witnesses Hutton and Stewart clearly show the insolvency, not considering the 19 attachments. The order appealed from is affirmed.

MENDENHALL v. ROSE. (No. 15,058.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1893.)

REAL-ESTATE AGENT—ACTION FOR COMMISSIONS—WRITTEN CONTRACT—SUFFICIENCY—EVIDENCE.

1. R. wrote a broker that, "if there is any possibility of selling both or either piece of property, see if you can make it this week. * * * Also V. told me S. told him he had a man who wanted Hoza Bernal's place. * * * You had better see S., and get hold of the buyer, * * * for if V. finds out who it is he is bound to spoil the sale. * * * In case you make a sale of the 29½ acre piece," a certain mortgage can remain on the place for one year. "Also the Ratke place, there can be" a mortgage for one year or longer. Held, that such letter did not authorize such broker to sell real estate situate in the county of A., "generally known as the 'Jose Reyes Bernal Rancho,'" or any other real estate, and was inadmissible in an action by such broker against R. for services in selling such real estate, under Civil Code, § 1624, subd. 6, which requires agreements authorizing or employing brokers to sell real estate for compensation to be in writing.

2. Such letter was not rendered admissible by evidence by plaintiff which tended only to apply the description in the complaint to a particular one of Jose Bernal's several tracts, and did not show which one of such several tracts was intended by the expression "Hoza Bernal's place," in such letter.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by William W. Mendenhall against Jason A. Rose to recover on a written contract for services rendered in the sale of certain real property. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

D. M. Conner and Welles Whitmore, for appellant. Lindley & Eickhoff, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. It is alleged in the complaint in this action that by a written contract the defendant authorized and employed the plaintiff as his agent and broker to sell certain real property situate in the county of Alameda, "generally known as the 'Jose Reyes Bernal Rancho,'" and agreed to pay plaintiff for his services as such agent and broker what said services were reasonably worth. That thereafter "plaintiff found and secured for defendant a purchaser at a price satisfactory to defendant of the real property aforesaid, to whom said defendant sold said property." That the services so rendered by plaintiff for defendant were reasonably worth the sum of $950, no part of which has been paid, and for which he prays judgment. The defendant answered, specifically denying the alleged contract, authorization, and employment, and also denying the alleged services. The court found the facts as alleged by plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

To prove the alleged authorization and employment, the plaintiff offered in evidence the following letter: "Pleasanton, Nov. 30, 1887. W. Mendenhall, Esq.—Dear Sir: If there is any possibility of selling both or either piece of property, see if you can make it this week. If it is not sold this week, by the first of next week I will have to buy it right out, or let it slide. Also Mr. Vandervoort told me Mr. Saulsbury told him he had a man who wanted Hoza Bernal's place. I don't think there is any truth in it, but if there is you had better see Mr. Saulsbury, and get hold of the buyer, and keep hold of him; for if Vandervoort finds out who it is he is bound to spoil the sale. This letter is private, and you will do me the favor to burn it as soon as you read it. In case you make a sale of the 29½ acre piece, there can be $3,000 or $4,000 mortgage remain on the place for one year. Also the Ratke place, there can be $5,000 mortgage for one year or longer if the buyer or buyers so desire. Yours, truly, J. A. Rose." Written in lead pencil on reverse: "P. S. There is no hurry about selling Bernal's for a week or two. Sell the others first, if possible. R." To the introduction of this letter the defendant objected, on the grounds that it is not such an agreement in writing authorizing or employing plaintiff to sell real estate as is required by the sixth subdivision of section 1624 of the Civil Code;¹ that it does not contain a description of the real estate which plaintiff was authorized to sell, nor refer to any other paper or writing containing such description; and that it is irrelevant, and does not tend to prove any allegation of the complaint. The court overruled defendant's objection, and admitted the letter as evidence, to which ruling the defendant excepted, and contends here that it was error.

I think defendant's objection should have been sustained, and, as this letter was the only written evidence offered of the authority or employment of plaintiff, the error in admitting it must be presumed to have been prejudicial to the defendant. The letter does not purport to authorize or employ the plaintiff to sell the real estate described by name ("Jose Reyes Bernal Rancho") in the complaint, or any other real estate; nor does it admit or acknowledge any prior authorization or employment to sell any real estate; nor does it purport to authorize a sale of "Hoza Bernal's place," wherever and whatever that may be; nor can authority from defendant to sell Jose Bernal's place be inferred from the letter, since such an inference involves the legal absurdity that defendant authorized and employed plaintiff to sell Bernal's property. The only object of the letter, to be inferred from its language, was to hurry a sale of the "29½" acre place and the "Ratke place," from which the only legitimate inference is that defendant was interested in the sale of those, and understood that plaintiff had authority to sell them; nothing more. But from the merely incidental reference to "Hoza [Jose] Bernal's place" it cannot be inferred that defendant was interested in or had authorized the sale of that place. The language of the letter is perfectly consistent with a total want of the authority and employment alleged in the complaint. Besides, the letter contains no description of "Hoza Bernal's place," even by name, by which it could have been identified as the land described in the complaint as "certain real property situate in the said county of Alameda, (generally known as the 'Jose Reyes Bernal Rancho,')" without proving at least that Jose Bernal owned only one place, that this one place was situate in the county of Alameda, and was generally known as the "Jose Reyes Bernal Rancho." The evidence on the part of plaintiff to identify "Hoza [Jose] Bernal's place" as the real estate described in the complaint was a failure. The plaintiff himself testified: "The land I have been testifying about is known as the 'Jose Reyes Bernal Rancho.' Jose Reyes Bernal had other tracts of land in this immediate neighborhood. I don't know whether this land is a portion of Augustine Bernal's ranch or not. I knew Bernal had other tracts of land in Alameda county. I don't know that they were all spoken of generally as the 'Jose Reyes Bernal Rancho,' 'Bernal Land,' or 'Bernal's Place.'" He lived in this place, and this place was known by that name. Always spoken to me that way by Rose and other people. I have learned since that he did have other places. I did not know it at that time. I know this was called the 'Jose Bernal Place,' because this was his place of residence. When you spoke of it that way, everybody knew what you meant. It was the largest tract he had. I have heard this place called the 'Jose Reyes Bernal Rancho' by different parties for a good while. Mr. Rose called it by that name. At that time Jose Bernal resided on the place." This testimony tends only to apply the description in the complaint to a particular one of Jose Bernal's several tracts, but has not the slightest tendency to remove the ambiguity of the letter. It still remains wholly uncertain which one of Jose Bernal's tracts was intended by the expression "Hoza Bernal's place;" and what the parties intended by that expression could not have been proved directly by parol evidence, but only indirectly by evidence of such extraneous facts as would remove the uncertainty and ambiguity as above indicated. Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 20 Pac. Rep. 386; Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 529, 21 Pac. Rep. 179. For the error of admitting in evidence the letter of the defendant I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

2. One claiming exemption from the payment of tolls on a turnpike road is not entitled to an injunction to restrain interference by the turnpike company with his use of the road, Stanly, Stoney & Hayes, for appellants. W. H. Barrows and J. F. Wendell, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from a judgment and order refusing a new trial. The action was brought to obtain an injunction perpetually enjoining and restraining defendants from asking, demanding, or collecting any toll for or on account of the use of the toll road of the corporate defendant as a highway, or in any way interfering with such use either by the plaintiff, his grantees, or by his or their agents, tenants, or employees, or any other person using the road for the purposes or business of plaintiff's ranch, and for $100 damages. Plaintiff avers that he is the owner of the Habishaw ranch, in Sonoma county, which land in 1874 was owned by one Habishaw. That in November of that year the corporation defendant entered into an agreement with Habishaw, whereby Habishaw agreed to grant it a right of way over said ranch for its toll road, in consideration of a perpetual right to use said road free of toll as a highway for all purposes of said ranch; and said defendant agreed with Habishaw, as the owner of said ranch, that it would allow him, his grantees and all of his or their agents, tenants, and employees, and all other persons engaged in any business connected with said ranch, without interruption, to use said road as a highway for all purposes and business connected with said ranch for all time without payment of toll. In pursuance of the agreement, Habishaw executed a deed which he believed conveyed to the corporation such right of way. That the corporation accepted the deed, took possession of the right of way, and has ever since used and enjoyed the same. That said Habishaw and his tenants, servants, etc., used the road free of toll. Plaintiff purchased the land from Habishaw in 1877, having, before he completed his purchase, inquired of the corporate defendant whether such agreement and right existed in Habishaw, and whether, if he purchased the land, such right and privilege would pass to him as appurtenant to the land. That said defendant, after full knowledge of plaintiff's intended purchase and his reasons for making the inquiry, and that he would not complete the purchase unless such right existed and would pass to him as appurtenant to the land, affirmed that such right existed, and would pass with the land. That he thereupon completed the purchase, paying a large consideration for the land. Plaintiff claims that the alleged right to use the road free of toll is an easement in defendant's road, and that it is appurtenant to the land. Appellants contend that the alleged facts do not show that plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, and, as his claim for damage is less than $300, the superior court had no jurisdiction.

1. The first question is, is plaintiff's alleged right an easement? for, if it is not, the court had no jurisdiction to issue the injunction on that ground. In Washburn on Easements (page 3) it is said: "The essential qualities of easements are these: (1) They are incorporeal. (2) They are imposed on corporeal property, and not upon the owner thereof. (3) They convey no right to a participation in the profits arising from such property. (4) They are imposed for the benefit of corporeal property. And (5) there must be two distinct tenements,—the dominant, to which the right belongs, and the servient, upon which the obligation rests." The defendant corporation had only an easement in the road. The right to take toll is called an "easement." Civil Code, § 802. In Wood v. Turnpike Co., 24 Cal. 475, it was said: "The road of the turnpike company is not the private property of the company, but belongs to the public, and all the interest the company has in it is the right and power to collect tolls on the line of the road as a compensation for building it. Every traveler has the same right to use the road of a turnpike company upon paying tolls established by law that he has to use any other public highway." See, also, Pol. Code, §§ 2619, 2799, 2815, 2743, 2756, 2827, 2800; Civil Code, § 1001; People v. Davidson, 79 Cal. 166, 21 Pac. Rep. 538; Blood v. Woods, 95 Cal. 78, 30 Pac. Rep. 129. The right of plaintiff, therefore, to exemption from paying toll, is not an easement. It is not a right imposed upon corporeal property. There is no servient estate. It does not confer upon plaintiff the right to use the road. That right he always had as one of the public. It was simply an agreement made by the corporation which had the right to the tolls that he and his grantees should be exempt from payment while enjoying this common right.

2. Is the plaintiff entitled to an injunction on the ground that the remedy for the breach of his contract by way of damages is inadequate, and will entail a multiplicity of suits? I think not. The injury is not irreparable. Plaintiff is not denied the use of the road. He is only required to pay toll. His damage is easily ascertained. No disposition has been manifested on the part of the defendants to vex or annoy plaintiff. The dispute seems to be an honest difference of opinion as to the respective rights of the parties. We are not warranted in presuming that, after an adjudication at law, defendant would still insist upon its claim if the decision were adverse to it. After such decision the matter will not again be open to litigation. The presumption is that an action at law would be final, and prevent further dispute. I think, therefore, conceding that plaintiff has acquired the right he claims, this action cannot be maintained, and that the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to dismiss the action.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded, with direction to dismiss the action.

FORNI v. YOELL et al. (No. 14,959.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1893.)

UNDERTAKING ON APPEAL—WAIVER BY STIPULATION—NEW TRIAL—NOTICE OF APPLICATION—WHEN TO BE GIVEN.

1. Where it is expressly stipulated that "the appellant has in due time given and filed a good and sufficient undertaking on appeal," the respondent cannot have the appeal from an order denying a new trial dismissed on the ground that no undertaking was filed.

2. Where defendants give notice of a motion to dismiss the action on the ground that plaintiff neglected for six months to have judgment entered on the court's findings of fact and conclusions of law in his favor, file the notice among the papers in the cause, and prosecute their motion to a decision, they will be held to have waived, as of the date of such notice to dismiss, the "notice of the decision of the court," within 10 days of which a motion for a new trial must be given, and the 10 days begin to run from the date of such motion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; Francis E. Spencer, Judge.

Action by A. Forni against George M. Yoell and Jesus Lopez. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. L. Gill, for appellants. F. B. Laine and Jackson Hatch, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action of ejectment. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Respondent objects to the appeal from the order denying a new trial, and moves to dismiss the same upon the ground that no undertaking was filed. This motion would be unanswerable, under the rule laid down in Paving Co. v. Bolton, 89 Cal. 154, 26 Pac. Rep. 650; Perkins v. Cooper, 87 Cal. 244, 25 Pac. Rep. 411; Crew v. Diller, 86 Cal. 554, 25 Pac. Rep. 66; and other cases of like import,—but for one thing, and that is that counsel for respondent and appellants stipulated in due form as follows: "And it is stipulated and agreed that the appellant has in due time given and filed a good and sufficient undertaking on appeal in said cause." Under such a stipulation, we must suppose either that a good and sufficient undertaking was filed, or that the filing thereof was waived, under section 940, Code Civil Proc. Bonds v. Hickman, 29 Cal. 461; Carrey v. Brown, 58 Cal. 185. The motion to dismiss for this cause should not prevail.

There is another and a fatal objection to the appeal from the order denying a new trial. It is that the notice of the motion for a new trial was not given within 10 days after notice of the decision of the court. The statement shows that the cause was tried by the court; that on the 27th day of February, 1890, "the court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, in writing, ordering judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for the relief prayed for in the complaint." The judgment was not entered on the findings and order until April 6, 1891. On the 16th day of March, 1891, the defendants, by their attorney, gave notice of a motion to dismiss the action, upon the ground that "the findings and decision of the court upon the final submission of this action were filed February 27, 1890, and the party plaintiff thereby entitled to judgment has ever since neglected to demand and have the same entered for more than six months since the filing of said findings and decision." The motion was noticed for hearing March 23, 1891. Service was made upon the attorney for plaintiff March 16, 1891, and the notice filed on the same day. The motion to dismiss was argued and denied by the court March 30, 1891. It will be observed that if the notice of March 16, 1891, is deemed sufficient evidence of notice of the filing of the decision, the notice of intention to move for a new trial, given more than 10 days thereafter, to wit, on April 6th, came too late, and defendants' right to move was lost. Counsel for plaintiff objected to the settlement of the statement upon the grounds above set forth, and in support of their objection offered the records, files, notice, etc., establishing the foregoing facts. Hon. Francis E. Spencer, before whom the proceedings to settle the statement were being had, declined to rule upon the objection upon the ground that, having ceased to be a superior judge, he had no power to do so; and he thereupon ordered the facts incorporated in the statement, and they were so incorporated, settled, and certified. Plaintiff's counsel excepted to the refusal. The statute, section 659, Code Civil Proc., provides that "the party intending to move for a new trial must within ten days after * * * notice of the decision * * * if the action were tried without a jury, file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention," etc.

The question here is, did the appellants either have or waive the notice of decision more than 10 days before giving their notice of intention to move for a new trial? The strongest case in favor of appellants, which I have found, is that of Blagi v. Howes, 66 Cal. 469, 6 Pac. Rep. 100. In that case, defendant's attorney was present in court when the decision was rendered, and asked for and obtained an order from the court staying proceedings on the judgment for 20 days, and the court held that he was not bound thereby, but had a right to wait for a notice in writing. The decision proceeds upon the ground that a written notice is more definite and certain, and tends to prevent controversies, which under any other construction would be likely to arise, "and which all accords, in our opinion, with the intention of those enacting the statute." In Barron v. Deleval, 58 Cal. 95, the defendant's attorney was present in court when his demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and thereupon asked and obtained leave to file an answer within five days. His answer not having been filed, default was entered. His contention was that, not having been served with written notice of the decision on the demurrer, the time did not run against him, and based his contention upon section 476, Code Civil Proc., which provides that "when a demurrer to any pleading is sustained or overruled, and time to amend or answer is given, the time so given runs from the service of notice of the decision or order." The court held the notice sufficient, and said: "What purpose would a written notice of a fact of which the attorney had direct and positive knowledge have subserved? Would it not have been a vain and idle ceremony to have given him a written notice, under the circumstances discussed in this case? And not only did the attorney have actual knowledge of the fact that his demurrer was overruled, but he acted upon such knowledge, by asking and obtaining leave of court to file his answer within five days. To hold that the party and his attorney were not bound by this proceeding had in open court would be trifling with justice, and also subversive of sound principles of law and morals." There is no doubt but that where, under the various provisions of our Code, notice of a decision is required to be given, written notice is usually intended. Section 1010. The principle involved in nearly all the cases, whether relating to the time of filing cost bills, amendments to pleadings, the time within which to plead, to move for new trials, and to perform other acts where time is given after notice of the decision, is substantially the same; and it is believed that the seeming discrepancy between a few of the cases is to be found in the fact of confounding the question of what is a sufficient service of notice with the very distinct one of a waiver of notice, and what amounts to such waiver. "Any one may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his benefit. But a law established for a public reason cannot be contravened by a private agreement." Civil Code, § 3513. The evidence of a waiver which deprives a party of a positive right granted him by law should be of such positive and conclusive character as to leave no rational doubt; but where, as in the present instance, it is furnished by the party himself, has by him been placed upon the files of the court, and made the basis upon which to predicate an application to the court for relief, which could only be granted upon the theory that the given fact existed, (viz. that the findings and decision were made and filed,) there is nothing left to doubt or uncertainty. In such a case there is no room for suggesting that the party may not have comprehended the information which he received, no room for a discussion of the really important question as to whether knowledge is, and should in all cases be treated as, notice, and, if so, as to the extent of the knowledge which constitutes notice. In Waddingham v. Tubbs, 95 Cal. 249, 30 Pac. Rep. 527, it was held that a notice by the plaintiff, in whose favor the judgment had been rendered, of his intention to move for a new trial, and to "set aside and vacate the decision and judgment heretofore rendered and entered herein," was a sufficient notice in writing that a decision had been rendered therein to conclude the defendant, who also gave a like notice of intention to move for a new trial, but not within 10 days after receiving plaintiff's notice. In People v. Center, (Cal.) 5 Pac. Rep. 263, it was held that, by taking an appeal from the judgment without waiting for notice of decision, the losing party waived such notice, and that a notice of intention to move for a new trial, given more than 10 days thereafter, came too late. I am of opinion that when, on the 16th day of March, 1891, defendants gave notice of a motion to dismiss the action upon the ground that the "findings and decision upon the final submission of this action were filed February 27, 1890, and the party plaintiff thereby entitled to judgment," etc., filed the same among the papers in the cause, and prosecuted their motion to a decision in the court, they must be held to have waived the notice of decision provided for in section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as of the date of such notice to dismiss, to wit, March 16, 1891; and as the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not served and filed until April 6, 1891, more than 10 days thereafter, and as no extension of time was had, their notice came too late. Association v. Porter, 58 Cal. 81; Barron v. Deleval, Id. 95; Kelleher v. Creclat, 89 Cal. 38, 26 Pac. Rep. 619; Wall v. Heald, 95 Cal. 364, 30 Pac. Rep. 551; Waddingham v. Tubbs, 95 Cal. 249, 30 Pac. Rep. 527; Dow v. Ross, 90 Cal. 562, 27 Pac. Rep. 409; Gray v. Winder, 77 Cal. 525, 20 Pac. Rep. 47; Mullally v. Society, 69 Cal. 559, 11

Pac. Rep. 215; O'Neill v. Donahue, 57 Cal. 226; Cottle v. Leitch, 43 Cal. 322.

As to the appeal from the judgment, section 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, among other things, that "any statement used on motion for new trial * * * may be used on appeal from a final judgment," etc. Conceding, without deciding, that the statement in this case upon a motion for a new trial, which came too late, can be thus used, still the exception to the decision, "on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence," cannot be reviewed on this appeal, because such appeal was not taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, as provided in subdivision 1 of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The judgment was entered April 6, 1891, and the appeal perfected December 31, 1891, a period of more than eight months after the rendition of the judgment. Handley v. Figg, 58 Cal. 578; Bettis v. Townsend, 61 Cal. 333.

The findings support the judgment. There was no error on the part of the court in refusing to strike out testimony given by Brassy, Sauawain, Farin, and Bury. The motion for a nonsuit was properly refused. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

JORDAN et al. v. GROVER et al. (No. 14,385.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1893.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—BONA FIDES OF HOLDER—BURDEN OF PROOF—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by the indorsee of a note procured by fraud, the burden is on plaintiff to show that he is an innocent holder for value.

2. On an issue as to whether plaintiff is an innocent holder of a note which was procured by fraud, the jury may properly consider the fact that he purchased it for half of its face value, with knowledge, from inquiries made, of the maker's solvency, but without inquiry as to the consideration of the note, or explanation of the inadequacy of price.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCann, Judge.

Action by P. H. Jordan and William P. Veuve against D. W. Grover and Edward H. Flemming. The action was dismissed as to said Flemming. From a judgment for defendant Grover, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank D. Ryan, (Spalsbury & Burke, of counsel,) for appellants. George E. Lawrence, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. This is an action on a promissory note for $2,000, made by the defendant Grover to his codefendant, Edward H. Flemming, or order, and by the latter indorsed and delivered to the plaintiffs before maturity. The answer denies "that there was any consideration for the note," and avers fraud in the procurement thereof by the payee from the maker, and notice by plaintiffs prior to the purchase. The action was dismissed by plaintiffs as to the defendant Flemming, and, upon a trial of the case by a jury, defendant Grover had verdict and judgment. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and the order denying their motion for a new trial.

As to the question of fraud in the procurement of the note by Flemming from Grover, that is a fact which must be assumed on this appeal, for the reason that the evidence upon this issue is sufficient to justify the verdict; and as proof of this fact would have constituted a valid defense against Flemming, had he sought to recover on the note, it would, for the same reason, be equally as good a defense against the plaintiffs, whose position was no better than the payee, unless they were bona fide holders; and the rule is well settled by the weight of modern authorities, both in this country and England, that, where fraud or illegality in the inception of the note is shown by the maker, the burden of proof is then cast upon the indorsee to show that he is an innocent holder. Graham v. Larimer, 83 Cal. 173, 23 Pac. Rep. 286; Stewart v. Lansing, 104 U. S. 505; Vosburgh v. Diefendorf, 119 N. Y. 357, 23 N. E. Rep. 801; Smith v. Livingston, 111 Mass. 342; Kellogg v. Curtis, 69 Me. 212. The reasons generally given for this rule is "that a presumption exists that a fraudulent payee would be likely to shield himself by placing the note in the hands of another person to sue upon it, and such presumption operates against the holder." The plaintiffs must therefore, in order to sustain the burden thus cast upon them, show that they purchased the note before maturity in good faith, for value, in the usual course of business, and "under circumstances which create no presumptions that they knew the facts which impeach its validity." 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (4th Ed.) § 815.

It appears that the note was purchased by plaintiffs before maturity for one-half its face value, with knowledge, upon inquiry previously made, of the maker's solvency, but without inquiry as to the consideration thereof, nor was there any reason or explanation given for the purchase of the note at a price so grossly inadequate to its actual value. These circumstances were of themselves sufficient to arouse the suspicions of an ordinarily prudent man, and put him on inquiry as to the consideration; therefore material for the consideration of the jury in determining whether the purchase was made by plaintiffs in good faith. They were therefore properly considered by the jury in connection with the testimony offered by plaintiffs upon this issue in determining whether they were innocent holders; and, as the jury found therefrom that they were not such holders, it follows that the verdict rendered thereon cannot, under the well-established rule of this court, be disturbed. The instructions and charge of the court state the law correctly and with singular clearness, and, as the alleged errors of law occurring at the trial are either not well founded or immaterial, the judgment and order should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

EXECUTION — EXEMPTIONS — NECESSARY TOOL OF MECHANIC — WHAT CONSTITUTES — LATHE — USE IN MANUFACTURING.

1. A turning lathe, which is easily turned by one man, and such as is ordinarily used by mechanics, is exempt from execution, to a mechanic, under Code Civil Proc. § 690, subd. 4, exempting "the tools or implements of a mechanic necessary to carry on his trade."

2. Evidence that a journeyman machinist, when working for others, is not usually required to provide a lathe, is insufficient to show that it is not exempt, since the law does not require that a mechanic shall be employed as a journeyman, to entitle him to the exemption.

3. The fact that such mechanic used the lathe to manufacture machinery does not make him a manufacturer, instead of a mechanic, so as to render it liable to execution, where it appears that he did not employ others to use such tool in manufacturing.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Petition by J. A. Robb, an insolvent debtor, asking to have set aside, as exempt to him from execution, a lathe, and certain appliances used in running it. From an order granting the petition, the assignee in insolvency appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Lowenthal, for appellant. Jas. P. Langhorne, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal by an assignee in insolvency from an order made, on the petition of the insolvent, setting aside, as exempt from execution, a lathe, and certain appliances used in running the lathe. The insolvent is a mechanic and machinist.

Section 690, Code Civil Proc., provides: "The following property is exempt from execution: * * * (4) The tools or implements of a mechanic necessary to carry on his trade," etc. It is contended that a lathe is not a tool or implement required by a mechanic, and evidence was given to the effect that a journeyman machinist, when working for others, is not usually required to provide an implement of that character. This evidence tended simply to show that such a tool or implement is not necessary for a mechanic who is a machinist, while employed as a journeyman; but the law does not require that a mechanic shall be employed as a journeyman, in order to be entitled to the exemption. Nor is the phrase, "necessary to carry on his trade," used in such strict sense that, because some journeyman machinist can get employment with a manufacturer who will supply the implement, therefore it is not necessary to the trade, within the meaning of the statute. The implement in question, according to the testimony of the claimant, was necessary to carry on his business as a mechanic and machinist, and is a tool used for shaping wood or metal, cost about $250, was run by man power,—one man easily turning it,—and was a tool ordinarily and necessarily used by mechanics and machinists in their trade.

Appellant also contends that the insolvent was a manufacturer, and not a mechanic. The insolvent testified that he used the lathe to manufacture machinery. What machinery he manufactured, or upon what terms, is not shown. He did not employ others to use the tool or implement in manufacturing. It was used by himself. Many mechanics who would be clearly entitled to the exemption are manufacturers; tailors, for instance. Suppose he was doing piece work for some establishment. In such case, I see no reason why he would not be as clearly a mechanic as a journeyman who worked in the establishment, and had such tools supplied by the manufacturer. I think the order should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GALLAGHER. (No. 20,972.)¹

EMBEZZLEMENT — DRAWING FUNDS FROM BANK — AIDING AND ABETTING — CROSS-EXAMINING DEFENDANT.

1. The president of a corporation, to pay an indebtedness of the corporation, the exact amount of which he did not know, signed, as president, a blank check, payable to the secretary, which was given to him, with directions to fill in the amount, and pay the debt. He filled it in for a larger amount, and on having it paid to him appropriated the entire sum. Held, that the money paid him was the money of the corporation, and not that of the bank.

2. It being within the course of the secretary's employment to draw, on like checks, the money of the corporation from the bank, and to pay its debts, he is estopped to claim that the money did not come into his control by virtue of his employment, because he filled in the check for a larger amount than he was authorized.

3. By previous appointment defendant went to a saloon near a bank, while the secretary drew the funds. They immediately went to another city, where defendant registered under a fictitious name, procured currency for part of the coin, took most of the funds, in a valise, to a railroad station, where he obtained two tickets, paying therefor from the appropriated funds. Defendant carried the funds part of the way, and when arrested had some of them on his person. Held, that the evidence warranted a conviction of defendant for aiding and abetting in the embezzlement.

4. Pen. Code, § 688, provides that in a criminal action one cannot be compelled to testify against himself, and section 1323 provides that, if a defendant in a criminal action offer himself as a witness, he may be cross-examined as to matters about which he was examined in chief. Held that, where defendant had merely denied that he had advised another to draw money from a bank for the purpose of embezzling it, and had denied all knowledge of intention of the other so to do, it was error on cross-examination to allow him to be asked questions relating to facts transpiring after the money was drawn.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

B. F. Gallagher was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Reversed.

W. F. Aram, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and Geo. W. Reed, Dist. Atty., for the People.

SEARLS, C. Defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The indictment charges that at the county of Alameda one Richard C. Beggs, a clerk, agent, and servant of the "Oakland Consolidated Street-Railway Company," (a corporation,) embezzled $8,500, the personal property of said company, and that the defendant, B. F. Gallagher, did aid and abet said Beggs in such embezzlement.

The first point made by appellant is that Beggs did not commit the crime of embezzlement, as charged in the information. "Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Pen. Code, § 503. Section 508 of the Penal Code is in the following language: "Every clerk, agent, or servant of any person who fraudulently appropriates to his own use, or secretes with a fraudulent intent to appropriate to his own use, any property of another which has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment as such clerk, agent, or servant, is guilty of embezzlement." The crime of embezzlement is a statutory offense, and was unknown to the common law. It is said that in the common-law definition of larceny there were two gaps through which, in the expansion of business, many criminals escaped. The first of these gaps was caused by the rule that to sustain a charge of larceny it was necessary that the stolen goods should have been at some time in the prosecutor's possession. The second was in the assumption that when possession of goods was acquired by a bailee no subsequent fraudulent conversion constituted larceny while the bailment lasted, save in a few excepted cases. It was to meet these defects in the common law that statutes have been passed in most, if not all, of the states of our Union, in some of which an offense is created known as embezzlement larceny, and in others, as in our own statute, designating the offense as embezzlement. The case at bar relates to the remedy for the first defect mentioned in the common law, viz. a case in which the personal property alleged to have been fraudulently converted had not been in the prosecutor's possession.

These preliminary remarks with a view to the better understanding of the initial points in the case, and we proceed to a review of the contention of appellant, the underlying theory of which is that the money alleged to have been embezzled did not come into the control or care of Beggs by virtue of his employment as a clerk, agent, or servant. The uncontradicted evidence was to the effect that the Oakland Consolidated Street-Railway Company (a corporation) was doing business at Oakland, in the county of Alameda, was indebted to two companies in several sums of money aggregating say $2,500; that Richard C. Beggs was secretary of the corporation, and as such secretary his duties were, among other things, to keep the books of the company, to receive all the coin due the company, and deposit it (except small sums, kept to pay off discharged workmen) in the First National Bank of the city of Oakland; to draw and sign checks as secretary, which checks were also to be signed by the president or vice president; that the corporation had in the bank aforesaid some $8,000 to $10,000 and credit for an overdraft of $10,000; that on or about June 3, 1892, J. E. McElrath, vice president of the corporation, for the purpose of paying off the indebtedness of the corporation to the two companies aforesaid, and not knowing the precise amount thereof, signed and delivered to Beggs two checks, payable to his (Beggs') order, on said bank, leaving the amount to be paid thereon and on each of them in blank. The evidence is contradictory as to whether Beggs was to indorse the checks and deliver them to the creditors or to draw the money thereon from the bank and pay them. As there was evidence to that effect, we must, in favor of the verdict, assume the latter theory to have met the approbation of the jury. On the 6th day of July, 1892, Beggs filled up the checks, one for $4,000 and the other for $4,519.20, signed them as secretary, drew the full amount thereof, aggregating $8,519.20, from the First National Bank, converted $1,300 thereof into currency, left $2,500 with his wife, and fled with the residue to the northern part of the state, where he was arrested two or three days later, and thereupon confessed his guilt. The connection of defendant with the transaction is not here mentioned for the reason that the contention under this head relates only to the receipt of the money by Beggs in the course of his employment. The argument that the money received by Beggs was that of the bank, and not that of his corporate employers, cannot be maintained. The corporation had funds in the bank. The checks were duly signed by the authorized officer of the corporation, and countersigned by Beggs, its secretary. Under such circumstances, it was not only the privilege, but the duty, of the bank to pay the checks to Beggs, who was the payee and holder thereof, upon presentation; and when paid the amount of payment was a proper charge against the corporation. This being so, the money, when received by Beggs, was as much the property of the corporation as though collected by the former for it upon a lawful account against any other debtor of the corporation.

It is further urged that Beggs had no authority to draw the money from the bank, and hence it did not "come into his control or care by virtue of his employment," within the purview of the statute. The earlier English authorities are not uniform on this proposition. In Rex v. Snowley, 4 Car. & P. 390, the prisoner was hired to perform certain services, and was authorized to receive not less than 20 shillings in each case. In a single instance he charged only 6 shillings, which he received, and did not account for. Held, that there was no embezzlement of the 6 shillings, inasmuch as it was his duty to take no sum less than 20 shillings, and therefore the 6 shillings were not received by the prisoner in the course of his employment. There are other English cases of like import, while perhaps an equal number of cases in the same courts hold a contrary doctrine. Bishop, in his work on Criminal Law, in commenting upon Rex v. Snowley, uses the following language: "That in reason, whenever a man claims to be a servant while getting into his possession by force of this claim the property to be embezzled, he should be held to be such on his trial for the embezzlement. Why should not the rule of estoppel, known throughout the entire civil department of our jurisdiction, apply in the criminal? If it is applied here, then it settles the question; for by it, when a man has received a thing from another under a claim of agency, he cannot turn round and tell the principal asking for the thing, 'Sir, I was not your agent in taking it, but a deceiver and a scoundrel.'" Bish. Crim. Law, (3d Ed.) § 367. In the seventh edition of the same work, like language, with some additions, is used at section 364 of volume 2. In Ex parte Hedley, 31 Cal. 109,—a case involving the same question, and in many respects similar to the one at bar,—this court quoted with marked approval the foregoing extract from Bishop, and in its opinion regarded as conclusive of the question here held that, if an agent obtains the money of his principal in the capacity of agent, but in a manner not authorized, and converts the same to his own use, with intent, etc., it is money received "in the course of his employment" as agent. The evidence shows that it was within the course of the employment of Beggs to draw, upon like checks with those in question, the money of the corporation from the bank, and to pay its debts. In the present instance he held the two checks with authority to fill them up in amounts aggregating about $2,500, and, according to his evidence, to draw the money, and pay the creditors of the corporation, or, according to the evidence of the vice president, to indorse and deliver them to the creditors. It was as the secretary, and in the course of his employment as such, that he received the checks and filled them up, but in a manner different from his instructions, in that he filled them for larger amounts than he was authorized. Under such circumstances, he comes within the rule laid down by Bishop, supra, as interpreted in Ex parte Hedley, supra.

Appellant further insists that there is no evidence whatever that defendant aided and abetted in the appropriation and conversion of the money. In the light of the testimony this claim seems somewhat extraordinary. There was testimony tending to show that by previous appointment defendant repaired to a saloon in the vicinity of the bank while Beggs procured the money; that they immediately met, and came to San Francisco with the funds, procured a private room at the Lick House, where defendant registered under a fictitious name; that he procured currency for $1,300 of the coin, took all of the funds except $2,500, in a valise, to the Oakland station, procured tickets for himself and Beggs to Sacramento, paying therefor from the appropriated funds, had access to and carried the money at least a portion of the time, and when arrested had $50 or $60 of the money on his person, coupled with the fact that they did not pursue the usual course of travelers in procuring through tickets to their destination, but only for short distances, and in various ways acted unlike men with money in hand, honestly acquired, intent upon a journey, taken in connection with the statements of defendant when arrested and subsequently, lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the two men were particeps criminis. Waiving therefore, the evidence that it was the defendant who previous to the commission of the crime, had "advised and encouraged" it, and we think the evidence against defendant was ample to warrant a conviction. The very fact that the embezzlement was determined upon before the money was drawn from the bank detracts nothing from the guilt of defendant as an aider and abettor under such circumstances. Mere intention to commit a crime does not constitute an offense. Had Beggs, after procuring the money from the bank, honestly appropriated it to the legitimate uses of his employer, then, although the amount was in excess of the sum he was authorized to draw, his offense would have been incomplete. It was the subsequent wrongful appropriation of the funds that constituted the crime, and in this the defendant participated under circumstances clearly indicating guilty knowledge and criminal intent. He was not simply an accessory after the fact, but a coworker in the performance of the acts constituting the corpus delicti.

Defendant, Gallagher, was a witness in his own behalf at the trial, and upon cross-examination certain questions were propounded by the court, against the objection of defendant's counsel, and this action is assigned as error. Beggs was a witness for the prosecution, and had testified at length in the case, and as to all, or nearly all, of the facts therein. Among other things, he related that after he received the two checks defendant saw them, and advised filling them up, drawing the money, and fleeing to Seattle, or some foreign port; that they met on Saturday, June 4th, again on Sunday, and talked the matter over, and finally agreed that on Monday, June 6th, at 12 o'clock, the witness was to draw the money, and defendant to wait outside until Beggs came out, and, if detained long, defendant was to go to a certain saloon across the street, and wait for him; that he drew the money, and met the defendant at the saloon. Beggs further detailed their acts from thence until arrested. As a witness in his own behalf, defendant denied that on Saturday next before June 6th he saw the checks, or that he ever saw them prior to the trial; denied that he ever advised Beggs to take the funds of the bank or of the corporation, or to draw the funds, or that he suggested that they would or could go to Canada or elsewhere and divide the money. He admitted they met on Sunday, (June 5th,) and that Beggs made an appointment to meet him at the saloon the next day, but declared there was no particular purpose for which they were to meet, and averred that nothing was said about drawing money from the bank. Defendant was then asked if he and Beggs did go to San Francisco and take the $8,500, etc.?

(2) If he, in San Francisco, assisted Beggs in changing the money to the extent of $1,300 into currency? (3) If he took $6,000 of the money back to Sixteenth street, Oakland? These questions were each of them objected to upon the ground of not being proper cross-examination, not having reference to any matter testified to by the witness in his examination in chief, etc. Upon the objections being overruled, and exceptions duly taken, the witness declined to answer, upon the ground that such answer would tend to criminate him, whereupon the court compelled the witness to answer. He answered that he did go with Beggs and take the money to San Francisco; that he did exchange $1,300 of the coin into currency; and did take $6,000 of the money to Oakland, etc. "A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself; but if he offer himself as a witness he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief." Pen. Code, § 1823. "No person can be compelled, in a criminal action, to be a witness against himself." Pen. Code, § 688. In People v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 602, 6 Pac. Rep. 695, it was held that where the accused offers himself as a witness, and testifies to particular facts only, he cannot be cross-examined generally as a witness in the case. "He may be cross-examined * * * as to all matters about which he was examined in chief." By this expression it is understood that the cross-examination must be confined strictly, not to the precise questions put to the witness in chief, but to the subject-matter concerning which he has testified. In other words, it must be a legitimate cross-examination, within the rules of evidence, and with no discretion on the part of the court to enlarge the field of inquiry,—an examination the trend of which must be in the direction of disproving, explaining, or enlarging the proofs upon the very subject concerning which he has spoken in his direct examination. Within this field he may be tested in like manner with other witnesses. But when, under the guise of discrediting the witness, he is questioned and compelled to testify upon branches of the case to which his direct testimony did not extend, and thus to become a witness against himself, the testimony is without the pale of cross-examination, and his constitutional and statutory rights are as clearly violated as though he had never consented to become a witness. Tested by this rule, it would seem the court below erred in compelling defendant to answer the questions to which objection was made. He had testified to the extent of denying that on or before June 6th he had advised Beggs to draw the money from the bank for the purpose of embezzling it, and denied all knowledge of the latter's intention so to do. The cross-examination extended to facts transpiring after the money was obtained, including its disposition, the flight of the parties, and other damaging facts; all of which was highly injurious to defendant. The following cases bear more or less directly upon the subject in hand: People v. Sutton, 73 Cal. 243, 15 Pac. Rep. 86; People v. Fong Ching, 78 Cal. 169, 20 Pac. Rep. 396; People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 84, 20 Pac. Rep. 36; People v. Cline, 83 Cal. 374, 23 Pac. Rep. 391. See, also, Rice, Ev., note to page 344, where the whole subject is discussed, and cases cited. I find no other error in the proceedings worthy of note. For the error in admitting the evidence of defendant on cross-examination the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

4 Cal. Unrep. 95

SANBORN et al. v. CUNNINGHAM et al.
(No. 14,994.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1893.)

PARTNERSHIP—PURCHASES BY PARTNER.

1. Plaintiffs, having taken a crop of barley under a mortgage of $1,045, accepted the offer of C., one of defendants' firm, to take the crop, and pay them $750 the following week. Soon after, plaintiffs received a check for $500, drawn in favor of, and indorsed by, defendants. In a suit for the balance of the $750, one of the plaintiffs testified that he told his partner to ship the barley to defendants; but it appeared that the warehouseman billed it to C., as he often did shipments from plaintiffs to defendants. Plaintiffs had charged defendants the $750, and it appeared that the $500 was the firm's money, and was charged to C. on their books. Defendants asserted that it was C.'s personal affair, and that he had bought the crop from the grower, who had directed him to pay plaintiffs the $750 to release it. Held, that there was enough evidence to support a verdict against defendants for goods sold and delivered.

2. Plaintiff's testimony that, in answer to his inquiry at the bank for a check which he wished to use as evidence, the cashier told him that he did not think plaintiff could get it, was competent, and there was no need to call the cashier to prove that fact.

3. Defendants insisting that the transaction was the personal affair of one partner, a question by plaintiffs whether such transaction was in defendants' general line of business, was proper.

4. In an action for an agreed price, evidence of the value of the goods is irrelevant.

5. Misnomer of the mortgagor of chattels, (E. H. Wheeler for E. H. Walker,) in the body of the affidavit, is immaterial, where the mortgage purports to be made, and is signed, by E. H. Walker, as is the affidavit.

6. Plaintiff testified that he had written certain letters to defendants; that the postage was prepaid, and the letters put in the mail box at his store; that said box was emptied daily; that it was the business of W., an employee, to take the letters, and mail them in the post office. W. testified that he was such employee at the time in question; that it was his duty to take the mail to the office, and that he did so; that if any letter was addressed, and put in the box, he took and mailed it. Held sufficient proof of mailing to support secondary evidence of the contents of the letters.

7. An entry in plaintiffs' ledger, which the bookkeeper swears to be an original entry, if competent for nothing else, yet may be admitted to show with whom plaintiffs understood that they had dealt, and to whom they looked for payment.

8. It is within the court's discretion to allow the presence of the jury while counsel, in the course of argument, reads from the books.

9. Under Code Civil Proc. § 475, providing that no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of errors and defects not going to the substantial rights, a verdict and judgment in the name of the original plaintiffs, partners, overlooking the death of one of these, and the substitution of his executors, may be corrected, and are not ground for reversal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCann, Judge.

Action by Lucius Sanborn and William Vanderhurst, executors of the will of Charles Ford, deceased, A. A. Morey, and J. S. Menasco against J. F. Cunningham, James Dougherty, and Henry L. Middleton, partners trading as J. F. Cunningham & Co., for the balance of an account for goods sold and delivered. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed and amended.

Spalsbury & Burke, for appellants. Julius Lee, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by Charles Ford, A. A. Morey, and J. S. Menasco, copartners in the name of Charles Ford & Co., against J. F. Cunningham, James Dougherty, and Henry L. Middleton, copartners in the name of J. F. Cunningham & Co., to recover $406.08, balance of an account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, alleging that the whole value of the goods sold was $906.08, of which $500 had been paid. The answer denied a sale and delivery to the defendants of goods, etc., of the aggregate value of $906.08, or of any greater value than $156.08, which last-named sum they admitted to be due and unpaid. Upon the first trial, plaintiffs had judgment, and upon appeal the judgment was reversed, and a new trial ordered. Ford v. Cunningham, 87 Cal. 209, 25 Pac. Rep. 403. Afterwards, Charles Ford died, and Lucius Sanborn and William Vanderhurst, his executors, were substituted as parties plaintiff in his stead. The sum of $156.08, admitted by defendants to be due, was for three lots of potatoes sold and delivered to them by Ford & Co. The remaining $250 is part of the sum of $750 agreed to be paid to Ford & Co. for a lot of barley, but whether the firm of J. F. Cunningham & Co., or J. F. Cunningham individually, is liable therefor, is the ultimate question. A jury trial was had, and resulted in a verdict against the defendants for the amount claimed.

The circumstances connected with the barley transaction are the following: E. H. Walker was indebted to Ford & Co. in the sum of $1,045, and gave them a chattel mortgage upon his crop of barley, then growing, to secure said indebtedness. This barley, after it was harvested and threshed, was delivered to Ford & Co., and stored in a warehouse at Watsonville, in which town Ford & Co. conducted a mercantile business. The defendants, Cunningham & Co., were also merchants doing business at Felton, in the same county. On September 8, 1884, after the barley had been delivered to Ford & Co., J. F. Cunningham came to the store of Ford & Co., and said to Mr. Menasco, of the last-named firm: "I will take that Walker lot of barley; you have it shipped up right away; and I will send you $750 the following week,"—to which Mr. Menasco replied, "All right." Soon after this, Ford & Co. received a check or draft drawn by the Santa Clara Valley Mill & Lumber Company in favor of Cunningham & Co. on the First National Bank of San Jose for $500, indorsed by Cunningham & Co., on account of the barley, leaving a balance of $250 unpaid, which is the sum in controversy. Menasco testified that he instructed his partner Morey to have the barley shipped to Cunningham & Co., but it was billed by the warehouseman to Cunningham. Cunningham testified that in January, 1884, he bargained with Walker for his crop of barley, 50 acres at $25 per acre; that Walker then owed him $250, which was to be considered paid on the contract, and he was to pay the balance in money; that, in May, Walker said he wanted to reserve 10 acres, and the amount to be paid was reduced to $1,000; that, a few weeks before the conversation with Menasco, Walker told him he had given a "crop mortgage" to Ford & Co., and that he should pay them $750 on the barley. It further appears from the evidence that Ford & Co. charged the $750 to Cunningham & Co.; that the $500 remitted was the money of the last-named firm, and was charged to Cunningham. It also appeared that, for a year or more prior to the transaction relating to the barley, there had been more or less dealings between the two firms, and some if not all the shipments of potatoes making up the item of $156.08 were shipped to Cunningham,—that is, the shipping bills named him as the consignee. Some correspondence, and other matters of evidence, will be noticed in another connection.

It was urged upon the motion for new trial, and is urged here, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, in that it does not show the transaction to have been with the defendants as a firm or copartnership, but that it was the individual transaction of Cunningham; that the facts do not show a sale by Ford & Co., but that Cunningham bought the barley from Walker. Whether there was or was not a contract between Cunningham and Walker for the purchase and sale of the barley, is immaterial. The barley was in possession of Ford & Co., and was delivered by them to defendants, or to Cunningham, upon the agreement that they should be paid $750. Whether the defendants are liable, or whether Cunningham alone is liable, was submitted to the jury upon an instruction prepared by the defendants, which fairly presented the material questions of fact, and the jury found in favor of plaintiffs. The evidence was conflicting, but is sufficient to support the verdict. A large number of errors of law occurring upon the trial are also specified and argued by appellants.

1. Menasco's statement that "Morey ordered it shipped to Cunningham & Co.," if erroneously permitted to remain, did not prejudice defendants, as Morey afterwards testified that he so ordered it. Besides it did not appear, at the time the motion to strike out was made, but that the witness had personal knowledge of the fact.

2. The refusal of the court to strike out of Menasco's testimony the statement of the bank cashier that "he did not think it possible for me to get it," referring to the $500 check received by plaintiffs, was not error. The inquiry appears to have been made of the bank for the purpose of obtaining the original check as evidence. As the plaintiff had no right to make a personal search among the papers of the bank, the inquiry was proper, and it was not necessary to call the cashier to testify.

3. Whether the court erred in permitting the witness to testify to its contents is immaterial. There was no controversy between the parties as to its contents.

4. Defendants' objection to the following question put to plaintiffs' witness was properly overruled: "Question. Was this barley transaction with Cunningham & Co. in their general line of business?" The controversy was whether it was a transaction by defendants as copartners, or by Cunningham individually. If the defendants dealt in grain, or especially in barley, it would tend to show that it was a partnership transaction. These two firms had had transactions with each other, and, if the transaction was within their general line of business, plaintiffs had a right to assume that he was acting as the agent of his firm. He was at least the ostensible agent in all transactions within the scope of their ordinary business, and, if he did not intend his firm to be charged with the transaction, Cunningham should have disavowed his agency for the firm.

5. One of plaintiffs' witnesses was asked upon cross-examination, "What was the value of that barley?" Plaintiffs' objection was properly sustained. The agreement was to pay $750 for "the Walker barley." Nothing was said as to the quantity or value. Defendants received all of it, and were bound to pay the agreed price, regardless of its value.

6. Defendants' objection to the introduction in evidence of the Walker crop mortgage was properly overruled. The special objection urged was that it was void as to creditors, of whom Cunningham was one, because it was not sworn to by Walker, the mortgagor. This objection is based upon the fact that in the body of the affidavit the name "E. H. Wheeler" is written, instead of "E. H. Walker," thus: "E. H.

Wheeler, the mortgagor in the foregoing mortgage named," etc. The mortgage purports to be made, and is signed, by Walker, and the affidavit is also signed by E. H. Walker. The error does not affect its validity.

7. The court overruled an objection made by defendants to oral evidence of the contents of certain written statements of accounts and letters which the witness stated had been addressed and mailed to defendants. Upon the former appeal, certain questions relating to the same statements of accounts and letters were considered. See Ford v. Cunningham, 87 Cal. 209, 25 Pac. Rep. 403. It was there said: "The witness stated that he had no personal knowledge that the communications addressed to Cunningham & Co. were mailed, except that copies thereof appeared in plaintiffs' copy book, and that it was a general custom of his firm to place letters in a box in the store, from which they were taken to the office. No foundation, therefore, was laid for the introduction of the evidence. Assuming that secondary evidence could, under such circumstances, be introduced, the press copies were the best evidence, next to the originals themselves." For that, and another erroneous ruling, the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs was reversed, and a new trial ordered; and upon the second trial the same witness, after testifying as above in regard to writing the letters, and that the postage was prepaid, and the letters put in the mail box at the store, further testified: "This box was emptied daily. It was the business of Mr. White, then in our employ, to take these letters, and deposit them in the post office." Mr. White testified that he was employed by plaintiffs from 1883 to 1887; that during the fall of 1884 it was his duty to take the mail to the post office every night, and that he did so during September, October, November, and December, 1884; that if any letter was addressed, and put in the box at the store, during that time, he took it to the post office, and deposited it there in the United States mail box, and that he also did so during March and April, 1885. We think this sufficient proof of the fact of mailing. Indeed, it is all the proof such a fact is capable of, unless in exceptional cases. Demand was made by the defendants for the production of the original letters and statements, and, the same not being produced, the witness was permitted to read the copies of the letters from the letter-press book. The statements were not copied in the book. There was no error in permitting this secondary evidence to be given.

8. Plaintiffs were permitted to give oral evidence of the contents of a letter written by Cunningham & Co. to Ford & Co., September 25, 1884, over defendants' objection. The letter had been used on the former trial, but was mislaid or lost. The evidence accounting for its nonproduction was not very satisfactory as to the efforts made to find and produce it. The letter was as follows: "We have not received bill of last oats or barley. Would you please send the same." Conceding, without deciding, that the court erred in receiving this evidence, the defendants were not prejudiced, as there was no controversy in regard to the contents of the letter, and the writer, Mr. Middleton, testified in regard to it, and fully explained it.

9. Objection was made to the introduction in evidence of the entry of the barley transaction in the ledger of Ford & Co. One of the objections urged here is that "the ledger is secondary evidence." Mr. Morey testified that he was the bookkeeper of Ford & Co.; that the entry in the ledger was an original entry; that it was not entered in a pass book or elsewhere, and then transferred to the ledger. It is also urged that the preliminary proof of the account books kept by Ford & Co. was not sufficient. The entry in the ledger, being original, was competent for one purpose, if no other, viz. it tended to show with whom Ford & Co. understood they made the transaction, and to whom they looked for payment. The question here presented is clearly distinguishable from that decided upon the former appeal. There defendants' books were offered to show the absence of an entry relating to the barley, and as such absence might have been from negligence, or an intention to improperly or fraudulently omit it, it was not only proper, but necessary, to prove, preliminarily, the correctness of the books; and, having so proved them, they were improperly excluded. Here, this entry, though in the ledger, was original, and, as to the fact of its existence, was affirmative evidence, and, besides, there was other testimony, though not as to the correctness of their books, yet which tended more directly to establish the correctness of this particular entry than the technical proof of the correctness of the books, insisted upon by appellants. The court did not err in receiving the evidence objected to.

10. Appellants further contend that the court erred in permitting respondents' counsel, during his closing argument to the jury, "to read to the court, in the presence of the jury," from one of the California Reports. The fact that a cause is being tried before a jury does not take away the right of a party to instruct the court upon the law of the case by proper argument, or the reading of authorities; and whether the jury shall be directed to retire during such reading is a question resting in the sound discretion of the trial court, and to be determined in view of the circumstances of the particular case. There is nothing in this record to indicate that the court did not properly exercise its discretion in ruling upon this objection of appellants.

11. Defendants' request to instruct the jury, marked "2," was properly refused. If plaintiffs were entitled to judgment against the defendants, it was upon the promise to pay $750 for the Walker barley, and not for the value of the barley, which may have been more or less than that sum.

12. Appellants' request No. 3 was also properly refused. Whether or not there was an agreement or understanding between Cunningham and Walker that Cunningham would pay $1,000 for the barley could not affect defendants' liability. The barley was mortgaged to Ford & Co. as security for a prior indebtedness, and was in their possession. Defendants agreed to pay a certain sum to plaintiffs if they would ship the barley to them. Whether plaintiffs knew of the agreement between Walker and Cunningham, or what the defendants should do with or concerning the barley after it was delivered to them, was immaterial. They were not in any manner affected by such prior agreement. The defense does not show that Ford & Co. had any notice of the arrangement between Cunningham and Walker at or before the time they took the mortgage, nor was there any element of ratification of the Cunningham-Walker arrangement in the transaction. They were content to receive $750, and let the barley go, and were not concerned with anything else.

13. The remaining requests on the part of defendants, which were refused, are sufficiently covered by what has been said. Besides, the fourth instruction requested by defendants fully and clearly stated the law applicable to the case, so far as it was, or could be, under the evidence, affected by the prior arrangement between Cunningham and Walker, and this instruction was given. There was no error in the instructions given at the request of the plaintiffs.

14. The verdict and judgment were entitled, "Charles Ford, A. A. Morey, and J. S. Menasco, partners trading under the firm name of Charles Ford & Co.," as the plaintiffs; overlooking the change made by the death of Ford, and the substitution of his executors, which had been made by order of court. It is contended by appellants that the verdict and judgment are void for this reason. The mistake is capable of correction, and does not require a reversal of the judgment. Code Civil Proc. § 475.

Finding no error in the record which would justify a reversal, I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed, with a direction to the court below to amend the title of the verdict and judgment so as to conform to the former order, substituting Ford's executors as parties.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the verdict and judgment, as entered in the court
v.33p.no.18—57

below, be amended so as to conform to the former order, substituting Ford's executors as parties in place of Charles Ford, deceased, and that, as amended, the said judgment, and also the order appealed from, be affirmed.

99 Cal. 401

HARVEY v. DUFFEY et al. (No. 15,155.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1893.)

SALE—REVOCATION OF ORDER—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

1. Defendants ordered goods from plaintiff through its agent, having reference to its catalogue, stating that it kept the goods in stock. The agent testified that the goods were to be manufactured, but defendants claimed that they thought they were already manufactured, and dealt solely with reference to a contract of sale, and that no mention was made of necessity for manufacture. Held, that there was no contract for manufacture of the goods, so as to prevent defendants from countermanding the order before shipment.

2. Plaintiff's agent took defendants' order for goods, and afterwards testified that the goods were to be manufactured by plaintiff, defendants claiming that they contracted solely with reference to a sale of goods already manufactured. The agent had on hand manufactured goods of plaintiff, and the only authority on his part of which defendants had notice was a telegram to him from plaintiff speaking of defendant's prospective order "if taken from consigned stock," and a letter from plaintiff to defendants instructing them to order from the agent. Held, that the agent was not authorized to sell goods to be manufactured.

3. An order for goods to a manufacturer given to his agent, to be forwarded to him, until it is accepted and notice of acceptance given the maker, does not constitute a contract of sale, or for the manufacture of the goods, so as to prevent the maker from revoking it.

4. In such case a letter from the manufacturer to his agent, acknowledging receipt of the order, does not constitute an acceptance, where no notice thereof is given the maker of the order before he revokes it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by C. D. Harvey against Duffey Brothers for breach of contract. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Olney, Chickering & Thomas and Warren Gregory, for appellant. E. R. Taylor, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, J. The complaint in this action, in substance, alleges that, at the time therein stated, plaintiff's assignor, the A. A. Griffing Iron Company, a New Jersey corporation, manufactured for defendants, at their special instance and request, certain standard hot-water radiators, of the sizes described, and were ready and willing to ship and deliver the same at the agreed price of $909.72; that, after the manufacture thereof, defendants notified the corporation not to ship or deliver the goods, as they would not accept or pay for them, or for any part thereof, and that they have not paid the whole or any part of the said sum above mentioned; that afterwards, upon due notice to the defendants by the corporation, it resold the goods at public auction to the highest bona fide bidder, and that the net proceeds of such sale were $43.25. The answer specifically denies the allegations of the complaint, except the allegation of notice not to ship or deliver the goods, which is admitted, with the averment that the notice was given before the corporation informed or notified the defendants that it intended to or would manufacture the same, and that said notice was given before, and not subsequent to, such manufacture. The facts necessary to be stated are as follows: On April 3, 1890, the defendants had in their possession a catalogue of the Griffing Iron Company, in which were listed the goods in question, and upon the fly leaf thereof was the following statement: "To enable us to fill our orders promptly, we carry at all times an enormous stock, comprising at all times every style as shown in our list." On that day the defendants, acting upon this statement in the catalogue, sent to the Griffing Iron Company the following telegram: "Give us lowest prices on three thousand (3,000) feet thirty-nine (39) inch hot-water standard radiators. Answer. [Signed] Duffey Bros." On the following day, upon the receipt of this telegram, the Griffing Iron Company telegraphed plaintiff as follows: "Duffey Bros. telegraph for prices culprit [hot-water] standard. Sell, if necessary, at your price, and we will give you ten per cent. commission on order if taken from consigned stock. Impossible for them to buy, even cheapest type of radiator, at better than forty-nine cents imbibel, [in less than car-load lots,] and thirty-four cents illusion, [in car-load lots,] in San Francisco. Even if you have to give an extra five, don't lose the order. Mich. radiator salesman is due in San Francisco to-day to see Duffey. [Signed] A. A. Griffing Iron Co." On the same day the company mailed to defendants a letter, which, among other things, contained the following: "Immediately upon receipt of your telegram to-day, we wired C. D. Harvey to call on you and name you prices. We trust that before this comes to hand you will have given him your order. * * * We did not wire you an answer, thinking that Mr. Harvey would call and give you personal attention, which, no doubt, he did do so. Trusting to receive your order through Mr. Harvey, we remain, yours, truly, A. A. Griffing Iron Co." Harvey, on receipt of the company's telegram, called on the defendants, and obtained from them the following order: "A. A. Griffing Iron Co.: Please ship to us at San Francisco the following Bundy hot-water standard radiators, 39 in. high: 145, 1x4; 16, 1x10; 1, 1x20. Duffey Bros. A." This order was delivered to Harvey, to be by him transmitted to the company, and was on the same day transmitted by him with the following letter: "A. A. Griffing Iron Co.—Gents: Inclosed I send order from Duffey Bros. for H. W. radiators. Those crossed I can supply from stock here. The balance you will prepare at once, as Mr. D. desires them as soon as possible. I will send you Monday a list to make up car load. Your telegram of 4th inst. relating to this order received. I had already given them prices, 60 & 5 off, and now give on such as are here in stock an additional five per cent., as you directed. Yours, truly, C. D. Harvey." At the time the order was given, Harvey, in his testimony, says: "I told Mr. Duffey at the time that the 1x4 radiator was a radiator that we had never used here in my business, and I did not think the company had them on hand." Duffey testified that "nothing was said between me and him about the necessity of manufacturing them. I did not know they would have to be manufactured. They were catalogued, and I had the catalogue, and acted according to it;" and that, when he revoked the order, he did not know that the company was manufacturing the good for him. On April 18, 1890, the defendants having received no reply whatever to the order sent through Harvey, and being in entire ignorance as to whether it had been received, or, if received, whether it would be accepted, sent a telegram to the company countermanding the order. This telegram was received by the company before the manufacture of the goods was completed, but, notwithstanding this fact, it proceeded to complete the manufacture of them, and afterwards insisted upon the defendants receiving them.

The findings of the court are as follows: "(1) That at no time did the A. A. Griffing Iron Company manufacture at the special instance or request of the defendants, or at the special instance or request of either of them, or for the defendants, or either of them, any of the hot-water radiators mentioned in the amended complaint, or any of the goods described in the amended complaint. (2) That the defendants did not agree, nor did either of them agree, to pay the A. A. Griffing Iron Company, for the goods described in the amended complaint, the sum of nine hundred and nine dollars and seventy-four cents, ($909.74,) or any sum whatsoever. (3) That defendants did not, subsequent to the manufacture of said goods, notify the A. A. Griffing Iron Company not to ship or deliver the same, but that said modification was prior to the manufacture of said goods, and prior to any notification to the defendants, or to either of them, by said A. A. Griffing Iron Company that it intended to manufacture any of said goods. (4) That said goods were sold by the A. A. Griffing Iron Company on or about the 2d day of September, 1890, at public auction, but that said sale was without notice to defendants, or to either of them, or to the world." And thereupon judgment was accordingly entered for defendants, from which judgment, and the order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

The contention of appellant that the first finding is not justified by the evidence cannot be sustained. Conceding to Harvey's testimony all that is claimed for it,—that is, that the order was given for the manufacture, and not the sale, of the goods,—and that his testimony fully sustains the allegation of the complaint that the goods were manufactured for the defendants at their special instance and request, yet this is opposed by Duffey's testimony, which is to the effect that, in giving the order, he dealt solely with reference to a contract of sale, and that nothing was said by any one at any time before the order was revoked as to the necessity of the manufacture of the goods. Admitting, then, that Harvey, in obtaining the order for the goods, understood that they were to be specially manufactured for the defendants at the prices named, such was not the understanding of the defendants, for it appears that, in giving the order to the company through Harvey to ship the goods, they acted upon the representations contained in the catalogue that they were in stock. It is therefore clear (notwithstanding appellant's claim that Harvey, as the agent of the company, was authorized to make the contract alleged and relied on, and that his acts, in this respect, were binding upon the company) that the minds of the parties never met on a contract of manufacture, for "it is essential to the validity of a contract that the parties should have consented to the same subject-matter in the same sense." Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 529, 21 Pac. Rep. 179. But the record does not show that Harvey had any such authority. It is true the telegram to Harvey, dated April 4th, says: "Sell, if necessary, at your price, and we will give you ten per cent. commission on order if taken from consigned stock." This, we think, had reference to the company's goods which Harvey had in stock in San Francisco, and this view is further supported by the company's letter to defendants of the same date, acknowledging receipt of their telegram of April 3d, in which it says: "We wired C. D. Harvey to call on you, and name your prices. * * * Trusting to receive your order through Mr. Harvey," etc.,—from which it would seem that Harvey's authority was limited to naming prices and receiving the order for transmission to the company, and it nowhere appears that defendants had any knowledge other than this of Harvey's authority.

But, assuming that he was authorized to sell, he certainly, so far as the record shows, never exercised any such authority, but simply contented himself with receiving the order, and transmitting it to the company, by whom it was never accepted, nor was anything said or done by it from which an acceptance could be inferred. In fact, neither the defendants, nor any one for them, ever received any reply or notice whatever of the receipt or acceptance of the order either from the company or Harvey, or any one else, until after they had revoked it. As the order was merely an offer or proposal to buy, it was revocable by the defendants at any time before acceptance, and, as there was no acceptance of it by the company before it was revoked, it follows that there was no contract either of manufacture or of sale. It does appear, however, that the company, in a letter to Harvey, dated April 11th, acknowledged the receipt of the order, but this fact was never communicated to defendants until the 20th of April, two days after the order was countermanded, and only then in the most casual manner, by the accidental meeting of Harvey and Duffey on the street. Nor did this, or any other letter emanating from the company prior to the revocation of the order, contain the slightest intimation that it would be necessary to manufacture the goods; but the company's letter to Harvey of the 11th contains language that might be easily construed to the contrary. It is as follows: "Yours of the 5th, containing an order from Duffey Bros., duly received. * * * Soon as specifications are received to make up the balance of the car load, we will forward the same to Messrs. Hawley Bros. Hardware Co., of your city. * * *" This language was used in reply to that part of Harvey's letter inclosing the order which read as follows: "I will send you Monday a list to make up car load." These views apply with equal force to the other exceptions to the findings, except the one relating to the resale of the goods, and that finding is unnecessary to be considered, for the reason that it has no material bearing upon the question upon which this decision rests, and that is that no contract either of manufacture or sale was ever entered into between the parties. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

STEEN v. HENDY et al. (No. 15,313.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 8, 1893.)
SUBSTITUTION OF ATTORNEY OF RECORD—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE OF PARTY.

1. The party of record can change his attorney of record, though the motion for permission to substitute is resisted by a person claiming to be the assignee of the interests of such party, where there is a controversy as to such assignment.

2. In such case the attorney for the alleged assignee will be permitted to make an argument on the merits, and notice of all motions affecting the final disposition of the case must be served on him.

In bank.

Action by Steen against Hendy and others, in which plaintiff moved for permission to substitute an attorney in place of his attorney of record. A person claiming to be the assignee of plaintiff's interest in the controversy resisted the motion, and asked permission to substitute his attorney. Motion granted, and the attorney of the alleged assignee permitted to file brief.

R. Thompson and Wm. H. Jordan, for the motion.

BEATTY, C. J. In this case the plaintiff and appellant, Steen, moves to substitute an attorney in place of the attorney by whom he has hitherto appeared. The motion is resisted by a party claiming to be an assignee of Steen's interest in the matter in controversy, who desires the substitution of a different attorney. Affidavits and counter affidavits have been filed and read presenting a variety of questions as to the nature, purposes, and effect of the alleged assignment. We cannot upon a motion of this character undertake to investigate and decide the questions so raised. The party appearing by the record to be the plaintiff and appellant in the action must be allowed the privilege of changing his attorney of record; but the fact being brought to our attention that another party claims an interest in the controversy as assignee of the appellant, we think he should be allowed the privilege of presenting his argument on the merits of the case, and that he should have notice of any motion affecting the final disposition of the cause. It is therefore ordered that William H. Jordan, Esq., be substituted as attorney for the appellant, Steen, and that R. Thompson, Esq., be allowed to file a brief or briefs in behalf of appellant, and that notice of all motions affecting the final disposition of the cause be served on said Thompson.

PER CURIAM. The orders herein appealed from are affirmed. They raise no questions necessary to be noticed which have not already been passed upon on former appeals taken by the appellant.

PEOPLE v. McNULTY. (No. 20,659.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1893.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

John McNulty was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. He appealed, and the judgment was affirmed. 26 Pac. Rep. 597; 28 Pac. Rep. 816; 29 Pac. Rep. 61. Thereupon a writ of error was allowed by one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States to the supreme court of California, which was dismissed. 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 959.

Carroll Cook, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and Wm. S. Barnes, for the People.

PER CURIAM. In this cause, a writ of error having been heretofore issued out of the supreme court of the United States, and all proceedings under the judgment in said cause stayed by that court until the disposition of said writ of error, and it appearing from the certificate of the clerk of that court that the writ of error had been dismissed for want of jurisdiction, it is now, upon the motion of the attorney general, ordered that the cause be remanded to the superior court, and that court is directed to make such order as may be necessary to carry its judgment into effect.

PEOPLE v. VINCENT. (No. 20,852.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1893.)

In bank.

F. O. Vincent was convicted of murder in the first degree. On appeal by defendant, the judgment of conviction was affirmed. 30 Pac. Rep. 581. Afterwards a writ of error was allowed by one of the justices of the supreme court of the United States to the supreme court of California, which was dismissed. 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 960.

PER CURIAM. In this cause, a writ of error having been heretofore issued out of the supreme court of the United States, and all proceedings under the judgment in said cause stayed by that court until the disposition of said writ of error, and it appearing from the certificate of the clerk of that court that the writ of error had been dismissed for want of jurisdiction, it is now, upon the motion of the attorney general, ordered that the cause be remanded to the superior court, and that court is directed to make such order as may be necessary to carry its judgment into effect.

CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER ACQUITTAL—WHAT CONSTITUTES—CONVICTION OF LOWER OFFENSE—NEW TRIAL AT DEFENDANT'S INSTANCE—EFFECT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EVIDENCE.

1. Where, on a trial for an assault with intent to commit murder, defendant is convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, such conviction is an acquittal of the higher offense.

2. The fact that the judgment of conviction of the lower offense was set aside, and a new trial granted, at the instance of defendant, does not entitle the state to place him on trial the second time for the higher offense.

3. Pen. Code, § 1180, provides that, on grant of a new trial, all testimony must be produced anew, and the former verdict cannot be used or referred to either in evidence or in argument, or be pleaded in bar of any conviction which might have been had under the indictment. Held that, if such statute authorizes the placing such defendant on trial for the higher offense after a conviction of the lower offense has been set aside at his instance, the statute is in conflict with Const. art. I, § 13, which provides that "no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense."

4. Under Pen. Code, § 686, providing that in a criminal action defendant is entitled "to be confronted with the witnesses against him in the presence of the court," except in specified instances, the transcribed testimony of a witness taken by the shorthand reporter on a previous trial of a criminal action, not within the exceptions of such statute, is not admissible in evidence on the second trial because such witness is absent from the state.

5. Where evidence is absolutely incompetent, a general objection to its admission is sufficient.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

H. L. Gordon was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, and appeals. Reversed.

Morehouse & Tuttle, for appellant. V. A. Scheller, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The defendant was charged with the crime of assault with intent to commit murder, and pleaded not guilty to the charge. He was tried, and found guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon. On appeal to this court, the judgment entered against him was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. People v. Gordon, 88 Cal. 422, 26 Pac. Rep. 502. When the case was again called in the trial court, the defendant entered two additional pleas,—one that he had already been acquitted of the offense of assault with intent to commit murder by the verdict and judgment rendered on the former trial; and the other that he had been once placed in jeopardy for the offense charged. At the trial which followed, the defendant, to sustain his plea of former acquittal and once in jeopardy, offered and read in evidence the whole record and proceedings on the former trial. At the conclusion of the trial, the court, of its own motion, gave to the jury, among others, the following instruction: "The defendant in this case has interposed the plea of 'not guilty,' and has also interposed two other pleas,—the plea of 'once in jeopardy,' and the plea of 'former acquittal.' In that regard it is insisted by the defendant that, having been heretofore tried upon information in this case, and convicted by a jury of an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to inflict great bodily injury upon the prosecuting witness, he had been acquitted of the higher offense, an assault with intent to commit murder, and it is further insisted that he had been once in jeopardy. Upon these two pleas, gentlemen, the court instructs you that you shall find for the people, that is, you shall return your verdict upon the plea of once in jeopardy against the defendant, that is, that he has not been in jeopardy; and, as to the plea of former acquittal of the higher offense charged in the information, you shall also return your verdict in favor of the people, and against the defendant." The jury found as directed on the two pleas referred to in the instruction, and also found the defendant "guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to inflict upon the person of C. H. Potter, the prosecutor, great bodily injury as charged in the information." Upon this verdict, judgment was entered as on the former trial that the defendant be fined in the sum of $2,500, and, in default of the payment thereof, that he be imprisoned in the county jail of Santa Clara county at the rate of one day for each four dollars of said fine, and not to exceed in the aggregate 625 days. The defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The appellant contends that the court erred in instructing the jury to find against him on his pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy, and this contention, we think, must be sustained. Section 1159 of the Penal Code provides: "The jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense." It is settled law in this state that the offense of assault with a deadly weapon is necessarily included in that of assault with intent to commit murder, and that, under an indictment or information charging the greater offense to have been committed with a deadly weapon, the defendant may be found guilty of the lesser. People v. English, 30 Cal. 215; Ex parte Donahue, 65 Cal. 474, 4 Pac. Rep. 449; People v. Pape, 66 Cal. 366, 5 Pac. Rep. 621; People v. Bentley, 75 Cal. 407, 17 Pac. Rep. 436. It is also settled law that when one is charged with an offense which includes another offense of lower grade, and is regularly tried and found guilty only of the lesser offense, the verdict operates as an acquittal of the offense charged, and he cannot be again tried for that offense. In People v. Gilmore, 4 Cal. 376, the de-defendant was charged with murder, and found guilty of manslaughter. On his motion, a new trial was granted, and on the second arraignment he pleaded a former acquittal. The court, by Murray, C. J., said: "A conviction for manslaughter is an acquittal of the charge of murder, and the verdict, though general in its terms, must by legal operation amount to an acquittal of every higher offense charged in the indictment than the particular one of which the prisoner is found guilty." And the court quoted with approval the following language used by the supreme court of Mississippi: "The jury in such a case in contemplation of law render two verdicts; the one acquitting him of the higher crime, the other convicting him of the inferior. They must first determine his guilt or innocence upon the charge made by the indictment, before proceeding to inquire whether he is guilty of an inferior crime. The verdict of manslaughter is as much an acquittal of the charge of murder as a verdict pronouncing his entire innocence would be, for the effect of both is to exempt him from the penalty of the law for such crime." Hurt v. State, 25 Miss. 378. In People v. Appgar, 35 Cal. 389, the defendant was indicted for an assault with a deadly weapon, and convicted of a simple assault only. The court, by Sawyer, C. J., after referring to prior cases, said: "Upon the principle of these cases, the defendant is acquitted of the higher offense charged, and cannot be again tried for it, so that the case as to that offense is wholly ended. He was only convicted of the lower offense embraced in the indictment, and, if the judgment were reversed, he could only be tried for that offense." And in this case the court, on the former appeal, by Garoutte, J., said: "But, having been found guilty of the crime of 'assault with a deadly weapon' only, he is acquitted of the higher offense." There have also been numerous decisions to the same effect in other states, but we deem it unnecessary to cite them.

It is contended, however, for respondent, that the instruction complained of was proper, for the reason that the former judgment was set aside, and a new trial granted, at the instance of appellant, and hence that he cannot claim protection under a law applicable to cases of "former acquittal" and "once in jeopardy;" and in support of this contention counsel cite People v. Keefer, 65 Cal. 232, 3 Pac. Rep. 818, and section 1180 of the Penal Code. The constitution, in section 13 of article 1, declares that "no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense;" and section 687 of the Penal Code provides that "no person can be subjected to a second prosecution for a public offense for which he has once been prosecuted and convicted or acquitted." Section 1023 of the same Code also provides that "when the defendant is * * * acquitted, or has been once placed in jeopardy upon an indictment or information, the * * * acquittal or jeopardy is a bar * * * for an offense necessarily included therein, of which he might have been convicted under that indictment or information." Under these provisions, it must be held that, when a person is once placed upon his trial before a competent court and jury upon a valid indictment or information, the "jeopardy" attaches, to which he cannot be again subjected, unless the jury be discharged from rendering a verdict by a legal necessity, or by his consent, or, in case a verdict is rendered, unless it be set aside at his instance. People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 467; People v. Horn, 70 Cal. 17, 11 Pac. Rep. 470. The question, then, is, did the fact that the verdict finding the defendant guilty of the minor offense was set aside at his instance subject him to be tried again for the major offense of which he had been acquitted? There can, in our opinion, be but one answer to this question, and that must be in the negative. In the case of People v. Keefer, supra, the defendant was indicted for the crime of murder, and convicted of murder of the second degree. On his motion, a new trial was granted. At the second trial, his counsel requested the court to instruct the jury that, "defendant having been previously tried on this indictment, and found guilty of murder in the second degree, he cannot now be convicted of murder in the first degree." The instruction was refused, and, on appeal, the refusal was held to be proper. This was based upon the fact that there is but one crime of murder, which is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought. The court said: "The indictment charges the crime of murder, and the defendant was not acquitted of murder by the first verdict. In dividing the crime of murder into two degrees, the legislature recognized the fact that some murders, comprehended within the same general definition, are of a less cruel and aggravated character than others, and deserving of less punishment. It did not attempt to define the crime of murder anew, but only to draw certain lines of distinction by reference to which the jury might determine in a particular case whether the crime deserved the extreme penalty of the law or a less severe punishment." It was accordingly held that the defendant had subjected himself to a retrial on the charge of murder, and that on such retrial he might be found guilty of murder in the first degree, if the evidence would warrant such a verdict. That case is not in point here, for the reason that an assault with intent to commit murder and an assault with a deadly weapon are not the same offense, but are different offenses. Pen. Code, §§ 217, 245. Section 1180 of the Penal Code is as follows: "The granting of a new trial places the parties in the same position as if no trial had been had. All the testimony must be produced anew, and the former verdict cannot be used or referred to either in evidence or in argument, or be pleaded in bar of any conviction which might have been had under the indictment." There can be no doubt that the granting of a new trial, upon the application of the accused, for an offense of which he has been convicted, places him in the same position as if no trial had been had; but if it was meant by the section quoted to go further, and provide that when the indictment charges two or more offenses, and on the first trial the accused is acquitted of one of the offenses charged, and convicted of another, the granting of a new trial of the offense of which he was convicted places him in the same position as to the offense of which he was acquitted as if no trial had been had, and thus subjects him to be tried again for the last-named offense, then the section is clearly in conflict with the provision of the constitution above quoted, and for that reason is void. See People v. Gilmore, 4 Cal. 376; Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) p. 401, and cases cited.

But, conceding that the instruction complained of was erroneous, still it is claimed for respondent that the appellant was not and could not have been harmed by it, since he was found guilty only of an assault with a deadly weapon. On the other hand, it is claimed for appellant that he was wrongly subjected by the court to a trial for assault to commit murder, and that the instructions tended to prejudice him materially before the jury. As the judgment must be reversed upon another ground, it is not necessary to decide this point.

At the first trial, C. H. Potter, the prosecutor, was examined as a witness for the people, and his testimony was taken down by the shorthand reporter, and thereafter correctly transcribed by him. At the second trial, proof was introduced by the prosecution, showing that the witness, after due diligence, could not be found within this state. Thereupon the district attorney offered in evidence the testimony of the witness C. H. Potter given at the former trial of this cause in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Santa Clara, as extended by the then and present shorthand reporter, and the testimony was admitted by the court, and read to the jury over the objection and exception of defendant. Again, at the conclusion of the defendant's evidence, the district attorney offered and was permitted to read to the jury, over a like objection and exception by defendant, the testimony of the same witness given in rebuttal on the former trial." Section 686 of the Penal Code provides that in a criminal action the defendant is entitled "to be confronted with the witnesses against him in the presence of the court," except in certain specified instances, of which this is not one. We have no statute authorizing testimony, taken as that objected to was, to be read on a second trial; and in People v. Chung Ah Chuc, 57 Cal. 567, and the late case of Peo- ple v. Gardner, (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 880, such testimony was held to be inadmissible. See, also, People v. Quirise, 59 Cal. 343, where the ruling in the former case was approved and followed. Following these cases, it must be held that the testimony was inadmissible. But, if this be so, it is claimed that no sufficient objection to its admission was made, and, therefore, that the court did not err in its rulings. The objections, among others, were that the testimony was "incompetent, irrelevant, and inadmissible." The general rule, undoubtedly, is that, to entitle an objection to notice, its point must be particularly stated, (Kiler v. Kimbal, 10 Cal. 268; Crocker v. Carpenter, [Cal.] 33 Pac. Rep. 271;) but, when the evidence objected to is absolutely incompetent, a general objection is available. (Nightingale v. Scannell, 18 Cal. 315.) Here the testimony objected to was absolutely incompetent, and the objections taken were therefore sufficient. Other grounds for a reversal are urged, but they do not require special notice. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

DAMON v. WALDTEUFEL. (No. 15,159.)

CARE OF PLEDGE—FINDINGS OF COURT—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action on a note, defendant, as a counterclaim, alleged the delivery to plaintiff of a piano as collateral security; that plaintiff failed to use ordinary care in storing and keeping it, and that he permitted it to be used almost continually, whereby it was injured and depreciated. Held, that the finding of the court that, while the piano was in pledge, plaintiff, with defendant's consent, stored it with certain persons, who, as compensation for storage, used it to a limited extent, with defendant's knowledge and consent, was a sufficient finding on the issue, and negatived any want of care or liability on the part of plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by James E. Damon against A. Waldteufel. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Smith & Murasky, for appellant. M. G. Cobb and Edgar M. Wilson, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action on three promissory notes made by defendant to plaintiff, upon which judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for an unpaid balance of $868.43. The defendant brings this appeal from the judgment, and asks a reversal thereof on the alleged ground that the court failed to find upon one of the material issues of fact. It appears by the pleadings that, to secure payment of one of the notes, the defendant pledged to plaintiff a new concert grand piano; that plaintiff had sold the piano according to the terms of the agreement by which it was pledged, and applied the proceeds of the sale ($250) as a payment upon the note. In his answer, defendant alleged that plaintiff did not exercise ordinary care in storing and keeping the piano during the time it was in his possession; that he permitted it to be used almost constantly by persons skilled and unskilled in the use of pianos, whereby the piano was injured and much depreciated in value, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $775. The demand for this damage is pleaded as a counterclaim to plaintiff's demand upon the note. It is the issue tendered by the counterclaim upon which appellant contends there was no finding. The court found that, during the time the piano was in pledge, the plaintiff, with defendant's consent, stored it with certain friends, who, as compensation for the storage, used the same to a limited extent, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant. This finding negatives any want of care on the part of the plaintiff in the storage and use of the piano, of which the defendant has a right to complain; and thus fully answers the substance of the issue. The defendant, having consented that the piano should be stored with friends who might use it as compensation for the storage, has no right to complain of negligence on the part of the plaintiff in thus storing it and permitting it to be used, though it may have been injured by negligent use. "He who consents to an act is not wronged by it." Civil Code, § 3515. Whether plaintiff and defendant, or either, could recover damage from those with whom the piano was stored, for excessive or negligent use thereof, are questions not involved in this case. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

BEDEL v. KOWALSKY. (No. 14,417.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 12, 1893.)
ACTION FOR GOODS SOLD — PLEADING — APPEAL — EVIDENCE.

1. It is no ground of demurrer to a complaint, in an action for wheat sold and delivered, alleging sale by sample of a certain amount of wheat to be delivered in a certain time, that it avers a delivery of a greater amount, and that part of it was not delivered within the time specified, where it is further averred that defendant's agent, through whom it was delivered to defendant, accepted it for him and pursuant to his orders.

2. A judgment for plaintiff for damages for failure to accept and pay for wheat cannot be sustained where it appears that it is based on a verdict estimating the damages on a greater amount of wheat than the evidence shows defendant had agreed or authorized any one to accept.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by J. C. Bedel against E. H. Kowalsky. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Henry I. Kowalsky, for appellant. D. H. Whittemore, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to recover a balance on account of wheat sold and delivered to defendant. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant prosecutes this appeal from such judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The objections are twofold: (1) That it showed a sale of two lots of wheat according to sample, and at the same time averred a delivery of a greater quantity than called for by the contract; (2) that the contract was to deliver within 10 days, and the averment is that a portion of the wheat was not delivered within the specified time. The answer to these objections is that the complaint averred the delivery of a larger quantity to defendant through his agent, who accepted it for him and pursuant to his orders. It was the privilege of the defendant to receive a larger quantity than that called for by his contract if he saw fit, and to receive it at a later period than that named in the agreement, and, if he did so, he is liable.

The second point made by appellant relates to a variance between the allegations and the proofs. According to the complaint, the plaintiff, on the 2d day of August, 1887, sold to defendant 2,000 sacks of wheat, to be equal to sample No. 90, (then delivered to defendant,) at $1.85 per cental, and 1,060 sacks, to be equal to sample No. 69, (then delivered to defendant,) at $2 per cental, all of said wheat to be delivered to defendant in 10 days at the warehouse of Starr & Co., at South Vallejo, Cal., and to be paid for as fast as delivered; that, before August 10th, plaintiff delivered 2,395 sacks of the wheat equal to sample 90, which was received by Starr & Co. for defendant, by his order; that defendant refused to pay for the wheat so delivered, and notified plaintiff not to deliver any more, but that plaintiff delivered the remainder of the wheat, to wit, 1,060 sacks, equal to sample 69, to Starr & Co., who accepted and stored the same according to defendant's orders; that defendant has not paid for the same, or any part thereof, except $6,000. The quantity in pounds of each quality of wheat is given, and judgment demanded for the prices specified, amounting to $2,966.78. The complaint was not verified, and the answer denied all of the material allegations therein contained.

The cause was tried before a jury. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff was quite sufficient to sustain a cause of action against defendant for a refusal to receive and pay for 2,000 sacks of wheat equal to sample 90, and 1,058 sacks equal to sample 69, provided the latter was delivered in time, or the delivery thereof waived by defendant. But the evidence shows that the defendant contended that the wheat was to be delivered not in ten, but in five, days, and at the end of the five days he refused to receive it, and so notified the broker through whom the purchase was made, and the wheat, on reaching Vallejo, was stored as follows: The first lot, of 2,395 sacks, for account of the broker, W. H. Yates, from whom defendant had purchased; and the last lot, of 1,060 sacks, for account of the plaintiff. That defendant never paid anything on account of the wheat, and that plaintiff finally sold it, and realized therefor the sum for which he gave defendant credit. The warehouse receipts were not in evidence, but the reports to the office of Starr & Co., the owners, show that it was deposited for account of as above stated.

The court, in passing upon the motion for a new trial, says: "The case was tried by both sides in a manner so confusing that it is difficult to determine satisfactorily some of the main points of the plaintiff's case," etc. I concur fully with the court below, and may add that I have seldom found a record more uncertain and confusing than the present, and it is only by repeatedly groping through it that I am able to piece out the isolated facts so as to understand their bearing and effect. It seems that neither defendant nor his attorney was present until the trial had progressed to some extent, and this will probably account for some of the crudities presented in the record. Upon the whole case, were it not for one circumstance, I should feel inclined to say that although the action was brought to recover the purchase price of wheat sold and delivered, and the plaintiff recovered upon a breach of a contract by defendant to receive and pay for the same wheat, which was never in fact delivered, yet, the case having been tried upon this basis without objection, the verdict should stand. The circumstance which prevents this conclusion is this: The plaintiff recovered for nearly 500 sacks of wheat not included in the contract, and which there is no evidence that defendant ever authorized Starr & Co. to receive for him. As to the wheat contracted for, it is said defendant authorized Starr & Co. to receive it for him, and, while he repudiated the contract, he did not countermand the order to receive; and the wheat having been stored with that firm for him, although not as to a portion of it within the time specified in the contract, defendant waived the failure to deliver in time, and is liable. For present purposes we may concede this. The evidence is that defendant called upon Starr & Co., and directed them to receive the wheat, for his account, and the particulars of his order are found in the instructions of the firm to their agent at Vallejo, where the wheat was to be delivered, contained in the following letter: "August 2, 1887, Vallejo. We send you samples of 2,000 and 1,050 sacks coming to you, account of E. H. Kowalsky, care of W. H. Yates. Gove says put one thousand of first and 525 of the other into one, and put one hundred tons of J. W. lot and make two of the latter cover the exact pounds of 3,050 sacks. Let us know number of lots, —J. W. lots,—and issue him storage receipts. A. B., Vice-Pres." In explanation of the foregoing, it is proper to say that there was evidence tending to show that the samples had been submitted to Gove, who was a wheat grader, and that he had decided that, if the two qualities were mixed in the proportion above specified, the whole would pass as No. 1 shipping wheat, which was designated by Starr & Co. as "J. W." There is no evidence of other or further instructions to Starr & Co., and this did not authorize them to receive at Vallejo any quantity of wheat in excess of that specified on account of defendant. When we consider that plaintiff's evidence shows that, before any wheat was delivered, defendant had notified the seller that he would not accept or pay for any of it, and that, in the interim between the contract and delivery, wheat had fallen at least 50 cents per cental, we are somewhat surprised that plaintiff sought to deliver about 400 sacks of wheat in excess of the quantity called for by the contract, and very greatly surprised that, after selling this excess with the other, he was permitted to recover for the difference between the price received and the contract price on not only that included in the contract, but the additional 400 sacks as well. To permit a transaction of this sort to go unchallenged would, upon the same principle, place a purchaser who had engaged a limited quantity, and instructed an agent to receive it, in the position of being compelled to receive an unlimited quantity, when the exigencies of a falling market made it for the interest of the seller to furnish such larger quantity. The point is made by appellant in his brief that the contract was void under the statute of frauds, but neither the pleadings nor testimony are of a character to warrant the consideration of the question. For the excess of the recovery as above indicated, the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial had, with leave to the respective parties to amend their pleadings if they shall be so advised.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings if they shall be so advised.

PEARCE v. BOGGS. (No. 15,024.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1893.)

SALE — CHANGE OF POSSESSION — INSTRUCTIONS — QUESTIONS OF LAW — NEW TRIAL — STATEMENT — WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

1. Objection that a proposed statement on motion for new trial was not signed by the moving party, or any one on his behalf, cannot be made after expiration of the time for preparing statement, where, on delivery of the document by the moving party's attorneys to the attorneys of the other party, receipt is acknowledged of original draft of statement on motion for new trial in the case without objection.

2. In an action of claim and delivery against a sheriff for horses taken on attachment, an instruction that, if the jury believed plaintiff bought them in good faith from the attachment debtor, and was prevented from getting possession by the wrongful act of the attaching creditor, they should find for plaintiff, was erroneous, in leaving to the jury a question of law, whether any act of the attaching creditor was wrongful.

3. S. sold to plaintiff horses in the pasture of R., where they had been put by C., with the consent of S., at the close of a season for which C. had hired them. R. refused to deliver them on the order of S. to plaintiff, when, 12 days after buying them, he first attempted to get possession; C. having given instructions when he left them that they should be delivered to no one else. On the following day they were taken by defendant, as sheriff, on an attachment in an action by C. against S. Held error to instruct that when personal property is so situated that the purchaser is entitled to and can rightfully take possession at his pleasure, he is considered as having actually received it, as the statute requires.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. W. Crump, Judge.

Action by George F. Pearce against L. H. Boggs. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hudson & Sayre, for appellant. Ira C. Jenks and Woods Crawford, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action of claim and delivery. The plaintiff purchased two mares from L. G. Simmons, at Lakeport, on the 1st of April, 1891, and took from him a bill of sale and an order upon one Reynolds for their delivery. The mares were at that time at pasture on a ranch belonging to Reynolds, about 30 miles from Lakeport, where they had been placed about a month previously by one Christie. Christie had been working the mares during the winter for their feed, under an agreement with Simmons, and at the close of the working season placed them on this ranch with the consent of Simmons, and told the keeper of the ranch not to let any one have them except upon his order. The plaintiff made no attempt to take possession of the mares until the 12th of April, when he went to the ranch, and presented Simmons' order for them, but Reynolds refused to give them up by reason of the order that Christie had given when the mares were left there. On the 13th of April Christie sent for the mares, and had them removed to his own place, about five miles from Lakeport, where, on the same day, they were taken by the defendant, as sheriff of Lake county, under a writ of attachment issued in a suit by Christie against Simmons. Christie had no knowledge that the plaintiff had purchased the mares, or had made any demand for them. Judgment was rendered against Simmons in favor of Christie on October 26th, and on the 11th of November an execution was issued thereon, under which the defendant held the mares. The present action was begun November 7, 1891. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for their recovery, from which and an order denying a new trial the defendant has appealed.

When the defendant's statement on motion for a new trial was presented to the judge for settlement, the plaintiff objected thereto, upon the ground that the proposed statement had not been signed by the defendant, or by his attorneys, or any one on his behalf, and could not therefore be considered by the court as a document in the case. It was shown on behalf of the defendant that the document had been delivered by the attorneys for the defendant to the plaintiff's attorney, who then gave the following receipt: "Received from Hudson & Sayre original draft of statement on motion for new trial in the case of Pearce vs. Boggs. Woods Crawford, Attorney for Plaintiff. Lakeport, Cal., Jan. 5, 1892." Upon this showing the court found that the service was sufficient, and accordingly settled the statement. We think that this action of the court was correct. It is evident from the receipt which the plaintiff's attorney gave at the time the document was delivered to him that he was in some way informed that it was the original draft of a statement on motion for a new trial in this case, and it is immaterial whether such information was given orally or by formal notice. He knew that the attorneys from whom he received the document were the attorneys of the defendant, and his written admission of its character shows that he was not misled in reference thereto; and, if it was his intention to object to the absence of a signature thereto by the defendant's attorneys, good faith on his part, as well as the dignity of conduct which should characterize all professional intercourse between members of the bar, required him to state his objection at that time, rather than to receive it, and withhold his objection until after the expiration of the time within which a statement could be prepared.

The court gave to the jury the following instructions, at the request of the plaintiff: "The court instructs you that if you believe from the evidence the plaintiff bought the property described in the complaint in good faith from the vendor, Simmons, and paid a valuable consideration therefor, and that plaintiff Pearce was prevented from getting the possession thereof by the wrongful act of G. W. Christie, the attaching creditor herein, then you will find for the plaintiff." This instruction was erroneous by reason of the clause which left to the jury to determine whether any act of Christie by which the plaintiff had been prevented from getting possession of the mares was "wrongful." Whether any act of his was wrongful was a matter of law depending upon the facts presented in the case, and, if it was claimed that such facts had been shown to the jury, the court should have instructed them thereon as a matter of law, and directed them to find their verdict according as they should find the facts constituting the wrongful act. Its ruling would then be subject to exception and review, whereas, by leaving to the jury to determine whether any act of Christie was wrongful, the court not only left to it the determination of a question of law, but also deprived the defendant of the means of knowing what act the jury might determine to be wrongful, and thus of availing himself of any exception to their verdict. The same error was also committed by the court by adding a similar clause in modification of an instruction substantially in the words of section 3440 of the Civil Code, requested by the defendant.

The court also gave to the jury the following instruction, at the request of the plaintiff: "I instruct you that what constitutes a delivery of personal property by the vendor to the vendee depends upon the character of the property sold and the circumstances of each particular case, and for the purpose of a delivery it is not necessary that the property should pass into the actual possession of the vendee; therefore, when it is so situated that the vendee is entitled to and can rightfully take possession thereof at his pleasure, he is considered as having actually received it, as the statute requires." The latter clause of this instruction is in direct conflict with section 3440 of the Civil Code. If the property is so situated that the vendee can take possession thereof at his pleasure, his failure to take such possession constitutes the very fraud which the statute is intended to prevent, and renders the previous transfer to him void as against the creditors of his vendor. The respondent urges in support of the instruction that its very language is used in the opinion of this court in Williams v. Lerch, 56 Cal. 330. It by no means follows, however, that the language which a court may use in its opinion, where it is seeking to apply principles of law to the facts of a given case, would be proper to give to a jury in another case, where the same principles are inapplicable, or the facts are different. There is no rule better settled than that the opinion of a court is always to be read in connection with the facts of the case in which it is given, and it may often occur that in its opinion it will use expressions, either by way of argument or illustration, which are correct in their application to the case before it, but would be inapplicable in many other cases. For this reason it is not always proper to give to a jury an instruction upon a principle of law couched in language taken from an opinion in the reports. Jurors are apt to be misled by instructions upon mere abstract principles of law. They deal only with facts, and instructions to them should be directed to those facts, and should be rather in the concrete than in the abstract. Abstract principles of law which point an opinion or an exceptional rule may be very misleading to a jury. This proposition is well illustrated in the very case of Williams v. Lerch, cited by respondent. Immediately following that part of the opinion which was taken for the instruction to the jury in the present case is found the following sentence: "Accordingly, it has been held, if a vendor of goods in the care and keeping of a third person directs him to deliver them to the vendee, and the party holding the goods, on notice and application of the vendee, assents to retain the goods for him, it is a delivery sufficient to transfer the title and to satisfy the statute;" thus pointing out, by way of illustration, the facts to which the principle stated by the court was applicable. See, also, Etchepare v. Aguirre, 91 Cal. 295, 27 Pac. Rep. 668.

There was nothing in the present case which justified this instruction as a principle of law applicable to the facts presented to the jury. The mares at the time of their sale to the plaintiff were under the control of Simmons, and capable of immediate delivery by him. Although they had been placed on the ranch by Christie, yet he was acting therein as the agent of Simmons, and his directions not to give them up to any but himself did not take their control from Simmons. Christie never claimed any interest in the mares until after the attachment, and it was testified at the trial that if the plaintiff had at any time before that day presented the order for them from Simmons, they would have been delivered to him.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

I concur: GAROUTTE, J.

PATERSON, J., (concurring.) I concur. The plaintiff did not attempt to take possession immediately after he purchased the property, nor did he offer any excuse for his failure to do so. The only fact shown excusing an immediate delivery is the fact that the mares were 30 miles distant from the place of sale; but this did not excuse a delay of 11 days. Plaintiff claims that an earlier demand "would have been as futile as it was on the 12th of April," because Christie had directed that no one should be given possession except upon an order from himself; but this is mere surmise. It was his duty to use diligence. If he had made demand promptly, and had been refused possession, he could have procured an order from Christie. The latter testified that if plaintiff had presented to him an order prior to April 13th, he would have delivered possession of the mares; but whether a demand upon Christie would have been effective or not, if plaintiff had acted promptly, either by demand or suit for possession, he might have been excused for his failure to comply with the letter of the statute requiring an immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession.

JOHNSON et al. v. POLHEMUS et al. (No. 14,580.)

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—PLEADING—PRAYER FOR RELIEF—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 580, which provides that the relief granted to plaintiff, "if there be no answer," cannot exceed that which he demands in his complaint, "but in any other case the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue," a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage, in an action in which an answer is filed, should not be denied for want of proper prayer for relief, if such relief is embraced within the issue made by the pleadings.

2. In an action to foreclose a mortgage given to secure both a note and a contract, the complaint alleged the payment of the contract, and that there was a balance due on the note, and asked judgment on the note and foreclosure of the mortgage. The answer alleged the payment of the note, and that the contract had been canceled by agreement of the mortgagee. The court found that the note had been paid, but that the contract was in force and unpaid. Held, that plaintiffs were entitled to decree of foreclosure for the amount due on the contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. E. Spencer, Judge.

Action by Kate Johnson and others, as executors of the estate of Robert C. Johnson deceased, against Charles B. Polhemus and others, to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Geo. H. Mastie, Boyd, Fifield & Hoburg, and W. W. Cope, for appellants. Wm. Matthews, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. Defendant had judgment, from which the plaintiffs appeal. There is a bill of exceptions in the record relating to the propriety of the admission of certain oral testimony, but, in view of the conclusions of law reached by the court below, it becomes unimportant, and the appeal is practically based upon the judgment roll. Appellants assign two errors as grounds for a reversal of the judgment, which are as follows: (1) The prayer of the complaint is sufficient to entitle plaintiffs to judgment. (2) Even if the prayer of the complaint be insufficient, plaintiffs are entitled to a foreclosure, that relief being consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue.

As the judgment in favor of defendant seems to have turned upon a decision that no relief was sought in the action upon a certain contract, a reference to the complaint is necessary to the correct understanding of the action of the court. The plaintiffs sue as the executors of the last will of Robert C. Johnson, deceased, who departed this life on or about March 8, 1889. The complaint avers, among other things, in substance, that on the 11th day of September, 1885, Charles B. Polhemus made to Robert C. Johnson his promissory note for the sum of $31,972.90, payable on or before 90 days from date, with interest, etc.; also, that on the same day said Polhemus made a certain agreement in writing as follows: "Whereas, Charles B. Polhemus did make and deliver to Robert C. Johnson his promissory note dated September 13, 1881, for the sum of $31,972.90, bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, secured by mortgage; and whereas, to this date said Polhemus has paid interest on said sum at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, leaving unpaid interest thereon at the rate of three per cent. per annum, aggregating the sum of $3,836.74, and the said seven per cent. was paid with the understanding that in the event said Johnson was not willing to receive the same in full of all interest, that said Polhemus would pay to him the remaining three per cent., aggregating said last-mentioned sum: Now, therefore, for value received, the said Polhemus promises to pay said Johnson said sum of three thousand eight hundred and thirty-six and 74-100 dollars in the event that said Johnson is not willing that the seven per cent. already paid to him should be payment in full of said interest. Dated September 11, 1885. [Signed] C. B. Polhemus,"—which agreement is averred to have been delivered to said Johnson. The execution of the mortgage by defendant Polhemus to Johnson to secure the payment of the promissory note and agreement are alleged to have been had on the same day and as a part of the same transaction. It is averred that Johnson never did elect and was never willing to take and receive the interest at the rate of 7 per cent., and plaintiffs have never consented or elected so to do; that no moneys have been paid on the promissory note or agreement except $10,000, paid to Johnson on account of the promissory note January 11, 1886, and the sum of $27,757.60, paid to plaintiffs November 15, 1889, "which was applied by plaintiffs—First, to the payment of the amount of principal and interest due on said agreement, to wit, the sum of four thousand nine hundred and fifty-five and 79-100 dollars; second," etc.; showing that the remainder was applied on the promissory note, leaving a balance due thereon of $4,907.91, with interest from said November 19, 1889, at 7 per cent. per annum. It will be observed from the foregoing that plaintiffs applied $4,955.79 of the $27,757.60 paid November 19, 1889, to the payment of the amount then due on the agreement of Polhemus, given on account of interest, and this gives rise to the contention in the case. At the trial the court found that the defendant had at the date of the payment, viz. November 19, 1889, indicated to plaintiffs his desire to have the entire $27,757.60 applied to the extinguishment of the note, which it was just sufficient to do, and at the same time insisted that he was in no manner indebted upon the contract. The plaintiffs, however, credited the agreement as above stated, which the court below very properly held they had no right to do. The court finds that no other sums have been paid on the note or agreement than those above mentioned, which would leave the amount due on the agreement unpaid. The court further finds that Johnson at divers times, agreed verbally with Polhemus that he was willing to accept the interest on said first note mentioned in the agreement at 7 per cent. per annum, as paid by defendant, in lieu of 10 per cent., and was willing to waive 3 per cent. thereon as provided in the contract, but never gave to Polhemus any written agreement in relation thereto. The court finds as a conclusion of law that the oral agreement of Johnson did not in law discharge the written contract of September 11, 1885, and, as a further conclusion of law, held "that no relief is sought in this action in relation to said contract," and, as the amount paid by the defendant just paid the note, judgment was rendered in favor of defendant for costs. The prayer of the complaint asks in the usual form for a decree of foreclosure of the mortgage and sale of the mortgaged premises, and that the proceeds of the sale be applied to the payment of the amount due to plaintiffs, as such executors, for the principal sum of such interest and compound interest due and accrued on said promissory note, together with a percentage at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the amount due on said promissory note, etc. The residue of the prayer is in the usual form, asking that other defendants be barred, that plaintiffs may have a personal judgment for any deficiency, and closes with: "Fifth. For such other and further relief as may be meet and agreeable to equity." Such other facts as are necessary to elucidate the question will be stated in the consideration of the case.

Under the equity practice in vogue before the adoption of the Codes, the bill of complaint usually contained a prayer for that particular relief to which the complainant considered himself entitled. The usual practice was also to include a prayer for general relief. The object of the latter was to meet cases in which the plaintiff had mistaken the relief to which he was entitled, as under it he was regarded as entitled to any relief agreeable to the case made by the bill. Story, Eq. Pl. § 49. If he asked particular relief only, he was restricted to his prayer by the decree. A court of equity would not, however, even under a prayer for general relief, permit a party to go beyond the general scope of the case made by the bill, and would not ordinarily permit a bill framed for one purpose answer for another and distinct purpose, especially if the defendant might be surprised or prejudiced thereby. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 41, 42. Our Code of Civil Procedure, in prescribing the mode of pleading, has adopted the essential elements of the former equity practice. A plaintiff in his complaint must insist a demand of the relief which he claims, and, if the recovery of money or damages be demanded, the amount thereof must be stated. Code Civil Proc. § 426. It has been supposed by many that this section has the effect of rendering a prayer for general relief inappropriate. That question need not concern us here, however. Section 580 of the same Code provides that "the relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint; but in any other case the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." As there is an answer in this case, we may therefore dismiss from notice the prayer of the complaint, and are only required to look to the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue. In the section last quoted, our Code adheres very clearly to the rules in equity; that is to say, in case of default, the relief is confined to the relief demanded in the complaint, as was the rule under a prayer for special relief in equity, while in other cases it is extended to granting relief similar to that granted under a prayer for general relief in the chancery courts. There being an answer in the case, the right of appellants to recover upon the agreement depends, not upon the prayer of their complaint, but upon the scope of that pleading and the issues made, or which might have been made under it. Turning to the complaint, it will be observed it is averred therein that the promissory note and agreement were made by defendant to plaintiffs' testator; that the mortgage was given as security for the payment of the two instruments; that no payments have been made upon the instruments except two certain payments, the first of which was credited upon the note, while the second was appropriated to the payment and satisfaction of the agreement, leaving a balance over which was credited upon the promissory note; and that a balance is due and unpaid of $4,907.91, with interest, etc. The answer denies the validity and binding force of the agreement as a claim against defendant; avers that Johnson elected and agreed to accept and receive 7 per cent., and did receive 7 per cent., in lieu of 10 per cent. in said agreement mentioned; denies that plaintiffs applied any part of the payment of $27,757.60 upon the agreement; and avers that, at the time the said payment was made, he directed plaintiffs to credit the whole thereof upon the promissory note.

Here, then, were two distinct issues in reference to the agreement: (1) As to its validity as a subsisting claim; (2) as to the fact of its payment. The court found upon the first issue, as a fact, that Johnson, in his lifetime, did agree verbally with defendant to accept interest on said first note at 7 per cent., and was willing to waive the 3 per cent. which constituted the obligation of the agreement, but that he never gave to defendant any written agreement in relation thereto. As a conclusion of law, the court held that the verbal agreement of Johnson did not discharge said agreement. Upon the issue of payment of the sum mentioned in the agreement, the court found that defendant, when he paid the $27,757.60, manifested his desire to have it applied to extinguish the promissory note, and, as a conclusion of law, held "that it was the duty of said plaintiffs to so apply said payment." The findings then show that the agreement was executed and delivered; that the mortgage was given to secure it and the note; that the principal and interest thereon up to November 19, 1889, was $4,961.75; that no payments were made thereon up to September 11, 1885; that the payment of $27,758.22, made on that day, was not properly applicable to satisfy the agreement; that defendant has not paid or tendered any other sum on account of the agreement. These findings are responsive to the issues made in the case, and establish plaintiffs' right to recover upon the agreement, unless they are precluded by failing to indicate in their complaint such facts as demonstrate to a reasonable certainty their right to recover upon the agreement, instead of upon the note. They stated issuable facts in reference to the agreement. Defendant, by his answer, took issue upon those facts, and the result was to establish its validity. In Harden v. Ware, (decided by this court April 7, 1880,) 5 Pac. Coast Law J. 317, (not officially reported,) a question analogous to that involved in the case at bar was passed upon. The action was upon a promissory note to recover a money judgment. The answer admitted the making of the note, and set up as a defense the execution of a mortgage of even date with the note to secure the payment thereof, which was averred to be in full force and effect. The court below found in consonance with the answer, and held that there could be but one action upon a debt secured by a mortgage, and that an action to foreclose, which must be in accordance with chapter 1, tit. 10, etc., Code Civil Proc., and gave judgment for the defendant. In reversing the judgment, this court held that, upon his own allegations, plaintiff was entitled to a judgment, and that the answer, showing that the judgment should be different in form from that sought, entitled plaintiff to a decree of foreclosure. In Belknap v. Sealey, 2 Duer, 570, it was held that the case made by the defendant's answer furnished a ground of relief to plaintiff independent of the case made by him in his complaint. The action was brought to recover money paid on a contract for the sale of land, which, as plaintiff charged, defendant fraudulently represented to consist of a much larger area than in fact existed. The answer denied all fraud, but, as the court remarked, admitted a mistake as to quantity. The court found that a mutual mistake existed, and a judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the ground of such mistake was upheld. Dayton v. Dayton, 68 Mich. 437, 36 N. W. Rep. 209, held that a bill for the discharge of a mortgage on the ground of a tender which proved insufficient might be retained as a bill to redeem under the general prayer, and an offer in the bill to pay the sum found due. The scope of the case made by the plaintiff and embraced in the bill involved a foreclosure of the mortgage and the ascertainment of the sum due and secured thereby. The amount due upon the promissory note and agreement (their validity established) was a matter of computation; the payments thereon were ascertained. Whether those payments were credited upon the one instrument or the other, or not at all, were matters for the court to determine and adjust with a view to doing justice to the parties, and with the ultimate view of ascertaining the debt due from defendant to plaintiffs, and secured by the mortgage. All these things were within the purview of the issues of this case; were the disputed points to which the parties to the action had narrowed their several allegations, and upon which they were desirous of obtaining the decision of the proper tribunal; and hence were embraced within the issues. I am of opinion the judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to enter a judgment of foreclosure of the mortgage for the sum due upon the agreement, set out in the complaint, viz. $4,961.75, with interest on $3,836.74, the principal sum thereof, from November 19, 1889, at 7 per cent. per annum.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

SAWYER v. COLGAN, Comptroller. (No. 18,068.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1893.)

STATE COMPTROLLER—ISSUANCE OF WARRANTS ON TREASURER—WHEN AUTHORIZED—INDIAN WAR BONDS—APPROVAL BY BOARD OF EXAMINERS—WHEN NECESSARY.

1. Under Pol. Code, §§ 672, 673, providing that the comptroller must not draw his warrant for any claim unless it has been approved by the state board of examiners, except for claims on the contingent fund of either house of the legislature, and for official salaries, such comptroller has no power to issue his warrant for payment of bonds authorized and issued in 1851 and 1852 to meet the expenses of expeditions against Indians, before such bonds have been presented to such board for approval.

2. The fact that such bonds were authorized and issued prior to the enactment of such statute does not render such requirement invalid as to them, since the statute in no way affects the obligations, but only the mode of procuring payment.

3. Nor does the fact that such obligations are in their nature audited claims obviate the necessity of presenting them to such board for approval.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Petition by W. F. Sawyer for a writ of mandate to compel Edward P. Colgan, comptroller of the state of California, to issue to petitioner a warrant on the state treasurer for the amount of a certain bond and coupons issued by the state to meet the expenses of certain expeditions against the Indians. From a judgment denying the writ, and dismissing his petition, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Belcher and Geo. E. Bates, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and Barham & Bolton, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appellant filed his petition in the superior court of the county of Sacramento, praying that a writ of mandate issue requiring the respondent to issue to him a warrant upon the state treasurer for the amount of a certain bond and certain coupons hereinafter mentioned. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, the defendant answered, and, upon the hearing, findings were made and judgment entered denying the writ and dismissing the petition, from which judgment the petitioner appeals. The bond in question was issued July 15, 1854, under an act approved May 3, 1852, (St. 1852, p. 59,) authorizing the state treasurer to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $600,000 for the payment of the expenses of certain expeditions against the Indians. Bonds to the full amount authorized by the act were issued, payable May 2, 1862, with annual interest coupons attached. These bonds were executed by the treasurer and comptroller, and indorsed by the governor. The following is a copy of said bond presented by the petitioner, omitting the in testimonium clause, signatures, and indorsements: "Bond of the State of California. 500. For War Indebtedness. 500. In conformity with an act authorizing the treasurer of the state to issue bonds for the payment of the expenses of certain expeditions against the Indians, approved May 3, 1852, the state of California promises to pay to the order of the governor thereof, on the second day of May, A. D. 1862, at the office of the state treasurer, five hundred dollars, provided the same be not sooner paid from funds anticipated in said act to be derived from the government of the United States, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable at the said treasurer's office on the surrender of the annexed coupons, on the first day of January, A. D. 1853, and annually thereafter; this bond transferable by assignment on the same by the owner thereof, or by his attorney in fact." A part of the coupons presented were attached to this bond; a part were detached from others of the bonds issued under the same act; and the remainder of the coupons were detached from bonds issued for a similar purpose under the act of February 15, 1851, (St. 1851, p. 520,) entitled, "An act authorizing the treasurer of the state of California to negotiate a loan upon the faith and credit of the state for the purpose of defraying the expenses which have been and may be incurred in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the state, in the absence of adequate provisions being made by the general government." Section 1 of the act of May 3, 1852, under which the above-mentioned bond was issued, is as follows: "Section 1. A sum not exceeding six hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated and set apart as an additional war fund, payable in ten years out of any money which may be appropriated by congress to defray the expenses incurred by the state of California, and interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, in the suppression of Indian hostilities, or out of the proceeds of the sale of any public lands which may be donated or set aside by congress for that purpose; and should no such appropriation or donation be made, or if an amount sufficient should not be appropriated or donated within the said ten years, then the bonds authorized to be issued by this act shall be good and valid claims against the state, and shall be paid out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated to pay the expenses of the expeditions mentioned in this act." Section 7 of the act of February 15, 1851, under which $200,000 of bonds were issued, and from which bonds a portion of the petitioner's coupons was detached, is as follows: "Sec. 7. Any claim which this state has now, or may hereafter have, upon the general government for moneys expended out of this loan, for the purposes aforesaid, shall be, and the same is hereby, set apart and pledged for the payment of the principal and interest accruing upon said bonds, together with all other moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary." The act of 1851 was repealed by the said act of May 3, 1852, but the repeal contained the following proviso: "Provided, the repeal in nowise affects the war loan bonds already issued under the provisions of the act so repealed." It also appears from the record that congress made an appropriation of $924,259.65, in August, 1854, to reimburse the state of California for the expenses growing out of the Indian hostilities mentioned; and that under that and subsequent reappropriations of the same moneys, or unexpended portions thereof, a large part of the bonds issued under these acts of the legislature were paid by the United States directly to the holders of the bonds, but that no part of it came into the state treasury; and that on December 15, 1884, an unexpended balance of said appropriation, amounting to $8,362.16, was covered into the surplus funds of the United States treasury; but it also appears that there remain unpaid of the bonds of 1851, $3,000; of the bonds of 1852, $16,800; and upon coupons of both issues falling due between January 1, 1854, and September 1, 1856, $173,322.28. The coupons attached to the bonds issued under the act of 1851 were payable by the state treasurer to bearer in the city of New York, and the coupons of 1852 were payable at the office of the state treasurer.

The petitioner presented his bond and coupons to the comptroller March 31, 1891, and demanded that a warrant issue requiring the treasurer to pay the amount of the principal of said bond and coupons, viz. $2,923.16, and also demanded said sum, with legal interest thereon from the maturity of said bond and of said several coupons, amounting in all to the sum of $12,464.60, which demands or either of them, the comptroller refused to comply with. It was further found that at the time of this demand there was in the general fund, after the payment of all appropriations included in and prior to the forty-second fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, the sum of $500,000; and that from 1862 to 1889, both inclusive, there was not in any year any surplus in that fund in excess of appropriations for current expenses and special appropriations for particular purposes. On these facts several questions are presented and discussed with marked ability by the learned counsel of the respective parties. These questions are: (1) Whether the liability of the state upon these bonds is primary and unconditional; and, if conditional, whether the general government has made provision for their payment. (2) Whether there has been an appropriation made for the payment of these bonds and coupons; and, if so, when such appropriation was made, and when it was first available for such payment. (3) Whether petitioner's claims are barred by the statute of limitations. And (4) whether it was the duty of the respondent, as comptroller, to draw the warrant demanded for the whole or any part of said claim.

I shall first consider the last of these propositions, assuming for that purpose only, but not deciding, that the liability of the state is primary and unconditional; that the claims of petitioner are not barred by the statute of limitations; and that there is a fund out of which they might now be paid. Section 672 of the Political Code is as follows: "The comptroller must not draw his warrant for any claim unless it has been approved by the board, and when, hereafter, the comptroller is directed to draw his warrant for any purpose, this direction must be construed as subject to the provisions of this section, unless the direction is accompanied by a special provision exempting it from its operation." By section 673 of the same Code, "claims upon the contingent fund of either house of the legislature, and for official salaries, are exempted from the operations of the provisions of the preceding twelve sections;" and this is the only general exemption found in the Political Code. If there is any special provision authorizing the comptroller to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner without first having the approval of the board of examiners, our attention has not been called to it, and we do not know of any such provision. Appellant argues, however, that for two reasons it was not necessary to present these claims to the board of examiners. The first is that the acts under which these bonds were issued were passed, and the bonds were in fact issued, before the board was created; and, second, that the bonds and coupons, being in their nature audited claims, never require presentation to any auditing board or officer. As to the first of these points, it is sufficient to say that the requirement that claims against the state shall be presented to the board of examiners in no way affects the obligation of the state to pay all valid claims, but relates only to the proceeding to obtain payment, which, like all statutes relating to remedies, may be changed from time to time; nor is the validity of such statute affected by the fact that it was enacted before the board of examiners was created, even though the new remedy may be less convenient or less prompt and speedy. Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 347. There would seem to be much force in the second of the above points made by appellant, viz. "that bonds and coupons, being in their nature audited claims, never require presentation to any auditing board or officer." Such seems originally to have been the case. The first exception we find was the act of April 1, 1872, (Laws 1871-72, p.

905,) entitled "An act concerning duplicate bonds of the funded debt of 1857," which required the board of examiners to determine whether said bonds were genuine. Whether this act in any manner led to the adoption of section 672 of the Political Code it is not necessary to inquire, but it suggested that circumstances may at any time exist rendering an examination by the board proper, if not necessary for the protection of the state. The board of examiners have judicial powers, though restricted, while the duties of the comptroller in connection with the drawing of warrants upon the treasurer seem to be purely ministerial; and the petition in this case, as well as the briefs of counsel, would indicate that there were many questions involved requiring the exercise of judicial powers. The validity of bonds executed by the officers of the state must depend upon the law under which they are issued. The state is not bound by a bond purporting to be its obligation, unless it is authorized by law, nor is it bound by conditions inserted therein not substantially conforming to the act under which they were issued. The liability of the state, therefore, involves something more than an inspection of the bond itself. The genuineness of the signatures of the officers of the state does not necessarily fix the state's liability. They are but agents of the state, and their authority to do the act in question must be found in the law. To determine these questions is not a mere ministerial act, and cannot therefore be performed by the comptroller, if he be, as to the matter of drawing warrants, simply an executive officer. The power and duty of the comptroller in the premises are the only questions before us. If he has not, as we conclude, the power to issue the warrant under the circumstances here presented, it was his duty to refuse to issue it. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider other questions presented by counsel. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WORTH et al. (No. 15,005.)

JUDGMENT ON BAIL BOND.

The fact that judgment on a bail bond is rendered against the principal, who was not summoned, and who did not appear, does not render it invalid as to the sureties, against whom judgment was also rendered, in accordance with the terms of the bond making each surety liable for the full amount thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; A. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California against Charles H. Worth, as principal, and others, as sureties, on a bail bond. Judgment for plaintiff, and the sureties appeal. Affirmed.

James W. Oates, for appellants. A. G. Burnett, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant Worth, being under arrest, charged with the commission of a criminal offense, was released from custody upon filing an undertaking on appeal, wherein he was principal, and the present appellants sureties. Upon his failure to appear, the bail bond was declared forfeited, and this action was brought to recover thereon. Judgment went for the people, and this appeal is prosecuted by the sureties on the bail bond from the judgment and order denying a new trial. There appears to have been neither a service of summons upon the defendant Charles H. Worth, nor any appearance by him, although the judgment is rendered against him, as well as the sureties upon the bail bond; and upon this ground the judgment is attacked by the appellants. The liability of each surety upon the bond was for the full amount thereof, and the judgment is to the same effect. We are unable to see in what manner appellants are injured by the judgment of which they complain. The fact that other parties are made liable by its terms should be a source of satisfaction to them, rather than of complaint, as it furnishes additional aid in bearing its burdens. Conceding the facts as contended, the wrong done by the trial court was committed against Charles H. Worth, and he has taken no appeal. The judgment is a valid judgment as to appellants in all respects, and its invalidity as to others not complaining is a matter with which they have no concern. We see no valid objection to the form of the order declaring the bail bond forfeited. For the foregoing reasons, let the judgment and order be affirmed.

GREIG v. RIORDAN et al. (No. 14,960.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—FILING CONTRACT—ASSIGNMENT—CORPORATIONS—AUTHORITY OF OFFICERS.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 1183, requiring contracts for buildings or improvements, where the price to be paid exceeds $1,000, to be in writing, and the contract or a memorandum thereof, setting forth, among other things, a statement of the general character of the work to be done, to be filed for record, failing in which, the contract to be void, and the owner liable for labor and materials, is for the benefit of laborers and material men, as well as the owner, and failure to file the plans and specifications for a building, which are an essential part of the contract for its construction, is fatal.

2. It is immaterial that the contract does not expressly refer to the plans and specifications as a part thereof, where it appears that they did in fact form a part of it, and without them it would be too indefinite and uncertain to meet the requirements of the statute.

3. An assignment of a claim by a corporation is not invalid because no authority, either in the by-laws or by resolution of the board of directors, is shown in the manager of the corporation and president, who executed the assignment, where it was made in the regular course of business, with the knowledge and consent of the board of directors.

4. There is no objection to assignment of choses in action to a third person for the purpose of collection, and in such case the legal title passes so as to entitle the assignee to sue, while the assignor retains an equitable interest with which the debtor has no concern.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles J. Slack, Judge.

Action by James Greig against Patrick W. Riordan and others to enforce mechanics' liens. From a decree for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Stanley, Story & Haynes, for appellants. Wm. H. Jordan, F. J. Fallon, Parker & Mells, Wm. H. Fifield, Joseph Leggett, Wm. L. Gibson, and Luis F. Dunand, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to enforce certain mechanics' liens against certain property on Bush street, San Francisco, known as the French Church, taken in favor of the San Francisco Lumber Company, a corporation, C. Williams, and F. G. Norman, respectively, and by them assigned to plaintiff. Nine other lienholders on the same property instituted actions to foreclose, whereupon the actions were consolidated, a trial had, and a decree entered foreclosing all the liens except that of C. Williams, held by the plaintiff, Greig, which was rejected. The appeal is from the final decree, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The original contractor for the improvement in which all the liens had their inception was one Joseph Binet, who, on the 31st of May, 1888, entered into a contract in writing with the Reverend Father Renaudier, (acting by authority of his Grace, the archbishop, P. W. Riordan, etc.,) whom we will designate as the "owner," and Binet as the "contractor." The contractor agreed within 100 working days from date to furnish the necessary labor, material, tools, implements, and appliances, and to erect and complete in a workmanlike manner the alterations and additions to be done at the French Church, on Bush street, above Grant avenue, and known as "Notre Dame des Victoires," (with the exception of the painting,) and to deliver it to the owner free from all liens and charges, "in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications for the same, made by Huerne & Everett, the architects employed by the owner, and which are signed by the parties hereto, and are to be kept and remain in the office of said architects, subject to the inspection of the parties hereto and others concerned in said election." (2) The architect was to furnish to the contractor all details and working drawings of the work to be done and materials furnished in accordance therewith, under direction and subject to approval of the architect. (3) The lot of land is described. (4) The owner was to pay therefor $10,248,—$2,552 when excavation, brick work, and entire rough framing of inside and west passage were complete; $2,552 when sashes are in, and columns, walls, arches, and partitions lathed and covered with first coat of mortar; $2,552 when work is completed and accepted by architect; and $2,552 35 days after acceptance; extra work, if any, to be paid for three-fourths when building is accepted, and one-fourth 35 days thereafter. (5) The specifications and drawings are intended to cooperate, so that any work exhibited in drawings and not mentioned in specifications, or vice versa, is to be done as though mentioned in both. (6) Owner at liberty to have changes or alterations without avoiding contract, cost thereof to be added or subtracted, as the case may be. There are numerous other provisions in the same somewhat lengthy and carefully drawn contract, but they do not seem essential to the questions raised on appeal. The contract was duly executed and filed in the office of the county recorder on the 2d day of June, 1888. The drawings and specifications were not filed, nor was any memorandum of any kind filed, except as above stated. Work was commenced under the contract, June 5, 1888, and continued until July 14, 1888, during which period some $500 worth of work was done, when, on the day last mentioned, the contractor was stopped by the fire marshal, the work as planned being in violation of the fire ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco. On the 28th day of July, 1888, the parties entered into another contract, which provided for changes from the plans and specifications, among which were that instead of raising the old roof, and building new side walls of studding, covered with laths and cement, the old roof was to be torn down, the side walls and piers carried up with brick work four feet above cornice, new roof built, brick walls to first story in rear of church, and various and sundry changes, presumably to meet the requirements of the fire ordinance or made necessary in complying therewith. These changes added to the expense $735. This second contract was not recorded. The work was performed in obedience to the contract as amended; and the payments made by the owner, as therein provided for, except the last, which, with extra work, left a balance of $2,765 in the hands of the owner, which was paid into court. In the mean time liens of subcontractors, laborers, material men, etc., were filed against the property, aggregating $5,435.

If the contract was duly filed with the recorder, as required by the statute, the owner cannot be held liable beyond the contract price. If, on the other hand, the contract was not filed, as provided by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the price agreed to be paid being in excess of $1,000, the contract was void, and the owner (the defendant here) is liable. That portion of section 1183 involved in the question as presented is as follows: "All such contracts shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds one thousand dollars, and shall be subscribed by the parties thereto, and the said contract, or a memorandum thereof, setting forth the names of all the parties to the contract, a description of the property to be affected thereby, together with a statement of the general character of the work to be done, the total amount to be paid thereunder, and the amounts of all partial payments, together with the times when such payments shall be due and payable, and shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder; * * * otherwise they shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto; and in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." The object of the statute in requiring contracts in excess of $1,000 to be filed with the recorder seems to be twofold: (1) As a security to the owner, who is thereby shielded from liability to subcontractors, laborers, and material men, beyond his contract price. (2) To afford information to all others furnishing materials or performing services in and about the contemplated improvement, upon which to predicate an opinion founded upon the value of the property, the price to be paid, and the dates of payment, as to whether the contract price is such as will probably be adequate security, and the lien therefor given to them by the statute sufficient to warrant them in bestowing their labor or furnishing materials for the proposed improvement. Manifestly, if the improvement, when completed, taken with the property upon which it is situated, is of a character having no extrinsic or market value,—as, for instance, a mill for crushing quartz rock where there is not and cannot be any quartz rock to crush,—or if, the property being valueless, the price agreed to be paid is far below the value of the work to be done, it is of the utmost importance that these facts should be known to those about to become interested. "The plans, drawings, and specifications" in conformity with which the work was to be done were not filed with the contract. They constituted, so far as the "general character of the work to be done" was concerned, the very soul and essence of the agreement. Without them the dimensions and character of the work cannot be determined. Whether it was to be composed of iron, stone, brick, or wood we cannot tell. A contract to construct a church, build a house, or sink a shaft would be just as definite as the one in question. In the matter of price to be paid, the dates of payment, etc., it was definite and certain. In the matter of "the general character of the work to be done," the contract, as filed, was, without the "plans, drawings, and specifications," which formed an essential part thereof, fatally defective. If it be urged that the contract did not in terms recite that the "plans, drawings, and specifications" were attached thereto, and made a part of the contract, the answer is twofold: (1) It abundantly appears that they formed an essential part of the contract, and they became a part thereof as effectively as though in express terms so designated. (2) Without them the contract is so indefinite and uncertain as not to comply with the requirements of the statute. We regard the recent cases decided by this court, involving substantially the same question, as conclusive of the matter against the defendant. Yancy v. Morton, 94 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. Rep. 1111; Willamette, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 Pac. Rep. 629; Holland v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 434, 18 Pac. Rep. 412. If we view the contract as filed in the light of a memorandum, the same objections are apparent and equally fatal. Willamette, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., supra. Deeming the original contract void under the statute, it is unnecessary to consider the effect of the amendments to it. They were not filed, and neither add to nor detract from the original as a valid contract.

Against the three assignments to plaintiff, Greig, for which he had judgment, appellants raise objections. The first is to the validity of the assignment by the San Francisco Lumber Company, concerning which it is urged that no authority either by-law or resolution of the board of directors was shown in Thomas Richardson, the manager of the company, or in Adams, the president, to execute the assignment to plaintiff. The assignment is in due form, and is executed by "W. J. Adams, President San Francisco Lumber Co.," and "Thomas Richardson, Manager," with the corporate seal attached. The evidence tended to show that the assignment was made in the regular course of business of the corporation to plaintiff for collection, the company still having the equitable interest in the claim. In the language of the manager, Richardson, who was a witness: "This is a corporation. When it was necessary to make the assignment, we talked the matter over in the board, and it was decided that I should make the assignment to Mr. Greig, for the purpose of collecting this amount. * * * The company is not at present the owner of the claim. * * * The indorsement upon the document is the corporate seal of the company. It was placed there by the secretary." Again: "I don't think it was made a matter of resolution, but it was a matter which we are in the habit of doing in the regular way of business. I had the power to do so,—to make the assignment." There was testimony to the effect that it was not entered in the record, because they did not usually do that, and that the matter was discussed at meetings of the board in the ordinary way, and Richardson, the general manager, was at a regular meeting of the board authorized to do as he thought best as to the assignment. There was a period in the history of corporations when the most ordinary transactions were required to be authorized by solemn resolution of the board of trustees, duly entered in their records, and authenticated by the corporate seal. With the multiplication of corporations, having for their object nearly every business pursuit known to modern times, the formalities previously regarded as necessary, and which were illy adapted to pursuits requiring prompt action, have been greatly abridged. "Corporations," says Bronson, C. J., in Gillett v. Campbell, 1 Denio, 522, "like individuals, may appoint agents and make most of the contracts which fall within the scope of their general powers without the use of a seal. The rule was once otherwise, but that day has gone by." The case in which the above language was used was one in which the president and cashier of a bank, for the purpose of securing a debt owed by the bank, had assigned a debt due to the bank, and it was objected that no authority to make the assignment had been shown by the by-laws of the company or a resolution of the board of directors, and the validity of the assignment was upheld. McKiernan v. Lenzen, 56 Cal. 61, was in many respects similar to the case at bar, and the power of the general manager to assign a book account for lumber sold by the corporation to a creditor of the corporation, in payment of an existing debt, was upheld. Waterman on Corporations, at section 30, says: "As a general managing agent and superintendent is the representative of the corporation, and may do in the transaction of its ordinary affairs what the corporation itself could do within the scope of its powers, he may assign the chose in action of the corporation to its creditors either in payment of or as security for the payment of a precedent debt of the corporation without express authority of the board of directors." The following cases uphold the same general principle: Bank v. Kohner, 85 N. Y. 190; Ringling v. Kohn, 6 Mo. App. 333; Donnell v. Bank, 80 Mo. 170; Association v. Martin, 39 Kan. 750, 18 Pac. Rep. 941; Seeley v. Lumber Co., 59 Cal. 24; Jennings v. Bank, 79 Cal. 328, 21 Pac. Rep. 852; Smith v. Mining Co., 66 Cal. 398, 5 Pac. Rep. 688; Centertown Co. v. Swigart, (Kan.) 23 Pac. Rep. 569. In the conveyance of real estate and in transactions outside the usual scope of their business, corporations are held to much of the strictness by which they were governed in former times. They must act as individuals may act, through agents, and, within the general scope of their ordinary business, their managing agents can bind their principals as can those of an individual; and, if their agents transcend their powers, the corporations, having knowledge thereof and not specially repudiating the act, are equally bound as individuals would be under like circumstances. The defendant here is only concerned to know that the assignment here is of such a character as to bind the assignor. That the assignor is and will be bound by the act of its general manager is evident from the fact which appears, that the transaction was in the ordinary course of business of the corporation. (2) Because the corporation had notice of the assignment, and made no objection thereto. (3) Because the evidence, although not clear and explicit, is sufficient to uphold the position that the board of directors, sitting as such, authorized the assignment, it not being an act requiring a formal resolution to be entered of record. The objections to the other assignments are not deemed important. William H. Jordan was the attorney for plaintiff, and as such, at the request of the several assignors, prepared the assignments, and, after their execution they were read by the assignee, and apparently left with his said attorney. The assignments were made for collection, and no consideration was paid by the assignee. It is matter of common knowledge that, for the purpose of saving expense, commercial associations and others resort to this method. In such cases the assignee becomes the legal holder of the chose in action, which is sufficient to entitle him to recover, while the assignor retains an equitable interest in the thing assigned, which is of no moment to the debtor. Pom. Rem. (2d Ed.) § 132; Gradwohl v. Harris, 29 Cal. 154; Allen v. Brown, 44 N. Y. 228; Williams v. Norton, 3 Kan. 295; Toby v. Railroad Co., (decided June 9, 1893,) 33 Pac. Rep. 550. I find no error in the record calling for a reversal, and am of opinion the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

BURNS v. SENNETT et al. (No. 14,955.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 26, 1893.)
INJURY TO SERVANT — NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—EVIDENCE—CUSTOM AND USAGE—IN-STRUCTIONS.

1. The rule that a master is bound to furnish safe appliances, and cannot escape liability for failure to do so by intrusting the duty to a servant, by whose negligence a fellow servant is injured, does not apply where several persons are employed to do certain work, and by the contract of employment, express or implied, they are to adjust the appliances by which the work is to be done.

2. The fact that a servant injured by the negligence of fellow servants in putting up appliances for doing the work, and which were to be put up by them, thus relieving the master from liability for their negligence, was not hired until several days after the others, and after the appliances had been adjusted, does not make the master liable, as the new servant takes the risk of existing negligence of his fellow servants.

3. In an action against master stevedores for injuries to one employed to help load a vessel, caused by the negligence of a fellow servant in adjusting the appliances, where defendants claim that the servants were required to adjust the appliances, and that the negligence was therefore that of a fellow servant, for which they were not liable, defendants may prove, where the contract of hiring is silent on the question, that there was to plaintiff's knowledge a custom among stevedores at that place under which employees were required to adjust appliances for loading and unloading.

4. On the question whether a master used reasonable care in adjusting appliances, he may show that the adjustment was made in the manner in which such appliances are usually adjusted.

5. Error of the court in the charge given on his own motion in ignoring a principle on which the case depends is not rendered harmless by a correct charge on the point, given in an isolated instruction requested by a party.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Patrick Burns against Sennett & Miller, for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for appellants. Mich. Mullany and Wm. Grant, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants. Verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Appellants were stevedores; and, at the time respondent was injured, they were engaged in loading wheat into a certain ship named Chala, for which purpose they had employed a gang of workmen, and a foreman named Wyatt. On June 7, 1889, respondent was one of the gang, and assisting to load the wheat into said ship. His particular work at the time was that of what is called a "slingman;" that is, it was his duty to place on the wharf a "sling," or endless ring of rope, and after the warehousemen had placed thereon a certain number of sacks of wheat, to bring the ends of the sling up over the load, to "reeve" one end of the sling through the other, to put the lift hook through the loop, and to steady the ascending load while within his reach, and then get ready another sling for the next load. When the lift hook was put into the loop, the load was raised by steam power, applied through certain machinery and apparatus until it was above the side of the ship, when it was pulled aboard by another employe. On the day last named, while a load of wheat was thus ascending, it suddenly dropped upon respondent, and caused the injuries for which he seeks damages in this action. The transcript contains minute descriptions of the various things, which, when put in place and properly united and adjusted, constitute the apparatus used in loading or discharging cargoes, but it is sufficient to say here that they consist of a hoisting engine and certain ropes, working blocks and tackle, pulleys, straps, hooks, swivels, etc.; and, with respect to the cause of the accident by which respondent was injured, it is sufficient to say that most of the apparatus is to a great extent sustained and kept in place by being attached by hooks to what is called a "strap," which is a ring of rope placed around the masthead just above the crosstrees, and that the falling of the load of wheat was caused by the breaking or giving way of this strap. The strap was constructed and put in place by employes assigned to that work by the foreman. The strap should have been "parceled;" that is, properly wrapped or covered with canvas, so as to prevent it from being chafed by contact with the crosstrees.

We do not think that there was evidence in this case to warrant the jury in finding that the accident by which respondent was hurt was caused by the negligence of any person, except in this respect: we think that possibly, taking all the evidence and circumstances in proof, the jury were warranted in finding that the accident was caused by the negligent manner in which the strap was constructed, adjusted, or parceled. The question in the case, therefore, assuming that there was such negligence, is this: Are appellants liable to respondent for the result of the said negligence as to said strap? And this can be correctly answered only by determining whether or not the proper placing and maintaining of the strap was a positive duty which the appellants personally owed to respondent. Daves v. Railroad Co., (Cal.) 32 Pac. Rep. 708; Railroad Co. v. Baugh, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914. The general rule is well established that an employe cannot recover judgment against his employer for personal injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. The authorities to this point are numerous, but it is only necessary to cite here the most recent decisions of this court upon the subject, (Daves v. Railroad Co., supra, and Congrave v. Railroad Co., 88 Cal. 360, 26 Pac. Rep. 175,) and the recent decision of the supreme court of the United States in Railroad Co. v. Baugh, supra; and, if in the case at bar the adjustment and maintenance of the said strap was not a duty which appellants owed personally to respondent, then all the gang of men employed by appellants in loading the ship were fellow servants, and respondent could not recover of appellants for injuries caused by the negligence of one or more of said fellow servants in constructing, parceling, etc., said strap. There is another general rule, however, under which alone, upon the facts so far appearing, respondent can maintain this action, if he can maintain it at all; and that general rule is that an employer must furnish machinery and appliances reasonably suitable and safe for the employe to do his work. In such a case the employer is, of course, not bound to insure the employe against any defect in such appliances, but he is bound to use reasonable care in their selection or construction; and, where that rule applies, the duty to furnish such machinery and appliances is one which the employer owes personally to the employe, and he cannot escape that duty by trusting it to an employe who negligently performs it. Does that rule apply to the case at bar, and were there any errors prejudicial to appellants committed by the court below bearing upon that question?

While the general rule is as above stated, still it is well established that the rule does not apply to a case where several persons are employed to do certain work, and by the contract of employment, either express or implied, the employes are to adjust the appliances by which the work is to be done. For instance, if several men are employed to paint a building, or to do some work upon it which requires scaffolding, or some other temporary structure or appliance to support the workmen, the employer to furnish the materials and the employe to construct or adjust the scaffolding or other appliance, the employer is not liable to one of the employes for the careless act of another employe done in the construction, adjustment, or maintenance of the structure or appliance. There are many cases establishing and illustrating this principle, and applying it to a variety of facts, a few of which are the following: Peschel v. Railway Co., 62 Wis. 338, 21 N. W. Rep. 269; Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. Rep. 1017; Killea v. Faxon, 125 Mass. 485; Ross v. Walker, 139 Pa. St. 42, 21 Atl. Rep. 157, 159; Benn v. Null, 65 Iowa, 407, 21 N. W. Rep. 700; Bowen v. Railway Co., 95 Mo. 268, 8 S. W. Rep. 230.

With respect to the giving and refusing of instructions on the point above stated, it would be impossible, within reasonable limits, to notice each instruction in detail; and we will confine ourselves to a general view of them. Some of the instructions asked by appellants and refused or modified by the court—particularly Nos. 3 and 7—might well have been given as asked; but we cannot say that appellants were prejudiced by their refusal, in view of the fact that the court, at appellants' request, gave instruction No. 6, which is as follows: "If a master employs servants to perform a particular service, in the course of which it is necessary for them to construct and adjust machines or appliances for their own use in such service, then, in the absence of any special contract to the contrary, the master is only bound to furnish proper materials from which to construct such machines or appliances, and is not bound to see that such machines or appliances are properly constructed or adjusted." But the charge given by the court of its own motion to the jury, while in the main correct, seems to overlook or ignore the principle contained in said instruction No. 6. It may be plausibly argued that the jury are presumed to have considered the charge of the court as modified by said instruction No. 6; but as the said instruction was an isolated one, given at the request of a party, the jury would have much more surely understood the court if, in its own charge, it had made express reference to the principle stated in said instruction. We do not see at present that the instructions on this point are subject to further criticism. We have said enough, we think, on the subject to guide the court in the event of another trial.

We think, however, that the court did not carry out the principle of said instruction No. 6 in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence, and that errors prejudicial to appellants were committed in excluding certain testimony which they offered. We do not think that the various isolated and detached pieces of machinery and appliances above described, when temporarily put together for the purpose of loading or unloading a particular ship, can be properly considered as one entire and permanent machine or appliance, in the sense, for instance, in which a locomotive or a railroad track may be so considered. Peschel v. Railway Co., 62 Wis. 342, 21 N. W. Rep. 269. It is evident from the nature of the business of a stevedore that the temporary adjustment of these detached pieces has to be frequently made, as often as they are removed from one ship to another. Now, it is contended by appellants that, when a gang of men are employed to go to work at loading a ship, it is a part of the contract of employment that they are to adjust the appliances with which they are to work, and that to make the adjustment is not a duty owing personally by the employer. If this be so, then the employer is not liable to the employe for damages caused by the negligent act of another employe in making such adjustment. In order to prove that the employment was as contended, appellants asked their witness Wyatt, who was their foreman, and an experienced stevedore, these questions: "Question. Is there a custom among stevedores in San Francisco in regard to the putting up of gear and tackle for discharging and loading ships? Q. What is the custom, if there is any, of stevedores in San Francisco, as to putting up gear and tackle for discharging and loading ships? Does the master stevedore undertake to furnish the men with gear and tackle put up and in order, or is it a part of the work for which the men are hired to put up their own gear and tackle, and take care of it?" To these questions respondent objected as "incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant," and the objection was sustained. Appellants then, in connection with the last question, made the following offer: "We propose by this question, and by others which will follow it, to prove by this witness and other witnesses whom we propose to call that by the custom of stevedores in San Francisco, at and before the time of plaintiff's employment, the gang of men employed to discharge or load a vessel were required, as a part of the work for which they were hired, to put up and take care of all the gear and tackle necessary for their use, the master undertaking to furnish only suitable rope, blocks, and other material for that purpose; that this custom was well known to plaintiff at the time; that he and his fellow members of the gang were employed under that custom, and without any contract to the contrary, for the discharge and loading of the ship so far as he was employed in it,"—to which the same general objection was sustained. The witness was then asked this question: "When you hired this gang of men, was it their duty to take care of the gear and tackle? Were they hired for that purpose?" And a general objection to the question was sustained. Of their witness Redmond, also an experienced stevedore, appellants asked these questions: "Q. What does the master stevedore furnish to the gang of men when he has taken the job of discharging a ship? Q. Does the master stevedore undertake or contract to furnish to the gang of men employed to discharge or load a ship anything except the material to put up, which, when put up, will constitute the rigging necessary for the work to be done? Q. What, if anything, does the master stevedore contract to furnish to the gang of men employed to load or discharge a ship?" To each of these questions the general objection was made that it was "irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent," and the objection was sustained. Appellants duly excepted to all of said rulings.

We think that, in sustaining the objections to the above questions and offered evidence the court erred. There possibly may have been some valid special objections to the form of some of the questions, or to some particular language used, as calling for the opinion of the witness; but we think that the general objections to them should have been overruled. The purpose of the offered evidence was to show what the real contract was between the employer and the employed, which the other evidence in the case left in doubt. For instance, we cannot imagine what valid objection there could be to the question: "Were they hired for that purpose?" Moreover, we think that so far as the offered testimony involved proof of the usage, if any such there were, which entered into a general employment to load or unload a ship, in the absence of a special contract, it should have been admitted. A usage, of course, cannot be given in evidence to relieve a party from his express stipulation, or to vary a contract certain in its terms; but it has a legitimate office in aiding to interpret the intentions of parties to a contract, the real character of which is to be ascertained, not from express stipulations, but from general implications and presumptions. Section 1982 of the Civil Code provides that "an employe must perform his service in conformity to the usage of the place of performance;" and the general doctrine of usage has frequent express recognition in the Codes. See Civil Code, §§ 1645-1647, 1655, 1656; Code Civil Proc. § 1870, subd. 12; Id. § 1963, subd. 12. See, also, Fraylor v. Mining Co., 17 Cal. 595; Winans v. Hassey, 48 Cal. 634; Gillett v. Mawman, 1 Taunt. 137; Vaughn v. Gardner, 7 B. Mon. 330. Our opinion, therefore, is that appellants should have been allowed to introduce evidence of the existence of said usage, and that the court erred in excluding the said testimony offered for that purpose; and it is quite clear that, if such testimony was admissible, it was material, and that its exclusion was prejudicial to appellants.

The fact that the date of respondent's employment was a day or two subsequent to that of the employment of some of the other men does not affect the operation of the rule. It was said by the court in Butler v. Townsend, supra, as follows: "The new servant takes the risk of any existing negligence of his fellow servants, as well as that which may thereafter occur. It may possibly be that if the lumpers had been discharged, and ceased to be servants at all, and the defendants, hiring others, had furnished the erected and completed staging for their use, a different question would have arisen, perhaps involving some new duty of the master; but nothing of that kind occurred. Calkers and lumpers at the time of the accident were working together upon the same vessel, for the same general purpose, and under the common master, when the negligence became operative which caused the injury. Tracing it back to an earlier origin is of no consequence, unless thereby some new duty of the master has been brought into existence."

There are only one or two other points necessary to be noticed. Appellants excepted to a ruling of the court excluding evidence that respondent and appellants belonged to an association called the "Riggers' & Stevedores' Union," which undertakes to regulate and restrict the employment of men by stevedores. The exception is not pressed in the briefs; but, as, the point may arise on another trial, it is proper to say that we do not think that the court erred in excluding the evidence. It is barely possible that such evidence might be admissible under peculiar circumstances, but it was clearly not admissible when offered in this case.

Assuming that it was the duty of appellants to construct, adjust, and maintain the entire hoisting apparatus and appliances as a whole, still they could be held to only reasonable care in the premises, and it was admissible for them to prove that such care was exercised in constructing and adjusting said strap; and for that purpose we think that appellants were entitled to introduce evidence that the strap was "put up in the manner in which such straps are usually put up," and that the court erred in sustaining an objection to the question on that subject asked by appellants of their witness George Wyatt. That fact, if proven, would not be conclusive proof of due care; but it was proper matter to be considered by the jury in arriving at a conclusion on the subject. The rule was properly stated by this court in Barrett v. Railroad Co., 91 Cal. 303, 27 Pac. Rep. 666, as follows: "The fact that the turntable was latched in the way such tables are usually fastened, or according to the usual custom of other railroads, although a matter which the jury had a right to consider in passing upon the question whether defendant exercised ordinary care in the way it maintained the table, was not of itself conclusive proof of the fact." Stout v. Railroad Co., 2 Dill. 294; O'Malley v. Railway Co., 43 Minn. 289, 45 N. W. Rep. 440."

It is not necessary to consider the denial of appellants' motion for a continuance, or the matter of newly-discovered evidence. Whether or not respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in standing under the ascending load was a question for the jury, under the conflicting evidence on that point. We notice no other points necessary to be discussed. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

(4 Cal. Unrep. 163)

CLEMENTS et al. v. MCGINN et al. (No. 15,099.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1893.)

WILLS—CONTEST—MENTAL CAPACITY—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—FINDINGS.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. §§ 1330, 1331, providing that, where a will is admitted to probate without contest, any person interested may within one year initiate a contest, and if it shall appear that the will is invalid, etc., the probate must be annulled and revoked, and the powers of the executor must cease, where a contest is initiated in time, and the will found invalid, it must be set aside in toto, and not left standing as to persons not joining in the contest. Estate of Freud, 15 Pac. Rep. 135, 73 Cal. 555, explained and followed. Samson

v. Samson, 30 Pac. Rep. 979, 64 Cal. 327, distinguished.

2. On the contest of a will on the ground of mental incapacity, the will having been previously admitted to probate, contestants only have the burden of proving the issues raised, and an instruction that the probate of the will raises a presumption of mental capacity, which contestants must also overcome, is properly refused, as imposing an additional burden.

3. On the contest of a will on the ground of mental incapacity, declarations of testator are admissible to explain his peculiar actions only when made at about the time of such actions, and therefore a letter by him is not admissible to explain certain conduct, where it is without date, and there is nothing to show when it was written.

4. The discharge of a person from an insane asylum by the resident physician and secretary, though the certificate does not state that she is restored to reason, is prima facie evidence that she is so restored, or that she was improperly committed, and is therefore a competent witness, these being the only grounds for her discharge under the statute.

5. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1880, declaring that persons "who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination" cannot be witnesses, the fact that a person has been committed to an asylum as insane does not render her an incompetent witness, but the question of competency is for the court, and her testimony is properly received, in the absence of anything to show her of unsound mind.

6. A witness cannot on cross-examination, for the purpose of impeaching him, be asked as to his having been in jail, etc., as, under Code Civil Proc. § 2051, he cannot be questioned as to particular wrongful acts.

7. On the contest of a will, a special finding that testator was not of "sound mind" is a finding of an ultimate fact, and not a mere conclusion of law.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceeding by Mary A. Clements and another against Eugene McGinn and others to contest the will of James McGinn, deceased, which had been admitted to probate. There was a judgment for contestants, and proponents appeal. Affirmed.

P. Reddy, W. H. Metson, Smith & Muraskey, and Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellants. James L. Crittenden and H. S. Foote, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a contest over the last will of James McGinn, who departed this life on or about February 6, 1888, at the city and county of San Francisco, leaving a last will, bearing date September 26, 1887, by which he left to his executors, in trust for his wife, Johanna McGinn, during her life, all of his property, real and personal, of the value of $60,000 or more, and, upon the death of his said wife, the same was bequeathed and devised to his children by said wife, to the exclusion of certain other of his children by a former wife. The will was admitted to probate, and Eugene McGinn and Joseph Byrne, therein named as executors, were duly appointed as such executors. In due time, Mary A. Clements and Emma Burns, two of testator's daughters by a former marriage, initiated a contest to annul and revoke the probate of said will, and to obtain a decree adjudging the invalidity thereof upon various grounds, among which were (1) that the will was made under duress; (2) undue influence and duress; (3) fraud on the part of Johanna McGinn and others, whereby the execution of said will was procured; (4) that James McGinn was of unsound mind and insane, and not of sound and disposing mind and memory, when said last will was made, signed, published, and executed. Answers were filed by the executors, by Johanna McGinn, the widow, and Ellen Frances McGinn, her daughter, which answers were, by stipulation of the attorneys, treated as the answers of all the minor children of James and Johanna McGinn. Under the pleadings, 17 issues were framed and submitted to a jury impaneled to try the cause, all of which were answered by said jury in favor of the respondents below and appellants here, except one, which was answered in favor of contestants. It was as follows: "Eleventh issue. Was the said James McGinn of sound mind at the time said instrument was subscribed by him, and when the said James F. Tevlin and said James F. Smith signed their names to the same?" To which the jury answered "No." The issues as submitted, with the answers thereto, are too lengthy to be set out in full here. It may be said of them in brief that the findings of the jury thereon were complete and specific, and were to the effect that no fraud, duress, menace, or undue influence was practiced upon the testator by Johanna McGinn or any other person in the matter of the will; that it was duly made, executed, witnessed, published, and declared to be the last will and testament of said James McGinn, and was never by him annulled or revoked, and was only invalid by reason of said testator not being of sound mind at the date of its execution, viz. September 26, 1887. Upon the verdict of the jury, the court entered a decree adjudging that the said James McGinn was not of sound and disposing mind on the 26th day of September, 1887, at the time when said alleged will was signed and published, and that said alleged will is not the last will and testament of James McGinn, deceased, and revoking the probate of the same. This appeal is prosecuted from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The trial of the cause was on for 67 days, extending from November 15, 1888, to April 20, 1889. The transcript consists of 342 printed pages, of which over 150 pages are devoted to the evidence and objections thereto. The instructions of the court to the jury cover some 60 pages. Many exceptions were reserved at the trial. A careful review of the whole case leads to the conclusion that a few only of them need be mentioned.

The testimony tended to show that the testator, James McGinn, was a long time a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, where he was engaged in the business of an undertaker. He was twice married. By his first wife he had six children, who survived him, four of whom were boys and two girls. By his second wife, Johanna McGinn, who still survives, he had five children, who survived him. Testator seems to have been naturally of an excitable temperament and irascible disposition. For some time prior to August 3, 1887, he was in failing health, and complained of severe pains in his head, and on the last-named date had a sudden and serious attack of paralysis, from the effects of which he was helpless and speechless for a considerable time, and from which he never entirely recovered. The will in question was executed September 26, 1887, and the testator died on or about February 6, 1888, as before stated. The question as to whether or not testator was of sound and disposing mind at the date of the execution of the said will involved the prominent proposition in the litigation. Many witnesses were called to the point by the contestants, the most of whom, as intimate acquaintances of testator, concurred in the opinion that he was mentally insane.

The first contention of the appellants is that the eleventh finding of the jury is not a question of fact, but a conclusion of law. The term "sound mind," as applied to the condition or status of testator, was a fact. It was for the purposes of the case a ultimate fact, in the establishment of which the physical condition of the party, his acts and conduct, were the probative facts. According to the finding of the jury, testator was not of sound mind at the date of the execution of the will; in other words, he was of unsound mind. "A person of unsound mind is an adult who, from infirmity of mind, is incapable of managing himself or his affairs. The term, therefore, includes insane persons, idiots, and imbeciles." Black, Law Dict.; Jenkins v. Jenkins' Heirs, 2 Dana, 103. It is the possession of a sound mind which is one of the requisites to capacity to make a will. Civil Code, § 1270. The term "disposing capacity or mind" are alternative or synonymous phrases in the law of wills for "sound mind" and "testamentary capacity." Black, Law Dict. The expression "unsound mind" equally stands for and includes the want of a disposing mind or testamentary capacity.

It is also contended that the decree or judgment should not have been to set aside or vacate the probate of the will, as to those who did not contest, and Samson v. Samson, 64 Cal. 327, 30 Pac. Rep. 979, is cited in support of the position. Counsel also suggests a conflict between this case and that of Estate of Freud, 73 Cal. 555, 15 Pac. Rep. 135. We think a reference to the Code will show—First, that the contention of ap pellants is not tenable; second, that there is no conflict between the cases above mentioned. Section 1330 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that where, as in the present case, a will is admitted to probate without contest, any person interested may within one year initiate a contest, and if, upon a hearing, it shall appear that the will is invalid or not sufficiently proven to be the last will of the testator, the probate must be annulled and revoked; and the next section provides that thereupon the powers of the executor, etc., must cease. The Case of Freud was, like the present one, within these provisions, and hence there was properly a revocation of the probate in toto. The case of Samson v. Samson, supra, came within the purview of section 1333, which provides that, if no person contests the validity of the will within one year after its probate, such probate shall be conclusive except against infants, etc., who within one year after their disability is removed may contest. Ten years had elapsed in that case between the probate of the will and the contest by an infant, whose disability had been removed within one year next before filing the contest, and it was held that the other heirs were concluded by the lapse of time, and hence that, as to them, the probate should not be set aside.

At the trial, one W. J. Mallady was called as a witness on behalf of contestants, and testified as follows: "I knew James McGinn twenty years. Was in his employ about eight years. James McGinn was always very friendly with me. I enjoyed his confidence and friendship up to the time of his last sickness. On one occasion, when he met me on Montgomery street during his last sickness, he was not cordial or friendly with me as he used to be. He treated me coldly. My opinion is that James McGinn was of unsound mind during his last illness. One of my reasons for this opinion is that he treated me coldly and unfriendly on this occasion when he met me on Montgomery street." Upon cross-examination, counsel for defendants, after proving by witness that he knew the handwriting of testator, showed him a paper, and asked him if it was in the handwriting of James McGinn. The paper was objected to as evidence, on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and that its identification is irrelevant and immaterial. The objection was sustained, and the ruling excepted to. The paper is set out in the record, and is without date. It purports to be a letter signed by James McGinn, addressed to the captain of Boston police, asking for information of one James Mallady, formerly of Boston, and now known as William J. Mallady, and residing in San Francisco; expresses doubts as to his honesty; and seeks information as to his previous career, etc. The object, as we may well suppose, was to show a lack of confidence in and friendship for the witness on the part of McGinn, and thus to account for the treatment of the former by the latter when they met on Montgomery street, as stated in the direct examination. Wherever the bodily or mental feelings of an individual are material as proof upon an issue, the usual expression of such feelings made at the time in question is said to be not hearsay, but original evidence, and, as such, admissible. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 102. The difficulty which meets us in the solution of the question here is that there is no date to the document offered in evidence, and no means by which to determine the time when the expressions in it were used. The witness had known McGinn 21 years, and had been in his employ about 8 years, but during which 8 years of the 21 does not appear. For aught that is shown, the letter may have been written at almost any time within this extended period. The authorities are quite uniform to the effect that expressions indicative of mental or bodily feeling must be confined to the period of the happening of the event which they illustrate. If, in the present instance, the instrument was intended to show a revulsion of feeling towards the witness on the part of a sane man for valid cause, we are of opinion it should have appeared that it emanated prior to the alleged attack upon which his unsoundness of mind was predicated, or at least prior to the alleged meeting on Montgomery street. If made subsequently, it may have been promoted by the vagary of a disordered mind, and could not be received as rational support and reason for the changed conduct of McGinn towards the witness. We cannot therefore say there was error in the exclusion of the instrument.

There was no error in the ruling of the court excluding the evidence as to the reasons which induced the witness James McGinn to visit his father. The particular visit is not specified. He had testified as to the condition in which he found his father, and it might well be that he visited him upon the most weighty matter of business, supposing him sane, only to find him in the condition he described. A witness cannot, on cross-examination, for the purpose of impeaching him, be questioned as to particular wrongful acts. Code Civil Proc. § 2051; Jones v. Duchow, 87 Cal. 109, 23 Pac. Rep. 371, and 25 Pac. Rep. 256; Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. Rep. 26, 131; Evans v. De Lay, 81 Cal. 103, 22 Pac. Rep. 408. It follows that the questions propounded to witness Thomas McGinn as to his having been in the county jail, etc., were improper. People v. Carolan, 71 Cal. 195, 12 Pac. Rep. 52.

Mrs. Johanna McGinn was called as a witness on the part of contestants, and her testimony was objected to, upon the ground that she was incompetent to testify by reason of having been found to be of unsound mind, and an exception was taken to the ruling of the court permitting her to testify. The evidence already before the court showed that Johanna McGinn, on the 13th day of December, 1882, was by order of the superior court, or a judge thereof, committed to the asylum for the insane at Napa as an insane person, upon a certificate showing her to be afflicted with a form of insanity known as "recurrent mania;" also a certificate dated November 4, 1883, signed by the resident physician and secretary, discharging Johanna McGinn from the Napa State Asylum for the Insane, but which did not state affirmatively that she was "cured and restored to reason." The provisions of Code Civil Proc. §§ 1763-1766, both inclusive, relate to the appointment and discharge of guardians, and the care and custody of the property of insane and incompetent persons, and, for the purposes specified therein, are of controlling force and effect; and the adjudication of incompetency there provided for is conclusive against all persons dealing with the ward until he is restored to competency to manage his affairs, as provided by section 1766 of the same Code, except as limited by section 40 of the Civil Code. Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 192, 25 Pac. Rep. 677, discusses the provisions of the Code and the cases to which their several provisions are applicable, and we need not repeat the reasoning there indulged in here. The conclusion reached in that case is that a discharge from the asylum, either because improperly committed or upon the ground that the insane inmate has recovered, as provided in section 2197 of the Political Code, restores the person to capacity to sue, save where a guardian has been appointed under the Code of Civil Procedure. The question of the capacity of a witness to testify, however, does not turn upon the point whether or not he has been declared insane, or, when so declared, upon the question of judicial restoration. Section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "The following persons cannot be witnesses: (1) Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination." This is substantially the rule as it has existed for generations, and was the rule of the common law. The unsound mind mentioned is unsound in fact in contradistinction to those who have been judicially declared of unsound mind. An insane person is competent to be a witness if he understands the nature of an oath, and has sufficient mental power to give a correct account of what he has seen or heard. District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 519, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 840; People v. New York Hospital, 3 Abb. N. C. 243; Busw. Insan. § 344, and cases cited. The question whether a person who is offered as a witness is insane at the time goes to the competency of the witness, and is a preliminary question to be decided by the court. Cannady v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 435, 8 N. W. Rep. 164; Holcomb v. Holcomb, 28 Conn. 177; Grant v. Thomp- son, 4 Conn. 203; Coleman v. Com., 25 Grat. 865. Section 2197 of the Political Code provides that "insane persons received in the asylum must, upon recovery, be discharged therefrom." The only other ground for a discharge is that provided by the act of March 9, 1885, by which it is made the duty of the resident physician to discharge persons who have been improperly committed. St. 1885, p. 35. As was held in Kellogg v. Cochran, supra, a discharge for either of these causes (where no guardian has been appointed) restores the person to civil capacity. In Hand v. Burrows, 23 Hun, 330, it was held that a commission might be issued to take the testimony of one committed to a lunatic asylum in another state, on the ground of insanity, and that the presiding judge would, before admitting it in evidence, determine by the answers given and such witnesses as might be produced as to the mental condition of the witness, and consequent admissibility of the evidence. We are of opinion, then—First, that the discharge of the witness from the asylum was prima facie evidence that she was restored to reason, and was of sound mind, or that she was improperly committed to such asylum; second, that in any event the question of her incompetency to testify was one for the court below to determine, and, nothing appearing either from a preliminary examination or from the tenor of her testimony to indicate unsoundness of mind at the date of her examination, no error was committed.

There are numerous other exceptions in the record based upon the rulings of the court upon questions asked by appellants on cross-examination of witnesses, some of which rulings were correct, some clearly upon matters within the discretion of the court, and others which, although of doubtful propriety, are not of sufficient importance to warrant a reversal. We do not feel called upon to notice them in detail. The instructions were voluminous, and presented to the jury the questions of law applicable to the case with great clearness. A number of those asked by respondents and refused were evidently so refused because others precisely similar or of substantially similar import had been given. Others refused or modified related to issues decided in favor of respondents, and hence need not be considered. The court eliminated from the eighth instruction asked by appellants so much thereof as instructed the jury that the previous probate of the will raised a presumption that McGinn was, at the time of its execution, of sound and disposing mind, and competent to make a will, "and, unless the contestants have overcome not only this presumption, but all of the other evidence in the case offered in support of said presumption and the sanity of the said testator, by a preponderance of evidence and to your satisfaction, you will find in accordance with said presumption," etc. The action of the court was proper. It had already instructed the jury very properly that "the burden is upon the contestants in this proceeding to prove and establish the issues made herein by a preponderance of evidence, and, unless so established, you will find each and every issue against said contestants." The contestants had the affirmative upon all the issues made, and therefore the burden of proof was upon them. Estate of Dalrymple, 67 Cal. 444, 7 Pac. Rep. 906; In re Burrell, 77 Cal. 479, 19 Pac. Rep. 880. That portion of the instruction stricken out, however, assumed, in addition to and beyond all this, the probate of the will cast an additional burden of proof upon the contestants, which was not true. Had they appeared at the probate of the will, and made the same issues, they would have had the same burden cast upon them, no greater, no less. The other objections to instructions are less important, and require no special mention. Those given on behalf of contestants were proper. Upon the whole, the instructions were quite as favorable to respondents (appellants here) as the law permits, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HOGAN v. PACIFIC ENDOWMENT LEAGUE. (No. 14,996.)

ENDOWMENT ASSOCIATION—ASSESSMENTS—LEGALITY—DIRECTORS—AUTHORITY TO AMEND BY-LAWS—DIVERSION OF ENDOWMENT FUND.

1. The by-laws of an "endowment league" provided for general and endowment funds created by quarterly dues and monthly assessments, and for the payment of matured endowment coupons out of the general fund, provided the holder is "in good standing" at the maturity of the coupon. They also provided that, "when the demands on the endowment fund require, the levy of additional assessments shall be made;" that such fund should only be used to pay matured coupons; and that the board of directors are "invested with full power to enact laws for the government of the league." Held, that such board had no authority, without the consent of all the members, to divide the endowment fund, and create a reserve fund, by amendment to the by-laws, so that the demands on the former fund would "require the levy of additional assessments," and add to the condition of payment of coupons that "the assessment or assessments levied for the month in which the coupon is payable" must be paid.

2. Where, at the time of the levy of certain extra assessments on a member, there was more than enough money in the endowment fund, and in other funds not provided for by the by-laws at the time he became a member, to which part of the former fund had been transferred, to meet all obligations payable out of the endowment fund, such extra assessments are illegal, though the amount in the endowment fund as kept by the association was insufficient to pay such obligations.

3. Assessments levied to meet prospective obligations on endowment coupons are illegal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by Thomas C. Hogan against the Pacific Endowment League to recover the sum alleged to be due on a matured endowment coupon issued by defendant to plaintiff. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene N. Deuprey, for appellant. Geo. D. Collins, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The following is a copy of the complaint in this action: "The plaintiff in the above-entitled action complains of the defendant therein, and for cause of action alleges: (1) That said defendant is a voluntary and unincorporated association of a very large number of persons, and has for its object the payment of endowments in the sum of five hundred dollars at certain periods computed according to the age of the member, until the aggregate payments to each member amount to the sum of five thousand dollars. That said sums of five hundred dollars are paid to the members out of a fund created for that special purpose, and held by defendant in trust for the purpose of said payment. That said fund is designated the 'Endowment Fund,' and is composed of the proceeds from assessments levied upon the members to meet the payment of said endowment of five hundred dollars as the same becomes due, and is also composed of fines levied for nonpayment of said assessments and the accumulation of interests derived from investments of said assessments when collected. That said assessments and fines are levied by said defendant upon its members. That, at all the times hereinafter mentioned, the persons composing the said association transacted the business thereof at said city and county of San Francisco, under the common name of 'Pacific Endowment League,' and made and executed all business concerning the same in, under, and by said name. That heretofore, to wit, during the year 1888, and prior to August of that year, this plaintiff was admitted to membership in said defendant association, and did join the same, and thereby became a member thereof, in good standing, and has continuously ever since been a member of said defendant association, in good standing therein. (2) That heretofore, on the 6th day of August, 1888, the said defendant association made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff a certain written instrument, of which the following is a true copy, viz.: 'Certificate No. 88. Coupon No. 1. $500. San Francisco, Cal., August 6, 1888. Provided Mr. Thos. C. Hogan shall be a member in good standing thereof on the 13th day of January, 1891, the Pacific Endowment League will pay to his order on that date the sum of five hundred dollars, on presentation of this coupon to the secretary. [Signed] J. G. Severance, President. [Signed] J. Alfred Lueders, Secretary.' That plaintiff was a member of said defendant association, in good standing, on the 13th day of January, 1891, and on that date presented said coupon to the secretary of said association, the said J. Alfred Lueders, and demanded payment thereof, and said association then and there refused to make payment of said sum of five hundred dollars provided for in said coupon. That said demand was made by plaintiff on said 13th day of January, 1891, upon said defendant association, at said city and county of San Francisco. That, at the time of said presentation and of said demand, there were ample funds and money in said endowment fund to fully pay said sum of five hundred dollars provided for in said coupon. That no part of said sum of five hundred dollars provided for in said coupon has been paid. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against the said defendant association for the sum of five hundred dollars, with interest and costs of suit, and that by said judgment the defendant association be directed to pay the same out of the said endowment fund, and for such other, further, or different relief as may be just."

The only issues upon which any point is made on this appeal arise from a denial by defendant that the plaintiff was a member of the "Pacific Endowment League," in good standing, on the 13th day of January, 1891, or at any time since, and the averment that he failed to pay 18 assessments levied by the league on January 2, 1891, and ipso facto forfeited and lost his right of membership in said league, and has ever since remained suspended. The court found for the plaintiff upon all the issues of fact, and gave judgment accordingly. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The only point made by appellant is that the evidence does not justify the finding that the plaintiff was a member of the defendant association, in good standing, on January 13, 1891; and whether he was so or not depends solely upon the validity of the 18 assessments which, it is admitted, the plaintiff refused to pay. If those assessments were valid, his refusal to pay them effected a suspension of his good standing as a member of the league; otherwise, he was a member in good standing on January 13, 1891, and was then entitled to payment of the coupon set out in his complaint.

The defendant association or league was organized on March 8, 1888, and the plaintiff became a member thereof on March 9, 1888. On August 6, 1888, the defendant issued to plaintiff an "endowment certificate," by which it became obligated to pay to plaintiff $5,000 in 10 equal coupon installments, of $500 each, at the times and upon the condition expressed in the coupons. The first of said coupons matured January 13, 1891, and upon it this action was commenced, January 29, 1891. The by-laws of the league, as they were at the time plaintiff became a member, and remained until December 28, 1889, do not add to or change the condition expressed in the coupon, namely, that plaintiff "shall be a member, in good standing, on the 13th day of January, 1891;" but they provide that failure to pay quarterly dues and assessments "suspends a member without further action." The quarterly dues are $1.50, and the regular authorized assessments are levied monthly according to fixed rates, dependent upon the age of the member assessed, the plaintiff's rate being $3.50 per month. Besides this regular monthly assessment, section 3 of article 9 of the by-laws provides: "When the demands on the endowment fund require, the levy of additional assessments shall be made." Professing to act by authority of this section, the directors, on January 1, 1891, 13 days before the coupon in suit matured, levied 18 special assessments, of $3.50 each, on plaintiff, all payable immediately, and addressed to plaintiff the following notice thereof: "San Francisco, Cal., January 1, 1891. The board of directors, by resolution duly passed, has levied on the above date special assessment No. 3, which is now due and payable on all certificates registered up to and including December 31, 1889. Under our present laws, no certificate is liable for a special assessment until after one year from the date of its registration; hence all certificates registered during the year 1890 are exempt from this special assessment No. 3. The special assessments are always of the same rate as the regular, and delinquent on the last day of the month for which they are called. To protect the interests of the membership, 18 extra assessments are hereby levied on all certificates of which the first coupon comes due within this month, payable, besides special No. 3, before the warrant for the matured coupon can be drawn. They will, however, after the issuance of the warrant, be credited on the 2d coupon as 18 regular monthly assessments. This will be continued on maturing coupons from month to month until repealed. By order of the board of directors. J. Alfred Lueders, Secretary. Bring this card. Thos. C. Hogan, 146 Silver St., City."

Article 1 of the by-laws provides: "There shall be a board of nine directors, invested with full power and authority to enact laws for the government of the league." Article 4, as it existed from the organization of the league until December 28, 1889, provided that "coupons shall be paid on the day they mature by warrant on the treasurer, * * * upon surrender of the coupon." But this article was amended December 28, 1889, by adding thereto the following: "Provided, the dues for the quarter, and the assessment or assessments levied for the month in which the coupon is payable, have been paid." At the same time, December 28, 1889, a new article (numbered 21) was adopted, as follows: "There shall be a reserve fund created by setting aside from the receipts in the endowment fund such portion as shall be deemed necessary by the board of directors for the protection of the members and placed at interest." Section 6 of article 9 provides: "The proceeds from assessment and any accumulation of interest derived from investment of assessment moneys constitute the endowment fund, from which all payments for maturing coupons are made, and the endowment fund shall not be used for any other purpose whatsoever." Article 18 provides: "All moneys other than those mentioned in section 6 of article 9 go into the general fund which shall be used to defray the expenses of the league,"—this fund being composed of the initiation fees, ($5 each,) the quarterly dues of members, ($1.50 each, or $6 a year,) and certain fees and fines provided for. The above amendment of article 4 and the adoption of article 21 were evidently intended to authorize the creation of a reserve fund at the expense of the endowment fund, and thereby so reducing the latter as to justify the levying of the 18 or any number of additional special assessments, at the discretion of the board, all payable within the month in which coupons are to mature, as a condition of the payment of such coupons. In this way it was proposed to make "the endowment fund require the levy of additional assessments," in the sense of section 3 of article 9 above set out. In no other way could the board have made the endowment fund "require the levy of additional assessments" to meet the demands upon it for the payment of coupons maturing in the month of January, 1891, since it appears from an official report of the secretary, issued January 1, 1891, that the league then had in its treasury $83,034.80 properly and lawfully applicable to the payment of mature coupons, though the board had nominally divided it into three funds, as follows:

Reserve or guaranty fund.....	$58,522 65
Emergency fund.....	15,581 95
Endowment fund proper.....	8,930 20

The same report of the secretary shows that $62,000 was disbursed from the endowment fund in payment of matured coupons during the year 1890, leaving the balance of $83,034.80; but it does not appear that any special assessment was levied upon the holders of the coupons paid during that year, the payment of which was enforced or required as a condition precedent to the payment of those coupons. J. Alfred Luaders, who was the secretary of defendant from its organization until May, 1891, and since its president, testified in explanation of the 18 special assessments, as follows: "The portion of the code of laws under which those 18 assessments were levied, (article 9, section 3, 4, and 5,) which gives the board of directors full power to levy them, section 3 being the main section. At the time this coupon became due, in January, 1891, the endowment fund was not insolvent, but there were so many demands that would have to come in a future time that we had to look for those demands. It was not only our ambition to pay these coupons that matured in January, 1891, but to pay all that were contracted before that time and will mature later on. A coupon is only payable on the date of maturity, and is not a demand until it matures. It is merely a prospective demand until then. When we levied these special assessments, we had in view the other coupons that were to be paid, and we had to make provision in time to meet them when they would become due. As soon as these 18 assessments were paid, we would have turned over to Mr. Hogan $500 for the coupon. * * * We levied the 18 assessments on the first coupon. After the first coupon had been collected by Mr. Hogan, he could have dropped the certificate. We levied them on the first coupon under our code of laws to make it legal. * * * It was a protection to the members that we levied these 18 assessments, in case Mr. Hogan would not continue his membership. $56 is all Mr. Hogan has paid in assessments outside of the dues which are for expenses, towards the $500. It was to devise ways and means by which to protect the endowment fund as much as possible against such a thing, as a member may drop out the first month, and it was not aimed at any particular member. Mr. Hogan paid in so little, it seemed only just to levy the 18 assessments. The Court: Why couldn't you have levied 500 assessments? If you could levy 18, why didn't you levy more? Answer. That would be highway robbery. 18 assessments levied on certificate which has only paid $56 is very just, and only justice to the other members. We had about $83,000 in bank to the credit of the endowment fund when the coupon matured on the 1st January, 1891, and the amount due for coupons maturing in that month was between $15,000 and $20,000; to speak more exactly, $23,500. The coupons to fall due in the following month, and those to mature, required a sum largely in excess of $83,000 to pay such coupons, and therefore it was a necessity to levy 18 assessments in January, 1891, to protect the payment of coupons immediately following." In his said report of January, 1891, the secretary further says: "This is a measure adopted for the equalization of payments, and for the protection of those members whose first coupon falls due at the later date; and, as the application for membership was made by every member for a certificate of $5,000, of which a coupon is only a part, this action is amply justified, and meets with the cordial approval of every well-meaning member." It is obvious that the defendant association was brought into existence for the sole benefit of its promoters and officers, who were to feed upon the so-called "general fund" which was sacredly dedicated to them, and quite as obvious that it was constitutionally doomed to a short life; hence the doctoring to prolong the agony of its sickly existence. It is, however, the creature of contract, and must be governed by the law of contracts. Not being incorporated, its written articles of association constitute a contract by which the duties of its officers, the duties and obligations of its members among themselves, and the scope of its business are to be defined and regulated. Its articles of association bear to it the same relation that a charter bears to an incorporated society, and constitute its fundamental law, in accordance with which all subsequent by-laws, regulations, and amendments must be made. Nibl. Mut. Ben. Soc. § 1; Bac. Ben. Soc. §§ 37, 62; Austin v. Searing, 69 Amer. Dec. 670, and notes; Otto v. Benevolent Union, 75 Cal. 309, 17 Pac. Rep. 217. The obligation of this class of contracts for the payment of money, or for the security of any other right of property, is as sacred as those of any other contract, and a breach thereof will be remedied by the courts. Bac. Ben. Soc. §§ 61a, 105, 106, 107, and cases cited. The mere fact (conceding it to be such) that the articles of association constituting the contract do not operate equally upon the individual members confers no authority upon the directors to change or amend such articles for the purpose of "equalization of payments" or other burdens imposed by the original compact otherwise than authorized by the original articles. As such change or amendment would impair the obligation of the original contract, it could have been made only by consent of all members to be affected thereby; and such consent is not implied in article 1, which confers upon the board of directors power "to enact laws for the government of the league," because it must have been understood that this power was limited by the laws of the land with reference to which the article conferring it must be construed. Nibl. Mut. Ben. Soc. §§ 20, 24; Bac. Ben. Soc. § 84. Besides, "the equalization of payments" sought to be effected by the 18 assessments, according to the testimony of the president, could have been accomplished only by compelling each member to pay his own coupons as they matured, in addition to his quarterly dues, initiation fee, fines, etc., for the support of officers. This, though not highway robbery, would have killed the institution immediately.

It is claimed that the levying of the 18 assessments was authorized by the original section 3 of article 9, because, it is said, "the demands on the endowment fund required" such additional assessments; yet it appears that the amount of the coupons falling due in January, 1891, was only $23,500, and that there was then in the endowment fund $83,000, for there was no provision in the original articles for creating a reserve fund from the receipts of the endowment fund, nor for transferring any part of the endowment fund to any other fund, nor any provision in either the original or amended articles for an "emergency fund;" and therefore the alleged transfer of $74,104 from the endowment fund to the supposed reserve and emergency funds had no actual existence. Indeed, there is no evidence of any resolution of the board to that effect. Besides, section 6 of article 9 provides that the endowment fund shall not be used for any other purpose than the payment of matured coupons. For what purpose could any part of the endowment fund have been reserved? The placing of such a portion of it as was not immediately needed at interest was no reservation of it from the purpose to which it was exclusively dedicated. Nor is it easy to conceive of any purpose or occasion for any "emergency fund." All possible demands upon the endowment fund were payable in definite sums at fixed times. There was no chance for any unexpected valid demand upon that fund. It follows that there was no legal necessity for levying the 18 special assessments on January 1, 1891, and therefore they were invalid. Thomas v. Whallen, 31 Barb. 172; Insurance Co. v. Guse, 49 Mo. 332; Nibl. Mut. Ben. Soc. § 277. In levying assessments the directors act ministerially, and not judicially, and therefore no presumption arises in favor of their legality or regularity, (Nibl. Mut. Ben. Soc. § 280; Bac. Ben. Soc. § 377;) nor can assessments be made for anticipated losses unless provision therefor is made in the articles of association, (Rosenberger v. Insurance Co., 87 Pa. St. 207; Crossman v. Association, 143 Mass. 435, 9 N. E. Rep. 753.) There are other probably valid objections to the 18 special assessments, but the foregoing are sufficient to show them to have been invalid. Being invalid, the refusal of the plaintiff to pay them did not have the alleged effect of suspending him from good standing as a member of the league. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

FITZGERALD and McFARLAND, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SAN JOAQUIN LAND & WATER CO. v. WEST et al. (No. 18,113.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1893.)

JUDGMENT—ENTRY—AMENDMENT—INTEREST.

1. Where judgment is entered otherwise than authorized by the decision, it may be amended by the court.

2. As a money judgment draws interest at 7 per cent., it is properly entered for the amount recovered with interest at such rate from date of judgment, though the decision properly contains no provision therefor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by the San Joaquin Land & Water Company against F. M. West and others. From an order refusing to amend the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. S. Pillsbury and W. L. Dudley, for appellants. Baldwin & Campbell and S. D. Woods, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The present action involved the title and right of possession to a certain fund of money, which was in the custody of the court pending the litigation. Upon the submission of the case the court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and ordered judgment to be entered in accordance therewith. The conclusions of law were: "Plaintiff is entitled to have and recover a judgment against the defendants Beecher and Gray for the sum of $35,861.25, together with its costs in this action." Subsequently defendants appealed from the judgment and an order denying them a new trial, the judgment and order were affirmed, and the aforesaid sum of money was paid to plaintiff. Thereafter it came to the notice of appellants that the judgment entered included an additional sum as interest, and a motion was made to the court to amend and correct the judgment as entered, "by striking out so much thereof as reads as follows: 'With interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from the date hereof until paid,'—upon the ground that such portion of said judgment was inserted therein by misprision, inadvertence, and mistake, and that the same is not meant or intended to form a part of, or be inserted in, said judgment; that said judgment is not supported or warranted, but, on the contrary, is expressly contrary and in direct opposition to the decision in writing and the findings and conclusions of law heretofore made and filed in this action on the 4th day of August, 1890." The court made an order denying the motion, upon the sole ground that it had no jurisdiction to make said amendment, and this appeal is prosecuted from that order.

Under section 632 of the Code of Civil Procedure, if the trial of a question of fact is involved, the decision of the court must be given in writing and filed with the clerk, and section 633 requires that in such decision the facts found and the conclusions of law must be separately stated, and the judgment upon the decision must be entered accordingly. The "decision" of the court referred to in these sections, when filed, amounts in law to a rendition of the judgment. As was said in Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. Rep. 1074: "This was the rendition of the judgment, which the clerk could thereafter at any time enter at length in the records of the court. The entry of the judgment after it had been rendered by the court is but the ministerial act of the clerk. The judgment when entered becomes the record of what the court has determined, and then becomes as binding upon the parties as if entered immediately upon its rendition. The rendition of a judgment is a judicial act. Its entering upon the record is merely ministerial." Freem. Judgm. § 381. See, also, In re Cook's Estate, 77 Cal. 227, 17 Pac. Rep. 923, and 19 Pac. Rep. 431; and Broder v. Conklin, (Cal.) 33 Pac. Rep. 211. In the present case, if the clerk has been guilty of mistake by entering a judgment not authorized by the "decision" of the court, such mistake can be corrected by the course here adopted, for the error will be apparent from the face of the record, and the rule is universal that when a mistake is made in the entry of a judgment, and that fact is plainly apparent from the record itself, such mistake may be rectified at any time; and this rule arises by reason of the inherent power of the court over its own proceedings. It was said in Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 21, 27 Pac. Rep. 22: "Courts have the power at all times to allow amendments to judgments, for the purpose of having the judgment as entered express that which was rendered, so that the record will contain the actual decision of the court; and such amendments can be made after the expiration of six months from the entry of the judgment. Where the clerk fails to enter judgment as it was pronounced, the court has always the power to correct the matter, and to order the proper entry to be made. Clerical misprisions can be corrected at any time by an order of the court, but judicial errors can be remedied only through a motion for a new trial or on appeal." Neither does the fact that the judgment has been affirmed upon appeal by this court conclude appellants' right to have it conform to the truth. Rousset v. Boyle, 45 Cal. 64, was that kind of a case, and the decision of the court upon that question leaves nothing more to be said.

The foregoing principles of law being established, let us examine the facts, to see wherein the mistake in the entry of judgment exists. The court rendered a judgment against defendant for a large sum of money and costs, and such judgment was full and complete, for it covered the whole subject-matter of litigation. No judgment for interest was asked in the complaint, and no interest was awarded. There was no issue in the case as to the rights of plaintiff to have interest upon the judgment after it was rendered. No such issue could possibly arise, and consequently the "decision" of the court should not contain any such adjudication. It follows that the mere fact of the entry of the interest clause in the judgment, without such authority being found in the decision of the court, in no way proves such entry to be a clerical mistake. Even if such clause was stricken from the judgment entered, it is not clear that execution for interest would not run. But, aside from this, the judgment was a pure money judgment, and the law says such judgment draws interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. We think it was the duty of the clerk to enter the judgment exactly as it was entered, and his insertion of the interest clause therein was an exercise of a ministerial duty, under the law. It may be further suggested that we see nothing but fairness and equity in charging these defendants with interest upon the judgment. For many months they prevented plaintiff from obtaining possession of its money, and the law declares that legal interest is the true measure of damages in such a case.

For the foregoing reasons let the order be affirmed.

DORAN v. DORAN. (No. 15,090.)

TRUSTS—LANDS—GIFTS CAUSA MORTIS.

1. There can be no trust in land conveyed by deed absolute without fraud; Civil Code, § 852, providing that such a trust can only be created by writing.

2. Conceding that the assignment of a bank book was a gift causa mortis, the gift was revoked where the assignor, a few minutes before his death, told the assignee to go to the bank, get the money, and bring it to him, so that, the assignor having died intestate before the return of the assignee, the assignee would hold the funds in trust for the assignor's heirs.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Margaret Doran against James Doran to have a trust declared in land and money. Judgment for defendant. Modified.

James Gartlan, for appellant. Robert Y. Countryman, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. On the 30th day of June, 1887, John Doran was the owner of a certain lot of land in the city of San Francisco, and of $770, money on deposit to his credit in the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society of San Francisco. On that day he executed to the defendant, James Doran, a deed of the lot and an assignment in writing of the pass book showing the amount to his credit in the said bank. John and James were brothers, and the sons of the plaintiff. The plaintiff seeks by this action to have a trust declared in her favor as to the real and personal property so transferred. The complaint alleges, in substance, that John was moved and induced to convey the said lot and assign the said bank account to the defendant solely by reason of the confidence he had in defendant, and because of the promise defendant then made to reconvey the lot upon request to his grantor, and to hold for his use the money, and the further promise, in the event of John's death, to convey the lot to plaintiff, and to pay to her so much of the said money as might remain in his (defendant's) hands; that John died on the 5th day of July, 1887, before any reconveyance of the land had been made, and leaving intact in defendant's hands the whole sum of money transferred to him; and that plaintiff had demanded of defendant that he convey to her the said land, and pay to her the said money, but he refused, and still refuses, to do so, except that he had paid to her $100 of the money. Wherefore judgment is asked "that he, defendant, be declared a trustee for plaintiff of said land, and for a conveyance thereof to her; that he, defendant, be declared a trustee for plaintiff in the sum of $670, and that he be directed to pay such sum to her, together with the interest found due, and for costs of suit." The answer to the complaint was a general denial. The case was tried by the court, and the findings were, in effect, that the said conveyance and assignment were absolute, and were not made by reason of any confidence John had in defendant, nor upon any promise of defendant to reconvey the lot to John, or to hold the money for his use, nor upon any promise, in the event of John's death, to convey the lot or pay over any part of the money to the plaintiff. Judgment was accordingly entered that plaintiff take nothing by the action, and that defendant recover from her his costs and disbursements therein. From this judgment, and an order denying her motion for new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

The only point made for reversal which need be noticed is that the findings were not justified by the evidence. The proceedings at the trial are briefly stated in the record as follows: Plaintiff introduced in evidence the deed and pass book in question; the deed expressing a nominal consideration, and the pass book, numbered 108,800, showing a balance to the credit of the depositor of $770. "Proof was then made that on June 30, 1887, John Doran was lying dangerously ill at St. Mary's Hospital, San Francisco, and expressed a desire to settle his affairs; that the sick man knew that his mother, Margaret Doran, the plaintiff, was his heir at law; that, for the purpose of avoiding the expense and delay of probate proceedings, John determined to transfer all his property in trust; that he was aware of the risk he ran in making such transfer, but declared that he would make his brother, James, the defendant, his trustee, knowing that his said brother would do what was right; that thereupon John conveyed to defendant the aforesaid lot of land on Jersey street, and assigned to said defendant the said pass book No. 108,800. It was also proven that John Doran had died on the 5th day of July, 1887, intestate, unmarried, and without issue, and that his father had predeceased him. The defendant, James Doran, testified in substance: "I am defendant in this action. John Doran died on or about the 5th day of July, 1887. He was my brother. The plaintiff, Margaret Doran, is my mother, and mother of deceased. My father is dead. My brother, John, was never married. I was present when John made the transfer of the lot on Jersey street and the Hibernia Bank pass book. What my brother meant when he said I would do what was right was that I would reconvey the property to him if he recovered from his then sickness. Nothing further was said by John on the subject. On the morning of the day of his death, John said to me he was feeling awful bad; that he thought he was going to die; that I should hurry down to the Hibernia Bank, and get out his money, and bring it up to him. I went accordingly to the bank, and drew out his money. I was scarcely absent more than 15 minutes, but when I got back John was dead." It was further proven that, about a week after the death of John, the defendant went to the office of the attorney who had drawn up and witnessed the deed and assignment by which the deceased had transferred his property; that the defendant asked said attorney when the matter would come up in court; that the attorney there and then told defendant there would be no court proceedings; that to avoid all such proceedings his brother had transferred the property to him; that he, defendant, was trustee of the property, and the duty devolved upon him to carry out the wishes of deceased; that defendant left the office without making any reply."

1. Upon this record of the evidence we do not think the findings in relation to the real property can be disturbed. An express trust in real property can only be created or declared by a written instrument subscribed by the trustor or trustee. Civil Code, § 852. There was therefore no express trust in favor of the grantor or the plaintiff, and no facts are stated from which a trust by operation of law must necessarily arise in her favor. So far as appears, the conveyance was made by the grantor of his own motion, and without any solicitation, undue influence, or fraud on the part of the grantee; and it may have been intended to be absolute in case of the grantor's death, and to vest the title in fee simple in the grantee; and that it was so intended must, in view of the findings, be presumed.

2. As to the bank account the law is different. An express or implied trust in relation to personal property may be declared and proved by parol, (Hellman v. McWilliams, 70 Cal. 449, 11 Pac. Rep. 659; Perry, Trusts, § 86;) and here the undisputed evidence on the part of the plaintiff shows that the pass book was assigned to the defendant in trust for the assignor. The respondent, however, contends that the assignment and delivery to him of the pass book constituted a complete gift of the money causa mortis. Conceding this to be so, still a gift causa mortis may be revoked by the donor at any time during his life, and without the consent of the donee. Civil Code, § 1151; Daniel v. Smith, 64 Cal. 349, 30 Pac. Rep. 575; Merchant v. Merchant, 2 Bradf. Sur. 432; Parker v. Marston, 27 Me. 196. Here the respondent's own testimony very clearly shows that the gift, if made, was revoked by the donor before he died. He testified that, on the morning of the day of his death, John told him to "hurry down to the Hibernia Bank, and get out his money, and bring it up to him. I went accordingly to the bank, and drew out his money; * * * but when I got back John was dead." This plainly indicates that John still claimed the money as his own, and intended to again take it into his possession. Under these circumstances it must be held that the respondent held the money in trust and as a part of the estate of John, and that the plaintiff, as the only heir of John, had a right to have the trust enforced, and the money paid over to her.

We advise that the judgment and order, so far as they relate to the real property, be affirmed, and that, so far as they relate to the money, be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order, so far as they relate to the real property, are affirmed, and, so far as they relate to the money, are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WARREN v. POSTEL. (No. 15,044.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS.

St. 1885, p. 147, § 3, provides that when the cost of any street work ordered by the city council, and chargeable against any lots, shall exceed one-half their assessed value, the excess shall be paid by the city. Section 7 provides the manner of assessment, and declares that, whenever the said assessment on any lot would exceed one-half the valuation, then the assessment shall be only to the amount of one-half. Section 26 provides that, whenever the city council orders any work done, it shall be deemed to have ordered the payment out of its treasury of the excess of any assessment for said work, otherwise chargeable on any lot, over one-half the valuation of the lot. Held, that a lot was not limited to an assessment, in a single year, of half its value, but that this limitation applied only to an assessment for the work included in a single resolution.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by C. A. Warren against P. W. Postel. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. H. Whittemore, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action is upon a street assessment, and the defendant appeals from the judgment against him upon the judgment roll. The defendant claims that he was assessed for too much, his assessment being $220.50, while he thinks he should be held for only $105.67. He owns a lot at the intersection of Jersey and Noe streets, in San Francisco, thus having frontage on both streets. September 19, 1887, the board of supervisors declared its intention to do certain work on Jersey street between Noe and Douglas streets, being the work for which plaintiff's assessment was made. It was ordered to be done October 24th, and the contract awarded to plaintiff November 21st, of the same year. The assessment for the work was made December 27, 1888. In this assessment the sum of $3,218.60 was assessed to the city and county, that being the sum in excess of one-half the last previous assessment for municipal purposes, as to certain lots which were liable. As before stated, defendant's lot was assessed for $220.50. The last previous assessment of his lot for municipal purposes was $565. October 3, 1887, the board declared its intention to do certain work on Noe street between Alameda and Twenty-Sixth streets, and November 27, 1887, ordered the same to be done, and December 12, 1887, awarded the contract to Conway & Co. The assessment for this work was made July 12, 1888, in which defendant's lot was assessed for $176.83, which was paid by defendant after this suit was commenced. Defendant's position is that his lot can only be held during any tax year for one-half its assessed value for all street work done, and it does not matter that the work was ordered at different times on different streets and under different resolutions of intention. Half the assessed value of his lot is $282.50, and he is willing to pay the difference between that sum and his assessment for the Noe street work, and thinks the assessment in excess of that is void. Respondent affirms that defendant's lot is liable to the extent of one-half the assessed value for such work, without regard to other work; or, if not, that it is the Noe street assessment which would be invalid because the notice of intention, the order that the work be done, and the contract for the work on Jersey street preceded the like steps in the Noe street procedure, although the Noe street assessment was first made.

Both proceedings were under the street law of 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147.) In section 3 of that act is the following: "Whenever the estimated or actual cost of any street work, contemplated or ordered to be done by the city council, and chargeable under the provisions of this act against any lot or lots of land or the owner thereof, shall exceed one-half of the assessed value of such lot or lots, as borne upon the last assessment roll wherein it was assessed, made for the levying of taxes for municipal purposes, the amount of the cost of said work exceeding said one-half of the assessed value of said lot or lots, shall be paid out of the city treasury. * * *" The first subdivision of section 7 reads as follows: "The expenses incurred for any work authorized by section 2 of this act, which shall not include such portion of any street which is required by law to be kept in order or repair by any person or company having railroad tracks thereon, shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon, except as hereinafter specifically provided; each lot or portion of a lot being separately assessed, in proportion to the frontage, at a rate per front foot sufficient to cover the total expenses of the work. But wherever the said assessment upon any lot or portion of a lot would exceed one-half the valuation of said lot or portion of a lot, as it was last assessed for municipal taxation, then, unless the owner or his attorney in fact shall have previously filed with the superintendent of streets a written waiver of the partial exemption herein provided, the assessment and the lien thereof upon said lot or portion of a lot shall be only to the amount of one-half of said last preceding municipal valuation, and the proper remainder of said assessment shall be assessed to the city, and be payable out of the city treasury." And section 26 is as follows: "The city council may, in its discretion, order that the whole or any part of the cost and expenses of any of the work mentioned in section two of this act be paid out of the treasury of the municipality from such fund as the council may designate. Whenever a part of such cost and expenses is so ordered to be paid, the superintendent of streets, in making up the assessment heretofore provided for such cost and expenses, shall first deduct from the whole cost and expenses such part thereof as has been so ordered to be paid out of the municipal treasury, and shall assess the remainder of said cost and expenses proportionately upon the lots or part of lots and lands fronting on the streets where said work was done and in the manner heretofore provided. And, whenever the city council shall order to be done any of the work mentioned in section two of this act, it shall be deemed to have exercised its discretion mentioned in this section, and to include an order for the payment out of its treasury for the excess of any assessment for said work otherwise chargeable upon any lot, or portion of a lot, over and above one-half the valuation of said lot, or portion of a lot, in its last preceding assessment for municipal taxation." It is very manifest from these provisions that the time when the city council is deemed to exercise its discretion to order that the excess of the cost of any street work above one-half the last previous assessment of the lots liable shall be paid by the city is when the work is contemplated or ordered. These words are not synonyms. The work may be said to be "contemplated" when it is resolved to do it. Then the cost can only be estimated. When the contract for it has been made, it is to be presumed that the actual cost is known. Under section 26, when the work is "ordered" to be done, the council is deemed to order the excess to be paid from the city treasury. At that time it may be manifest that no lot will be assessed for an amount beyond one-half its last previous assessment. As in such case there could be no excess, the council would not be deemed to have ordered such excess paid from the city treasury. But according to appellant's theory, subsequently work might be ordered under later resolutions of intention, for which assessments might be first made. By such means, under appellant's construction, the whole cost of the work might have to be assessed against the city. When, under such circumstances, was the council deemed to have ordered it all paid from the city treasury? Evidently not when the particular work was ordered, but when some other work, perhaps upon another street, was afterwards ordered to be done. The language of the statute will not bear that construction. The city council cannot know which will be first completed, although the time is stipulated in the contract, for they are authorized, and justice may require them, to extend the time for completion; and in this matter they cannot anticipate what exigencies may arise. I think it is equally evident from these provisions that the requirement that the excess of half the valuation of the lot should be paid by the city is limited to the assessment for an improvement ordered under one resolution of intention. Subdivision 1, for instance, of section 7, provides that, "whenver the said assessment upon any lot" would exceed one-half the valuation, "then * * * the assessment * * * shall be only to the amount of one-half," etc. Other provisions above cited, and others which might be, indicate that the requirement has reference to a street work. I think it obvious respondent's position as above stated must be sustained.

Appellant says that, under this construction, lot owners have very little protection against the city council, and that is true; and there is very little upon the construction of appellant. The only difference is that under appellant's theory they could only take one-half the value of the lot in any one tax year; but they could take all in two years, and take it again in two more. It would be easy to have one resolution of intention for grading, another for paving, and another for sewerage, and still others for other work; and they could be extended through several tax years. Absolute protection against the city council is not attainable under any such scheme. The legislature is the proper place to go for improvement in this matter. I think there is nothing in Kreling v. Muller, 86 Cal. 465, 25 Pac. Rep. 10, inconsistent with these views. It was held in that case that the work covered by one resolution of intention must be considered one work with reference to the requirements of the section I have been considering, and the board cannot evade the law by letting it in different contracts, and thus providing for several assessments. If it has any bearing upon the matter here considered, it is in accord with this opinion. It seems to hold that the improvements included in one resolution of intention constitutes a "street work," within the provisions of this statute. At the time the lots are assessed, the city is also assessed for its portion. Here the defendant appealed to the board, and his appeal was sustained and a new assessment ordered. He again appealed, and the assessment was modified. There can be no further assessment. The only question left is whether the present assessment is to any extent void, not whether it is erroneous. I think, however, it is neither, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

FOLEY v. BULLARD et al. (No. 15,305.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1893.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENTS — DEMAND ON PROPERTY OWNERS — PLEDGE OF CONTRACT — DEFECTS OF PARTIES.

1. A demand on an abutting property owner for payment of an assessment may be made by a contractor who has assigned the contract as security for a loan, since the title is in the contractor.

2. Where the person who makes the demand states in his return that he is the manager of the contractor, and as such manager made the demand, this prima facie evidence of his character is not overcome by his testimony that he was the agent of the pledgee of the contract, as this is not inconsistent with his being the agent, also, of the contractor.

3. That a defect or nonjoinder of parties plaintiff may be relied on, objection should be made in the answer.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by Foley against Bullard and others on a street assessment. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. D. Collins, for appellants. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. The contract was awarded to Warren & Malley, who on December 26, 1889, assigned the same to Foley & Keenan, by whom the work was performed. The warrant and assessment were issued to Warren & Malley December 23, 1890, and delivered to Foley & Keenan. Foley & Keenan had assigned the contract to Lang & Ruggles, June 2, 1890, as security for a loan of money then obtained from them, with which to complete the contract. The demand was made on the 24th of December, 1890, by John T. Foley, the son of the plaintiff, who, in his return, states that he "is the manager for Foley & Keenan, assigns for original contractors named in the assessment and warrant, and that with and by virtue thereof, as such manager, he went upon the lot of land described in the complaint, and while thereon publicly demanded payment" of the amount assessed to said lot. At the trial he testified that at the time of the demand he had the assessment, warrant, and diagram with him, and had received them from Lang & Ruggles for that purpose.

It is objected by the appellant that, as at the time of the demand the contract had been assigned to Lang & Ruggles, there was no authority in Foley & Keenan to make the demand, and that the demand by their agent was insufficient to preserve the lien. Section 10 of the act under which the improvement was made (St. 1885, p. 155) provides that the demand may be made "by the contractor or his assigns, or some person in his or their behalf." In Gaffney v. Gough, 36 Cal. 104, an undivided half of the contract had been assigned by the contractor, and the demand was made by the contractor alone. It was objected that he could not make a legal demand, because he only owned one-half of the contract, and did not appear to have been the agent to collect the other half, but the demand was held sufficient. The objection of the appellants herein is not directed so much to the "nature and character of the demand," which the statute requires to be stated in the return, as it is to the character of the person who made the demand; the point urged being that it appears from the return that the demand was made by the agent of Foley & Keenan, whereas the person making the demand was in fact the agent of Lang & Ruggles. We think, however, that it sufficiently appears that the demand was made "in behalf of" Foley & Keenan, even though the person making the demand was at the time the agent of Lang & Ruggles. Foley & Keenan were the assignees of the original contractors, and, although they had assigned the assessment to Lang & Ruggles as security for their indebtedness, the title to the assessment still remained in them. Civil Code, § 2888. John T. Foley was their agent, and in that capacity made a proper demand for the amount of the assessment. He had the assessment, warrant, and diagram with him at the time he made the demand, having received them from Lang & Ruggles for that purpose, and in his return states that he was at the time of making the demand the manager of Foley & Keenan, and made the demand as such manager. This affidavit was prima facie evidence of his character, (Whiting v. Townsend, 57 Cal. 515,) and there is no evidence in the record that he was not their manager. His testimony at the trial that he was the agent of Lang & Ruggles is not inconsistent with the fact that he was at the same time the agent of Foley & Keenan.

The objection that the plaintiff has no title to the assessment, for the reason that it is derived merely through an assignment to him by Lang & Ruggles, who held it only as security, is without merit. As above stated, the title remained in Foley & Keenan notwithstanding the assignment, and Lang & Ruggles were merely the pledgees thereof, (Civil Code, § 2987,) with a lien dependent upon possession, and upon the reassignment to the plaintiff this lien was terminated, (Civil Code, § 2913.) As the assignment from Lang & Ruggles vested the plaintiff with no new right to the assessment, it may disregarded. He was one of the assignees of the original contractors, and by virtue thereof properly made a party plaintiff herein. If the defendants would rely upon any defect or nonjoinder of parties plaintiff, this objection should have been presented in their answer. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; GAROUTTE, J.

PARTRIDGE et al. v. LUCAS et al. (No. 14,565.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1893.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS—RESOLUTION OF INTENTION—ASSESSMENTS—APPEAL.

1. Under a statute making the passage of a resolution of intention the first step to be taken by a town or city in obtaining jurisdiction to let a contract for the improvement of a street, to be paid for by assessment on abutting property, such resolution giving jurisdiction to make only those improvements described therein, a resolution of intention to order a street macadamized gives no authority to include in the contract a provision for rock gutter ways.

2. Under Act March 18, 1885, § 11, providing that no assessment for street improvements shall be held invalid, except on appeal to the city council, for defects therein, as in proceedings prior thereto, where notice of intention to order the work to be done for which the assessment is made has been published, one is not obliged to appeal from an assessment including the cost of work not included in the resolution.

3. An assessment including the cost of work not embraced in a resolution of intention is wholly void.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; F. M. Angellotti, Judge.

Action by Partridge and others against Lucas and others on a street assessment. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

D. H. Whittemore, for appellants. Sidney V. Smith, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover upon a street assessment. In the superior court a demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment thereupon rendered for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal.

1. It is well settled that "the passage and publication of the resolution of intention are acts by which the board acquires jurisdiction, and by those acts they acquire jurisdiction to make only such improvements as they described in the resolution; and they cannot, therefore, lawfully cause work other than that which is described to be performed." Beaudry v. Valdez, 32 Cal. 276; Himmelmänn v. Satterlee, 50 Cal. 68. The complaint alleges that the board of trustees of the town of San Rafael passed a resolution declaring it to be the intention of such board to order "that B street * * * be macadamized," and thereafter, assuming to act under such resolution of intention, awarded to plaintiffs a contract to macadamize the street mentioned, and also to construct therein rock gutter ways, "formed by laying flat stones even on their upper surfaces, * * * and not more than nine inches square; * * * the stone to be hand laid * * * and securely spawled where openings between the joists occur;" the interstices to be filled "with clean, hard rock, finely broken and screened." It is plain that the work described in the resolution of intention did not include the construction of rock gutter ways in the street to be macadamized; and therefore the board of trustees did not, under the rule above stated, acquire jurisdiction to contract for such gutter ways, and the contract as to these is void. The word "macadamize" has a fixed and definite meaning, and refers, not only to the kind of material to be used in covering a street or road, but also the manner in which it is to be laid. It means to cover a street or road "by the process introduced by Macadam, which consists of the use of small stones of a uniform size consolidated and leveled by heavy rollers." 13 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1194. The construction of rock gutter ways in the manner described in the contract awarded to plaintiffs is something entirely different from the ordinary work of macadamizing the surface of a street, as thus defined, and, unless expressly named and called for in a contract, the contractor undertaking simply to macadamize a street would not be required to construct such gutter ways, in order to complete his contract; and, although it may be true that in many instances such gutter ways would be of great benefit to streets paved with macadam, still this fact would not render their construction in such streets any the less a distinct improvement, and one not to be deemed as included in a resolution of intention or a contract to macadamize a street, unless particularly named in such resolution or contract. A resolution of intention to macadamize a street gives no notice of an intention to construct gutter ways therein of any different material than macadam, or to be laid in any different manner, or at a greater cost per foot, than the other portions of the street between the curbing.

The case of Burk v. Altschul, 66 Cal. 533, 6 Pac. Rep. 393, cited by the plaintiffs, does not decide that rock gutter ways are included within the general definition of the word "macadamize," or that under a resolution of intention to macadamize a street the authorities of a town or city would have jurisdiction to let a contract for rock gutter ways, also. The contract under consideration in that case was not attacked upon the ground that it was not within the terms of the resolution of intention, but the objection was that the statute did not authorize an assessment upon the abutting property to pay the costs of constructing such gutter ways in a street; and the court simply held, in that case, that the construction of such gutter ways, although not specially named in the statute, might be properly included in the resolution of intention, under the general power which was given the board of supervisors, in the act there construed, "to order any other work to be done which shall be necessary to make and complete the whole or any portion of said street," etc. So, in this case, the board of trustees of San Rafael, under the general power to the same effect given such board by section 2 of the act of March, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147,) might have included the laying of the gutter ways in its resolution of intention; but, as it did not, there was no authority to enter into any contract for their construction. The case of McNamara v. Estes, 22 Iowa, 246, also cited by plaintiffs, is more nearly in point, and yet does not decide the exact question we are now considering. In that case it was decided that under a general power to macadamize streets a town might also construct gutter ways, and we presume, although it is not so stated, rock gutter ways. The court, in effect, there held that the power to construct such gutter ways was fairly embraced in the general power to macadamize, and was incident thereto. The question before us, however, arises under a statute which, while it confers power upon cities and towns to macadamize streets, and construct rock gutter ways therein, also requires the passage and publication of a resolution of intention, describing the work intended to be done, as a condition precedent to the right to enter into a contract therefor. The object of this statute is to give notice to owners of property who would be affected by the contemplated improvement, in order that they may be heard in opposition thereto, if they desire, (Emery v. Gas Co., 28 Cal. 375;) and, while it is not necessary that the resolution of intention should be as full and minute as specifications contained in a contract, still such resolution must contain a general description of all that is intended to be done; and as rock gutter ways are not necessarily any part of the work of macadamizing a street, and are capable of being easily described as a separate and distinct part of the improvement of a street, when their construction is deemed necessary or proper in connection with the macadamization of a street, they must be mentioned in the resolution of intention in order to justify a contract for their construction. The rule which requires the board of trustees or city council to keep strictly within the resolution of intention is not a harsh one, and a contractor ought certainly to have no difficulty in determining whether the work specified in his contract falls within the general description of that named in the resolution of intention, and which resolution, under the statute, is the first and necessary step to be taken by the town or city, in obtaining jurisdiction to let any contract for the improvement of a street, to be paid for by an assessment upon abutting property.

2. It is claimed by the appellants that, as the cost of the gutter ways could have been separated from the contract price for the macadamizing, the defendants waived their right to object to the assessment made to pay the contract price of both the macadamizing and gutter ways by not appealing to the board of trustees for its correction. But we do not think so. Section 11 of the act of March 18, 1885, before referred to, does not make it incumbent upon the property owner to appeal to the board of trustees or city council for the correction of an assessment made to cover the cost of work not embraced within the description contained in the resolution of intention passed and published by such board or city council. Perine v. Forbush, 97 Cal. 305, 32 Pac. Rep. 226. That section provides that "no assessment shall be held invalid except upon appeal to the city council, as provided in this section, for any error, informality, or other defect in any proceedings prior to the assessment, or in the assessment itself, where notice of the intention of the city council to order the work to be done for which the assessment is made has been actually published in the designated newspaper of said city for the length of time prescribed by law before the passage of the resolution ordering the work to be done." In this case, as we have seen, there was no publication of any intention to improve the street by laying rock gutter ways therein, and as a consequence of this the objection to the as-essment because the cost of such gutter ways was included therein was not waived by the failure of defendants to ask that the assessment be corrected, or to ask for a new assessment to pay only the contract price for the work which was done in macadamizing the street. The assessment sought here to be enforced is an entirety, and must stand or fall as a whole; and as it includes the cost of the gutter ways, which is not legally chargeable upon the property of defendants, plaintiffs are not entitled to maintain the action. Dyer v. Chase, 52 Cal. 440; Donnelly v. Howard, 60 Cal. 291. Judgment affirmed.

JOSHUA HENDY MACH. WORKS v. PACIFIC CABLE CONST. CO. (No. 15,117.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

REFERENCE—WHEN PROPER—ACTION ON ACCOUNT —GOODS SOLD AND DELIVERED—ADMISSIONS IN PLEADINGS—EFFECT.

1. In an action at law to recover part of the price of goods sold and delivered, the court has no authority, except by agreement of the parties, to refer the cause to a referee "to state an account between the parties, and report a judgment and findings in said cause."

2. An erroneous order, referring issues to a referee without the consent of the parties, is not a ground for reversal, if no exception was reserved thereto.

3. In an action at law for the recovery of the balance of an account for goods sold and delivered, plaintiff is bound by an admission in the complaint as to the amount paid on the account, not denied by defendant, and cannot recover if such payment is greater than the value of the goods, or the price agreed to be paid therefor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by the Joshua Hendy Machine Works against the Pacific Cable Construction Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Roger Johnson, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The complaint in this action is in two counts. In the first it is alleged that the defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $4,566.55, "the same being the balance of an account for goods, wares, and merchandise * * * sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant, and for work and labor and services performed thereon and in connection therewith by plaintiff, at defendant's * * * request; * * * that the whole amount and aggregate value of the items of said account is the sum of $35,744.35, no part of which has been paid except the sum of $31,177.80, leaving the aforesaid balance of $4,566.55 still due and unpaid." In the statement of what is termed "a further separate cause of action," the complaint alleges that "plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant certain goods, wares, and merchandise, and performed work and labor in connection therewith, at defendant's * * * request, all of which were of the reasonable value of, and at the agreed price of, $35,744.35, which said sum defendant promised and agreed to pay therefor, but that he has refused and failed to pay said sum, or any part thereof, except the sum of $31,177.80." The prayer of the complaint is for a judgment against defendant for the sum of $4,566.55, with interest thereon from June 13, 1890. The answer of the defendant joined issue with the allegation of the complaint as to the value and agreed price of the goods sold, and work and services performed, alleging that the whole value thereof and price agreed to be paid therefor did not exceed $30,000, and further alleged that plaintiff had been fully paid. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court for the sum of $788.54, with interest thereon from the date of the commencement of the action until the rendition of the judgment, amounting in all to $892.85 and costs. The defendant appeals.

1. The order made by the court without the consent of the parties, referring the cause to a referee "to state an account between the parties, and report a judgment and findings in said cause," which was, in effect, a reference of the whole case for trial, was not authorized by section 639 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The action is an ordinary action at law for the recovery of an alleged indebtedness, and in such cases the court should not make a reference for the trial of all the issues therein, except upon agreement of the parties. Seaman v. Mariani, 1 Cal. 336; Grim v. Norris, 19 Cal. 140. But the defendant did not reserve any exception to the order of reference, and, not having done so, cannot now insist upon the error of the court in making the order as a ground for the reversal of the judgment.

2. The defendant further contends that the findings do not support the judgment, and we think this contention must be sustained. The referee found, and upon these findings the court below based its judgment: (1) That there was a balance of $788.54 due from defendant to plaintiff at the date of the commencement of the action "upon the account for goods, wares, and merchandise theretofore sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant at the request of the defendant, and for work and labor and services performed thereon and in connection therewith." (2) "That the whole amount and aggregate value of the items of said account is the sum of $26,857.35; that $26,068.81 thereof has been paid, and that said sum of $788.54 * * * is the balance on said account remaining due and unpaid,"—and that plaintiff did not sell and deliver to defendant any goods, wares, and merchandise, or perform any work and labor in connection therewith, other than as thus found.

The value of the goods and merchandise sold, and work and services performed, by plaintiff, or the price agreed to be paid therefor, was a material issue in the case, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action unless such agreed price or value exceeds the amount admitted by the pleadings to have been paid by defendant on account thereof, and the finding of the court is that such agreed price or value is less than the amount of such admitted payments. The further finding of the court, that defendant has only paid $26,068.81 on account of the matters alleged in the complaint as constituting plaintiff's cause of action, must be disregarded, because such finding is contrary to the admission contained in the pleadings. The plaintiff alleges in the complaint that defendant has paid to it $31,177.80 on account of the matters alleged in the complaint, and that fact, not being denied in the answer, is conclusive. White v. Douglass, 71 Cal. 115, 11 Pac. Rep. 860; Hill v. Den, 54 Cal. 6. But the plaintiff contends that the action is simply one to recover the balance of an account, and that the allegation as to the debit and credit sides of the account is not material. Unquestionably, it is not necessary that there should be such particularity in the statement of a cause of action to recover the general balance alleged to be due upon an account as is found in the complaint here. But it does not follow that such particular allegations, when made, are to be treated as immaterial, and not binding upon the party alleging such facts. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that a statement such as is found in the present complaint, of the amount which defendant has paid on account of the matters therein alleged, is to be treated as an admission of the fact by the plaintiff, and, when not put in issue by the answer, effect must be given to it by the court. The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, and the plaintiff should have leave to amend its complaint. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

SHAIN v. PETERSEN. (No. 14,471.)

REFERENCE—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS—IRREGULARITIES IN PROCEDURE.

1. Though a court make an order of reference to take testimony without consent of the parties, which it was authorized to make only with their consent, still, they having appeared before the referee without objection, and never having objected to the order before appeal was taken to the supreme court, objection will be held to have been waived to the reference.

2. A judgment will not be reversed for mere irregularities of procedure, objected to for the first time on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by Shain against Petersen. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nagle & Nagle, for appellant. Vincent Neale, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This action was brought by plaintiff, as assignee of Knowls & Co., to recover $667.17 for goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been sold by said Knowls & Co. to defendant. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for the full amount demanded, and from this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The court made an order referring the case to one W. H. Barrows "to take the proof of all material allegations in the complaint, and to report the same to the court." This order does not appear to have been made by consent, and the action was not of such a character that the court was authorized to make the order without the consent of parties. The parties, however, appeared before the referee without objection, and submitted their testimony, and no objection to such order was ever made in the superior court. Under these circumstances, the appellant must be held to have waived all objections to such reference. This court will not undertake to review the action of the trial court in making an order of reference, in the absence of an exception thereto by the party complaining of such ruling. Joshua Hendy Mach. Works v. Pacific Cable Co., 33 Pac. Rep. 1084.

The taking of testimony before the referee was concluded on April 23, 1890; and on the day following, as appears from the bill of exceptions, the court, without consent of defendant, made a further order, referring the case "to W. H. Barrows, Esq., to try all the issues in said action, both of fact and of law, and report a finding and judgment thereon to the court, with all convenient dispatch." No exception seems to have been taken to this order, and thereafter the referee made his report, in which he returned to the court all the evidence taken before him under the first order, together with his finding of facts and conclusion of law that the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for the amount claimed by him in the complaint; and the plaintiff thereupon moved for judgment "upon all the papers on file in said action, and upon the report, findings, and decree of said referee." Upon the hearing of this motion, defendant appeared, and made specific exceptions to certain of the findings upon the ground that the same were contrary to the evidence. The motion was submitted to the court upon these exceptions. The case may therefore be considered as if it had been submitted to the court for decision upon the evidence taken before the referee, and embodied in his report. The court thereafter entered judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the referee's report. The defendant then moved for a new trial, upon which motion the findings of the referee appear to have been treated as findings of the court, and the rulings made by the referee in the admission and exclusion of evidence as rulings of the court. The motion for a new trial was denied. The trial in the court below was irregular, but for that the appellant seems to have been as much responsible as the respondent; and we do not think the judgment should be reversed because of objections to mere matters of procedure, which are urged here for the first time. Upon the issue as to the amount remaining unpaid by appellant upon the account sued upon at the date of the commencement of this action, the evidence introduced by plaintiff was somewhat vague and indefinite, but still we cannot say that the finding of the court upon this point has no evidence upon which to rest for its support. We find no error in the record, of which appellant can complain. Judgment and order affirmed.

MOOSER v. PETERSEN et al.

MECHANICS' LIENS — PLEADINGS AND FINDINGS — VARIANCE — JUDGMENT — PAYMENT OF SUBCONTRACTOR — WHAT CONSTITUTES.

1. In consolidated actions to establish mechanics' liens by P., a subcontractor, against the contractor and owner, and by M., a material man, against P. and such contractor and owner, the complaints both alleged that P. was the subcontractor and performed the work, and that M. furnished the materials to P. These allegations were not denied. The court found that P. & Co., a copartnership, made and performed the subcontract; that M. furnished the materials; and that the contractor paid P. & Co., who in turn paid M. Held, that a judgment for defendants in the consolidated case was not erroneous, on the ground that such findings were contrary to the admissions of the pleadings, since the acceptance of payment by such firm implies P.'s consent, and must be considered as payment to him.

2. It appeared that the contractor delivered to M. certain checks, payable to the order of P. & Co., to enable him to get his pay, and that they indorsed the checks to him, but the latter applied the money to payment of other indebtedness due him from such firm. Held, that a finding that M. was paid was proper, and not inconsistent with other findings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Two actions, consolidated: One by H. M. Petersen against E. R. Shain and one Drexler, to recover a personal judgment against Shain, as contractor, and to enforce a mechanic's lien for labor done and materials furnished by plaintiff as subcontractor in the construction of a building for Drexler; and the other by C. E. Mooser against H. M.

Petersen, E. R. Shain, and Drexler, to recover of defendant Petersen a sum claimed to be due for materials furnished, and to enforce a mechanic's lien against such building. From judgments in favor of defendants Shain and Drexler in the consolidated action, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

William Rix, for appellants. Vincent Neall, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover money judgments, and to enforce mechanics' liens for labor done and materials furnished in constructing a brick building known as the "Drexler Building." The two actions were consolidated and tried together. Drexler was the owner of the building, Shain the original contractor, Petersen a subcontractor directly under Shain, and Mooser a subcontractor under Petersen. In the first action, Petersen seeks to recover a personal judgment against Shain for a balance of $561.70, alleged to be due the former on his subcontract with the latter, and also to enforce a lien therefor upon the building against the owner. In the second action, Mooser seeks to recover from Petersen the sum of $959.75, alleged to be due him on his subcontract with the latter, for materials furnished, and to enforce a lien therefor upon the same building. The defendants in the first action, Shain and Drexler, denied any indebtedness of the defendant Shain to the plaintiff, Petersen, and alleged full payment by Shain of all sums due Petersen on his subcontract, before Petersen filed his claim of lien. The court found the denial of Shain's indebtedness to Petersen, and the averment that such indebtedness had been fully paid, to be true, and gave judgment for defendants. In the second action, (Mooser v. Petersen, Shain, and Drexler,) Petersen did not answer, but it does not appear that his default was entered. Shain and Drexler answered, denying all alleged indebtedness, and averring payment in full for all materials alleged to have been furnished by plaintiff to Petersen to be used in the construction of said building. The court also found this answer to be true, and adjudged that the plaintiff, Mooser, "take nothing by this action as against the defendants Shain and Drexler;" that plaintiff's claim of lien is void, and is set aside; and that said defendants recover their costs. Both plaintiffs, by a joint notice, appeal from the judgments in the consolidated action, "in favor of said defendants Shain and Drexler." But Mooser, the plaintiff in the second action, has not appealed from the judgment therein, so far as it is in favor of the defendant Petersen, to whom he furnished the materials, and against whom he prayed for a personal judgment; and no point is made here upon the failure of the court to render a personal judgment against Petersen upon his default. The appeals are upon the naked judgment roll in the consolidated action, without any bill of exceptions. In both cases Drexler is sued as administrator of George H. Dana, as well as personally, but his character as administrator is immaterial for any purpose of this appeal.

Appellants' counsel contends that the findings are contrary to admissions of the pleadings, and, consequently, that the judgment is erroneous. It is true that it is alleged in both complaints that Petersen was the subcontractor under Shain, and performed the work, and that Mooser furnished the materials to Petersen at his request; and these allegations are not denied. The court found, however, that Petersen & Co. (a copartnership, composed of Petersen and his son) made and performed the subcontract, and that Mooser furnished the materials to Petersen & Co. The judgment, however, does not depend upon these findings, but rests solely upon the finding of payment to Petersen and Mooser. The court found that the total value of the labor and materials done and furnished under the subcontract, including the materials furnished by Mooser, was only $2,658.75. That Shain drew his checks on the Pacific Bank in favor of Petersen & Co. as follows: March 19, 1889, $400; March 23, $200; March 29, $500; April 20, $630; April 27, $60; June 8, $500; June 14, $500. That the last two checks, each for $500, were delivered by Shain to Mooser to enable him to obtain payment from Petersen & Co. for the materials furnished by him, and were indorsed to him by Petersen & Co.; who credited the same to Shain on the subcontract, and that they were paid to Mooser by the bank. That the other five checks were paid to Petersen & Co., who credited them also to Shain on the subcontract. It is thus found that Shain paid to Petersen & Co. $2,790, with which sum he was credited on account of Petersen's subcontract, which called for only $2,754.55. I think the payments, thus accepted and credited by Petersen & Co. as payments on Petersen's subcontract, should be considered as payments to Petersen on that contract, since such acceptance and credit implies Petersen's consent. Indeed, he expressly admits in his complaint that he had been paid $2,192.85, which necessarily included payment for a large portion of the materials furnished by Mooser. Can it be presumed that this payment of $2,192.85 was, in addition to the payment of $2,790 to Petersen & Co., by checks on the bank? If so, Shain had paid to Petersen and Petersen & Co. $4,982.85 on a contract which, according to the complaint, bound him to pay only $2,754.55, and, according to the finding of the court, only $2,658.75. The finding that nothing was due or owing from Shain to Petersen is at least a necessary inference from the other facts found and admitted. What was accepted and credited as payment by Petersen & Co. was necessarily so accepted and credited by Petersen.

The only point made on Mooser's appeal is founded on the eleventh finding, to the effect that, when Mooser drew the money on the two checks drawn by Shain and indorsed by Petersen & Co., he applied the money ($1,000) to the payment of a prior debt due him from Petersen, according to an agreement between him and Petersen made on May 1, 1889, 39 days before the first of said checks was drawn, and 46 days prior to the date of the second check. As before stated, those checks were delivered to Mooser by Shain to enable him to obtain payment from Petersen & Co. for the materials furnished by him for the Drexler building. Shain, as the original contractor, was bound to clear the building of all liens for labor and materials done and furnished by his subcontractor, Petersen, and therefore was interested in having Petersen's subcontractor, Mooser, paid for all materials furnished by him. Under these circumstances, Shain, with the consent of Petersen, had a right to pay Mooser for the materials furnished by him, and to direct the application of the payment to that purpose; and the court found that Mooser was fully paid by the two checks. This ultimate fact, upon which the judgment in favor of the owner and original contractor rests, is not inconsistent with any other finding. Even the probative facts found tend to prove it. But the sufficiency of the evidence to prove it cannot be questioned on this appeal upon the judgment roll alone.

Counsel for appellants lays some stress upon the finding that, at the time the claims of liens were filed, there remained unpaid to Shain, the original contractor, $4,188 of the original contract price, and therefore the owner would suffer no injury by being compelled to satisfy the alleged liens of the plaintiffs. This, however, would be small comfort to Shain, the original contractor, who paid Mooser for the purpose of preventing his claim of lien, and thereby enabling himself to obtain from the owner full payment of the original contract price. The case of Lumber Co. v. Neal, 91 Cal. 362, 27 Pac. Rep. 743, is not in point for appellants. I think the judgment in each of these causes should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons expressed in the foregoing opinion, the judgment in each of these causes is affirmed.

BIRCH v. HALE. (No. 15,167.)

BUILDING CONTRACT—ACTION BY CONTRACTOR—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS OF ARCHITECT—WITNESS—IMPEACHMENT.

1. In an action by a contractor to recover for putting an elevator in defendant's building, in which defendant claimed damages for improper construction of certain pipes, it is error to permit plaintiff to testify that defendant's architect admitted that he gave "instructions to put up the pipes in that manner," where it did not appear that such architect was defendant's agent when the admission was made, nor that it related to a transaction then depending.

2. It is error to admit evidence to impeach the testimony of a witness as to his statements made out of court, when the proper foundation has not been laid by calling the attention of such witness to the time and place at which it is claimed such statements were made, as required by Code Civil Proc. § 2052.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by William H. Birch against Joseph P. Hale to recover a balance due on a contract for the construction of an elevator in defendant's building. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Alex. D. Keyes, for appellant. C. E. K. Royce, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. In March, 1890, Wm. H. Birch & Co. entered into a written contract with the defendant to erect for him in the building situate at the northwest corner of McAllister and Larkin streets, San Francisco, a safety hydraulic passenger elevator, and to furnish the pumps and machinery necessary to be used therewith. The contract provided that the elevator should have attached to it an air brake, which the contractors would test in a certain specified manner, and should be capable of lifting 2,000 pounds at least, and should be put in complete running order, according to the specifications. The contract fixed the price to be paid for the elevator at $4,200, and the parties verbally agreed that the price of the deep-well pump to be put in the cellar of the building should be $565. Before the work was completed, Birch & Co. assigned the contract, and all their rights under it, to the plaintiff, and he thereupon proceeded with the work, and finished it about April 1, 1891. While the elevator was being constructed, certain work was done and materials furnished by the contractors, which were not included in the contract, and are described as "extras," amounting to $158.31. Under the contract, and pursuant to its provisions, the defendant paid to the contractors sums of money aggregating $4,162, but refused to pay the balance, including the said "extras," claimed to be due. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $763.81, balance alleged to be still due and unpaid.

The answer denied that defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the sum named, or in any sum whatever, and alleged payment in full. It then set up the following defenses: (1) That the work upon the elevator and its appurtenances was done in such an unskillful and negligent manner that the defendant was obliged to make sundry repairs and alterations upon and about the same, and was thereby damaged in the sum of $829.78; (2) that the plaintiff failed to test the air brake attached to the elevator in the manner provided for in the written contract; (3) that the elevator was guaranteed to be capable of lifting a weight of 2,000 pounds, and that it was in fact only capable of lifting a weight of 1,200; (4) that Birch & Co. for a valuable consideration guaranteed the materials and workmanship of the elevator and pumping machinery, and agreed to keep them in good running order for one year free of expense, but that they were so carelessly and negligently constructed that defendant was obliged to expend, and did expend, a large sum of money in altering and repairing the same; (5) that plaintiff had released the defendant from all liability to him and his assignors.

The case was tried in the court below without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount demanded in his complaint. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The attorney for appellant admits in his brief "that there was a conflict of evidence on nearly every point in this case," but he says "that the appellant had a decided preponderance of the evidence, both in quality and in quantity. The trial court, however, having found against the appellant on every issue, he is not at liberty to complain that the evidence was insufficient on any point upon which there was any evidence at all." There was evidence bearing upon every material point in the case, and the only questions, therefore, which need be considered, relate to certain errors in law claimed to have been committed by the court in the admission of evidence. The water used to lift and lower the elevator, and for other purposes in the building, was pumped by the deep-well pump in the basement to a tank on the top of the building; and one of the complaints on the part of the defendant was that the pipes leading to the tank were put up in such a "crooked manner" that the pump when at work made a great noise, and caused the building to shake. The plaintiff testified that the noise was caused by the construction of the pipes, and that the pipes were put up in a crooked manner under the direction of the architect, though he said that direction was not given to him personally. He was then asked, "Did the architect admit that he had given instructions to put up the pipes in that manner?" The question was objected to by the defendant, and the objection overruled, and thereupon the witness answered, "Yes, sir." The appellant contends that this ruling was erroneous, and that it operated to his prejudice. That the evidence objected to was material is clear. The architect was the agent of appellant in supervising the construction of the building, and, if the pipes were put up in a crooked manner by his direction, then appellant could not be heard to complain that by reason of this improper construction the pumping of water through them caused a disturbing noise and vibration in the building. Whether, however, they were so put up or not was a question in dispute. The architect, when subsequently called as a witness for defendant, testified that he gave no instructions to the plaintiff, or to his assignors, concerning the construction of the elevator, and denied that he ever admitted to the plaintiff that the pipes were erected under his direction in the manner in which they were erected. The admission or declaration of an agent binds his principal "only when it is made during the continuance of the agency, in regard to a transaction then pending et dum fervet opus. It is because it is a verbal act, and part of the res gestae, that it is admissible at all." Greenl. Ev. § 113. "An agent is empowered to act for the principal, but has no power to make admissions to bind him, unless these admissions constitute a part of the res gestae." Garfield v. Water Co., 14 Cal. 36. "The admissions of an agent, not connected with the transaction to which they refer, cannot bind his principal, even though made in explanation of an act previously done by him while in the exercise of his agency.

* * * The declarations of an agent or servant do not in general bind the principal. To be admissible, * * * they must be made, not only during the continuance of the agency, but in regard to a transaction depending at the very time." Beasley v. Fruit Packing Co., 92 Cal. 388, 28 Pac. Rep. 485. It does not appear that the architect was still the agent of appellant when the admission sought to be proved was made, if made at all, nor does it appear that it related to a transaction then depending, and was thus a part of the res gestae. On the contrary, the question plainly implied that it related to a past transaction. This being so, the objection should have been sustained, and the evidence excluded. Again, when the defendant was introducing his evidence, he called as a witness one J. M. Dooley, who testified that he was the janitor of the building, and had been such since the 1st of March, 1891. On cross-examination the witness was asked if he did not tell Mr. Meagher and Mr. Walter Birch that after certain repairs were made the pump ran finely. He was also asked if he did not tell Mr. Meagher at that time that the pump was working all right. Both questions were answered in the negative. In rebuttal Meagher was called by plaintiff as a witness, and testified that about the 26th of March, 1891, in Mr. Woolf's room, he had a conversation with Mr. Dooley about the noise. He was then asked, "State what the conversation was," and answered, "Mr. Dooley said that the pump was all right if it worked like that all the time." Again he was asked, "Did he say that the pump was working all right?" and answered, "He did." Both of these questions were objected to by the defendant on the ground that the proposed testimony was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and on the ground that the time and place of the supposed conversation were not called to the attention of the witness Dooley, at the time of his examination. The court overruled the objections, and the defendant duly excepted. The evident purpose of this testimony elicited from Meagher was to contradict and impeach the testimony of Dooley. Section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "A witness may also be impeached by evidence that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony; but, before this can be done, the statements must be related to him, with the circumstances of times, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements," etc. Here it is not shown that the proper foundation for the impeaching testimony had been laid, and hence we conclude that the court erred in admitting it.

Other similar points are made, but they need not be specially considered.

For the errors above noted, the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SAULQUE v. DURRALDE. (No. 19,121.)

FORCIBLE DETAINER—PLAINTIFF'S POSSESSION—SUFFICIENCY.

In forcible detainer, it appeared that plaintiff claimed under a lease of the stubble; that he kept sheep three days on 20 acres not in grain; that 15 days afterwards he put three watering troughs on the land; that 53 days thereafter he returned and demanded possession of defendant, who had taken possession; and that at such time the grain was cut, but on the ground unthreshed. Held, that plaintiff did not have such possession as entitled him to recover, under Code Civil Proc. § 1160, subd. 2, which provides that a person is guilty of forcible detainer who, during the absence of the "occupant" of any lands, unlawfully enters thereon, and that "occupant" means one who, within five days preceding such unlawful entry, was in peaceable possession.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Action by Jules Saulque against Buente Durralde for forcible detainer of a certain tract of land. From a judgment of nonsuit, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Barnes & Selby, for appellant. Blackstock & Shepherd, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit entered against him, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The action is for forcible detainer of a tract of land containing about 400 acres. The complaint was framed under the second subdivision of section 1160, Code Civil Proc.,¹ alleging that at the time of defendant's entry, and for five days prior thereto, the plaintiff was in peaceable and actual possession and occupation, and entitled to the possession, of the whole ranch; that on August 25, 1891, during his temporary absence, defendant unlawfully entered and took possession; and further alleged a demand for possession, and defendant's refusal for five days; that he was damaged, etc. The answer denied these allegations, and pleaded a right to enter and depasture the stubble under a license from the owner of the ranch. One T. W. Dixon occupied and farmed the ranch in question on the shares. On June 19, 1891, he made an agreement with the plaintiff, of which the material part is as follows: "I have rented to Jules Saulque the stubble on the place known as 'the 'Sturgiss Place' which is farmed by me, comprising about 400 acres, at the rate of $320 for the whole place. I reserve the right to use one well for my exclusive use." Plaintiff testified that on July 15th he went upon a part of the land with a flock of sheep, and kept them there three days, and then took them away; that on August 3d he went back without the sheep, and put some watering troughs upon the land; that on August 26th he again returned, and found that some one had removed his troughs and put them out on the county road, and also found the defendant on the land with his sheep, and made a demand that he surrender possession. At the last-named date the grain had been cut, but was still lying in "dumps," and had not been threshed. The part of the land upon which plaintiff had his sheep for three days in July was not in grain, and embraced about 20 acres, upon which, plaintiff said, Mr. Dixon gave him permission to put his sheep. The defendant took his sheep upon the same part of the land the day preceding plaintiff's demand. Mr. Dixon testified that he was living upon the farm, farming it on shares; that one-half of whatever he got was his; that he gave defendant, who had his sheep upon other land, the right to water them at the well near the house, but that he gave him no other right.

I think the plaintiff did not show such possession as would have supported a verdict in his favor, and that the nonsuit was properly granted. The grain not having been removed, the right to enter given by the lease or contract had not accrued, and there was no possession or present right of possession under it. The occupancy of the 20 acres not in grain, for three days in July, and placing three watering troughs upon it on the 3d of August, was not such an occupancy on the 25th of August as the statute contemplates as a basis for so harsh a remedy as that of "forcible detainer."

Some exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court upon questions of evidence. The only exception noticed in appellant's brief relates to the question of damages. As the plaintiff did not show a right to recover in the action, he was not injured by the exclusion of evidence upon that question. An examination of the whole record discloses no prejudicial error. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

BRADFORD et al. v. McAVOY et al. (No. 14,972.)

WRITS — SUMMONS — SERVICE BY PUBLICATION — SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT — DEFAULT — WHEN SET ASIDE.

1. The affidavit of plaintiff for an order for publication in unlawful detainer stated that, when the action was brought, defendant disappeared, and could not be found in the city or county; that plaintiff made inquiries at various places and of various persons who knew him and would be likely to know his whereabouts, but was unable to find him; that eight new summonses had been issued, and that, since the issuance of the first one, four competent persons had been employed to obtain service; that since the suit defendant has not been in his accustomed resorts, but has left an agent collecting the rents of the premises in dispute from subtenants occupying the same; and that affiant does not know the whereabouts of defendant, and believes he conceals himself to avoid service of such summons. Held, that the affidavit was sufficient to justify an order for publication.

2. A default will not be set aside on the affidavit of defendant simply that he did not conceal himself to avoid service, and the affidavit of such agent that plaintiff at no time personally inquired of him as to defendant's whereabouts.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by E. W. Bradford and others against Oliver McAvoy and others for unlawful detainer of real property after default in payment of rent. From an order denying his motion to set aside a default entered against him, defendant McAvoy appeals. Affirmed.

Nagle & Nagle, for appellants. H. A. Powell, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a judgment entered against the defendant Oliver McAvoy by default. The action was for unlawful detainer of property after default in payment of rent. The complaint was filed August 15, 1890, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and the summons was served on McAvoy by publication in pursuance of an order of the court. His default was entered on December 4, 1890, and judgment that the plaintiffs have possession of the premises was entered against him on the 15th of the same month. On January 26, 1891, he served on plaintiffs' counsel notice that on the 30th of that month he would move the court to set aside the judgment upon the ground that the summons had not been served on him and the court had no jurisdiction to render the judgment. With this notice he also served copies of two affidavits, one made by himself and the other by his agent, William Nicoll. The motion came on regularly for hearing at the time appointed, and the counsel for plaintiffs then objected to the hearing, on the ground that due notice of the motion had not been given as required by law. The motion was thereupon submitted upon the papers in the case, and the affidavits of McAvoy and Nicoll, and denied.

The only question presented for decision by the appellant is as to the sufficiency of the affidavit on which the order for publication was made. It is claimed that the affidavit was insufficient because the facts stated did not show that the defendant could not be found by the exercise of due diligence within the state, or that he concealed himself to avoid the service of summons. Waiving respondents' objection to the hearing of the motion because notice thereof was not given five days before the time appointed for the hearing, as required by section 1005, Code Civil Proc., we think the affidavit for publication must be held sufficient to authorize the order. The Code provides: "When the person upon whom the service is to be made * * * cannot after due diligence be found within the state, or conceals himself to avoid the service of summons, * * * and the fact appears by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court or a judge thereof, * * * such court or judge may make an order that the service be made by publication of the summons." Section 412, Id. The affidavit in question was made by one of the plaintiffs, and stated that, at or about the time of the commencement of the action, the defendant McAvoy resided and was in the city and county of San Francisco, and had an office or headquarters at 425 Mont gomery street; that at or about said time he disappeared from his office, and could not be found in said city and county; that thereafter affiant made inquiries for defendant at various places, including 425 Montgomery street, and of various persons who knew him and would be likely to know of his whereabouts, but was unable to find him; that eight new summonses had been issued in the action; and that, since the issuance of the first summons, four different competent persons had been employed to obtain service upon defendant, but without success, and that ever since such first issuance a continued and constant effort had been made to secure personal service of the summons upon defendant; "that, since the commencement of this suit, defendant McAvoy has not been in his accustomed places and resorts, but has left an agent in this city, who is using persistent efforts to continue to collect the rents of the premises sought to be recovered herein, which premises are occupied by several subtenants; that affiant does not know the whereabouts of defendant McAvoy, and verily believes that he conceals himself to avoid the service of said summons." From this affidavit it evidently appeared to the satisfaction of the judge who made the order for publication that the defendant was concealing himself to avoid the service of summons, and the order so recited. It is true the affidavit does not state that the affiant had made inquiry of defendant's agent, but, in view of the other facts stated, we do not think it can be said that the conclusion reached by the judge was not justified. This being so, the counter affidavits read at the hearing of the motion need not be considered. If considered, however, they would not affect the result. The affidavit of the defendant simply stated that he did not conceal himself for the purpose of avoiding the service of summons on him, but it fails to state where he was during the three or four months that the action was pending, or where or how he could have been found; and the affidavit of Nicoll simply states that he was at the time of the commencement of the action, is now, and for a long time prior thereto had been, the agent of the defendant to collect rents from the tenants of the property in question, and "that at no time did the above-named plaintiff personally inquire of him as to the whereabouts of the above-named defendant, Oliver McAvoy." It does not state that the agent knew at any time where McAvoy could have been found, or that he could or would have given information as to his whereabouts if inquiry had been made of him. We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SQUIRES. (No. 20,984.)

JURORS—OFFER TO TAKE BRIBE—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 93, making it a felony for a juror to ask for or take a bribe, the indictment need not charge that the offense was committed before the indictment was found, as the statute contains no such requirement, and therefore it is sufficient where the day on which the offense was alleged to have been committed is the same day as that on which the indictment was filed.

2. Pen. Code, § 93, declaring that any juror "who asks, receives, or agrees to receive, any bribe upon any agreement or understanding that his vote * * * shall be influenced thereby," is punishable, makes it an offense merely to ask for a bribe, and it is not essential that there should be an agreement between the juror and the person of whom the bribe is asked.

3. Where the indictment charges that defendant, while a juror, did feloniously ask and agree to receive money from the attorney for defendant in the action on trial, "upon an agreement which he, the said [defendant,] then and there offered to make" with the attorney, that he would vote for defendant, the most material part of the charge is that defendant asked for a bribe, which brings the indictment under section 93, and not under section 96, which makes it an offense for a juror to promise to give a verdict for a particular party.

4. The admission of evidence which at the time appears to be incompetent is harmless error, where it becomes competent at a later stage of the trial, unless it appears that the adverse party was injured by the admission of such evidence at the wrong time.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

J. H. Squires was convicted of asking for a bribe to influence his actions as a juror, and from the judgment of conviction, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

John Whaley, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

TEMPLE, C. The defendant was convicted of a felony in asking for and agreeing to receive a bribe as a juror. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial. The indictment upon which he was tried was found, presented, and filed June 7, 1892, and charges that on the 7th day of June, 1892, while defendant was a juror in a case on trial in the superior court of San Francisco, the pendency of which is particularly set out and described in the indictment, "said Squires did willfully, unlawfully, corruptly, and feloniously ask and agree to receive of and from one James F. Smith, one of the attorneys for defendants in said civil action, the sum of $500 in lawful money of the United States, upon an agreement which he, the said J. H. Squires, then and there offered to make and enter into with said James F. Smith, that in consideration of the payment to the said J. H. Squires of the sum of $500, in lawful money, of the United States, he, the said J. H. Squires, would cast his vote and render his decision as juror in said civil action in favor of the defendants in said civil action," etc. Defendant was prosecuted under section 93 of the Penal Code, which enacts: "Every * * * juror * * * who asks, receives, or agrees to receive any bribe upon any agreement or understanding that his vote, opinion or decision shall be influenced thereby is punishable," etc. The defendant demurred to the indictment, and, after a verdict against him, moved an arrest of judgment, in both modes raising the questions herein discussed as to the sufficiency of the indictment.

1. The first objection to the indictment is that it does not charge that the offense was committed prior to the finding of the indictment. Our statute does not require that the indictment shall show that the offense was committed on a day prior to the time of filing the indictment, as do the statutes in some of the states, from which authorities are cited by appellant, but the indictment is sufficient if it can be understood therefrom (Pen. Code, § 959, subd. 5) "that the offense was committed at some time prior to the time of finding the indictment." The usual course is to charge the commission of the offense on a named day, which is prior to the day of finding the indictment. The proof need not show that the offense was committed on the day named. It is ordinarily sufficient if both the days named and on which the offense is proven to have been committed are within the statute of limitations and prior to the finding of the indictment. In this case it might have been charged that the offense was committed on the sixth, and proven to have been committed on the seventh, prior to the finding of the indictment. But while courts do not generally take note of fractions of days, they do when necessary. To accuse one of the commission of a crime is to charge that it was committed prior to the accusation. Where the indictment expressly states that an offense was committed on a date subsequent to the day of the accusation, it charges an impossible act. On the face of the indictment, therefore, the accused cannot be guilty. Under a statute like ours, I think this is all there can be in a point of this character. But that is not this case. One may be accused of an offense on the very day of its commission; and, as already said, to accuse is to state that the act charged was prior to the accusation.

2. The second objection to the indictment is that it does not charge that defendant asked for or agreed to receive a bribe upon any agreement or understanding that he would cast his vote, etc. It is said that it does not appear that any agreement or understanding had been made, but only that the accused offered to make an agreement or understanding. Section 93 of the Penal Code denounces, as liable to punishment, those who ask for a bribe. To complete the offense, it is not necessary that the party approached shall consent to give it. Unless he does so, there could be no agreement or understanding. In such case it cannot be charged that such agreement or understanding exists, but only that the accused was ready to agree or enter into an understanding.

3. The third objection to the indictment is that it is uncertain whether the offense charged is that defined in section 93, or in section 96, of the Penal Code.¹ Possibly, an offense may be committed which might be prosecuted under either section, but in this indictment a fact is stated which is not required to constitute the offense defined in section 96, but may be the most material part of the charge in an offense defined in section 93, to wit, that defendant asked for a bribe. To solicit is not made an offense under section 96. It is not necessary to say whether one who promises his decision or vote for a bribe could be prosecuted under section 93.

4. The fourth point is in regard to a ruling on the admission of evidence. Chickering, a witness for the prosecution, was allowed to state that he consulted Judge Sanderson in regard to the matter before he called at the defendant's store and received, as he states, the offer to be bribed. According to the testimony of the witness, the defendant had already approached him, and had intimated that he was willing to receive a bribe. He was allowed to state, against the objection of defendant, that he then consulted his associates in the case, and laid the matter before the judge who was trying the case, before he called at defendant's store to find out exactly what defendant was trying to accomplish. Further than this he did not state the conversation had with the judge. Of course, the inference was that the judge concurred in the course adopted. The evidence was confessedly introduced to show the good faith of the witness; that is, to add to the force and effect of his testimony. It was plainly not part of the res gestae, and the general rule is that a party cannot bolster up his witness until he has been attacked; but if it be admitted, for the purposes of this case, that the evidence was inadmissible at that time, still its admission would not constitute reversible error if it became relevant afterwards, unless defendant was injured by its being introduced at the wrong time. Subsequently it did appear very plainly that the defense claimed that the witnesses Chickering and Smith were really trying to bribe the defendant, and that he had simply declined to be bribed. Defendant and his wife both testified to that effect. This raised a collateral question, bearing directly upon the main issue. That it was admissible seems to have been held in the case of People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 618, 19 Pac. Rep. 865, and 20 Pac. Rep. 129. It is impossible to see how defendant was injured by its introduction at the wrong time, conceding it to have been so. Evidence of that character is admitted in almost every case without objection. The witness is allowed to tell who he is, what positions he has held, and to show that he learned the facts to which he testifies in an honorable way, and to state facts which would tend to rebut any inference that his own conduct in connection with the transaction was improper. It may be difficult to say how far examinations for such purposes should be allowed to go, but I think there was no abuse of discretion in this case.

¹ Pen. Code, § 96, is as follows: "Every juror or person drawn or summoned as a juror, or chosen arbitrator or umpire, or appointed referee, who either (1) makes any promise or agreement to give a verdict or decision for or against any party; or (2) willfully and corruptly permits any communication to be made to him, or receives any book, paper, instrument, or information relating to any cause or matter pending before him, except according to the regular course of proceedings,—is punishable by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years."

5. The fifth point involves the same question as to the admissibility of the evidence.

6. The sixth point is that it was not shown that defendant's vote was influenced, or that he made any effort to procure a verdict for the defendants in the civil action; that at most he only showed a willingness to commit an offense, but did nothing whatever. After what has been said as to the nature of the charge, this point requires no discussion.

7. It is contended, as the seventh point, that the evidence does not tend to prove that defendant asked for a bribe to influence his decision or vote, but that he proposed for pay to procure a verdict. He did not, as a matter of fact, propose to be paid for his vote simply. He proposed to take $500 if he should procure a verdict. The case in which he was a juror was a civil one, and a verdict might have been rendered by a concurrence of nine persons. It would follow that, if he gave his vote for plaintiff, a verdict might still have been rendered for the defendants in the civil suit, in which event defendant would have been entitled to his money had his proposal been accepted. He may contend that he was merely intending to place himself in a position to earn the money in case the verdict went for the defendants, which it might have done without his vote and in spite of his best effort to prevent it. Perhaps, too, by his vote he might have prevented a verdict against the defendants; but in such case, according to his proposal, he would have received nothing. Or perhaps he had or sought a similar agreement with the other party, also, in which case the expectation of a bribe could not influence his verdict. It was possible, therefore, that he might have voted as a juror and worked against the defendants, and still have been entitled to his money, according to his proposal; or that he could have done all he could to procure a verdict for the defendants, and still not have earned the bribe. All this shows undoubtedly that defendant was to do something more than cast his vote as a juror in favor of the defendants to earn the money, and that, in certain contingencies, he might not be able to earn it at all, even if it did influence his vote; but it also seems to me that he offered to promise that in certain contingencies he would cast his vote as a juror for defendants. If it should happen that his vote would be required to determine the case for defendants, I think, supposing the witnesses for the prosecution told the truth, he must be held to have promised or offered to promise that they should have his vote, and I think this is all that is required to make out the offense under the statute.

8. The eighth point is that the court erred in refusing an instruction, and involves the same points already discussed. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SMITH v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY. (No. 19,122.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1893.)

CLAIM AGAINST COUNTY—REFUSAL TO ACT ON—MANDATE.

A contract with a county for building a bridge provided that the price was payable on presentation of a certificate of the superintendent of construction of the bridge in warrants drawn on the first road district fund of the county. A claim under such contract presented to the county board of supervisors, without reference to the fund out of which it was to be paid, and without the superintendent's certificate, was rejected. Afterwards claimant again presented a claim under the contract, asking that it be paid in warrants drawn on the road district fund in question, and the superintendent's certificate and a copy of the contract were attached. The certificate appeared to have been issued after the first claim was presented. Held, that the two claims were materially different, and a writ of mandate would lie to compel the county board of supervisors to act on the second claim.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Smith against the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county to compel the board to act on plaintiff's claim against the county. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Fording, J. P. Hight, and Harris & Gregg, for appellant. John W. Mitchell, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the county of San Bernardino commanding the board of supervisors of said county to take action on the claim of plaintiff, filed on the 27th day of October, 1891, before the said board of supervisors, by approving or rejecting the claim. Plaintiff filed a claim against the county of San Bernardino, based upon the same contract which is relied upon in the present litigation, and the claim was rejected by the board. After six months had expired from the date of such rejection, but within one year from the day when the liability accrued, plaintiff filed a second claim, based upon the same contract. The board of supervisors refused either to reject or approve this claim, upon the ground that the same claim had been previously rejected, and the law did not require further action in the premises, and this proceeding by mandamus followed.

There is no issue of fact in the case. Both claims are before the court, and the only question to be determined is, upon a comparison can it be said that there is a material difference between these claims? We believe they differ in some important respects. The contract for the bridge work provided, among other things, that the contract price was payable upon the presentation of the written certificate of the superintendent of construction of said bridge that said bridge has been erected and completed in every respect in accordance with the terms of the contract. The production of the certificate of the superintendent of construction before the board of supervisors was a necessary condition to the allowance of the claim. This certificate, bearing date October 27, 1892, is attached to the second claim presented, but was not attached to the first; and, viewed in the light furnished by its date, could not have been issued at that time. Again, the contract provides that the contractor shall be paid in warrants drawn upon the fund known as the "First Road District Fund of San Bernardino County." The second claim is presented upon that basis, and asks for warrants upon such fund, but the original claim was against San Bernardino county, and for the sum of $5,500. There may have been, and very probably was, a material difference in the value of warrants drawn upon the various road district funds of the county. The claim upon its face, if indicating anything in this regard, would suggest that a warrant upon the general fund of the county, rather than upon any special road district fund, was expected and claimed. Upon a careful inspection of the first claim presented, we are not prepared to say that upon its rejection by the board of supervisors it was sufficient upon its face, even aside from the lack of the certificate of the superintendent of construction, to support an action for the recovery of a judgment of $5,500 from the county, to be paid in warrants at par drawn from the fund known as the "First Road District Fund of San Bernardino County." Those were the provisions of the contract, and the claim should have been sufficiently full and explicit to form the basis of such an action. The second claim presented appears to cover all these grounds, and, in addition thereto, a copy of the contract is attached. For these reasons we conclude that the claims are materially different. Let the judgment be affirmed.

GRANGERS' BANK OF CALIFORNIA v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 15,323.)

WRIT OF PROHIBITION—ACTIONS TO RECOVER REALTY.

Under the constitutional provision that actions for the recovery of real estate shall be commenced in the county in which it is situated, a writ of prohibition will issue to a court entertaining such an action, for real estate outside the county, though an accounting is also asked as to the rents and profits, and though various proceedings had been had in the action, without any question as to the jurisdiction of the court.

In bank.

Application of the Grangers' Bank of California for writ of prohibition to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, department 6; William T. Wallace, Judge. Writ granted.

Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for petitioner. Geo. W. Towle, Jr., and H. S. Foote, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition, and the following state of facts is disclosed by the petition: The Grangers' Bank of California was the owner of certain warehouses, situated in the counties of Fresno, Tulare, etc., some of these warehouses being erected upon the lands of the bank, and others on the lands of the railroad company, leased to the bank by that corporation. Upon the 6th day of January, 1890, the bank entered into a contract of sale with one W. G. Ross, wherein it was agreed, among other things, that said Ross should pay the bank $49,000, at the times and in the manner therein provided, and in consideration thereof the bank agreed to sell and transfer to said Ross these warehouses, together with all scales, platforms, etc., belonging to said warehouse business. It was provided that the title to the warehouses should not vest in Ross until the money was paid as covenanted. It was further understood that the interest of the bank in and to the ground upon which the warehouses were situated should pass to Ross upon the consummation of the sale. The right of re-entry by the bank upon default upon the part of Ross was also a condition of the contract. Under this agreement Ross entered into the possession of the warehouses, and in the fall of the year 1890, being largely indebted to the bank, made an assignment of all the property referred to in the contract to one Showers, for the purpose of securing his liability to the bank, and Showers thereupon took possession thereof. About January 1, 1891, the bank, claiming that Ross had forfeited his rights under the contract by reason of certain defaults on his part, took possession of the property, claiming to be the true owner, and ever since has had such possession. Thereafter Ross commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against Showers and the bank, alleging, among other matters, that his indebtedness to the bank is more than offset by the receipts from the rents, issues, and profits of the business; that the contract has not been forfeited, and he has demanded the possession of the warehouses, which has been refused; that the use and occupation are of great value, and he prays for an accounting as to the rents, issues, and profits; that the bank deliver to plaintiff the warehouses, platforms, etc., referred to in the contract; that the bank be declared to be paid in full from such rents and profits; that he be declared to be the owner thereof; and that said contract be held to be in full force and effect. Issue was joined upon the complaint, and during the pendency of the action an application to the trial court for the appointment of a receiver was made, and the defendant bank brought this proceeding to restrain the court from making such appointment, upon the ground that such act would be in excess of jurisdiction. In addition to the foregoing matters, the petitioner alleged that the present status of the case of Ross v. Showers et al. is such that the only substantial issues involved relate to the right of possession, recovery of possession of its warehouses, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof. The petitioner further alleged that said warehouses were real estate. The return to the alternative writ is made by Ross, the real party in interest, and consists principally of the affidavit presented by him to the lower court upon his application for the appointment of a receiver. No denial is found anywhere in such return as to the allegations of the petition pertaining to the nature of the issues at present involved in the litigation of Ross v. Showers et al., and neither is there a denial of the allegation of the petition that said warehouses were real estate. Petitioner insists that the writ should issue, in this: That the appointment of a receiver would be an act in excess of the jurisdiction of the trial court, and that said excess of jurisdiction consists in (1) that a receiver in the case is not authorized by section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure; (2) that the property involved in the litigation is really situated in Fresno and Tulare counties, and it follows therefrom that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action.

We have not stated all the facts disclosed by the record bearing upon petitioner's first ground of contention, as we shall not discuss it; being satisfied that the second ground relied upon has sufficient merit to entitle it to the relief demanded. It is to be regretted that counsel opposing the application has not seen fit to attempt to enlighten the court, either in his oral argument or brief, upon the merit of appellant's contention in this regard. His only answer thereto is set out in his return, and appears to partake of the character of a plea of the statute of limitations or of estoppel. It is as follows: "That the suit of William G. Ross vs. Andrew Showers et al., in said writ referred to, has been pending before respondent since, to wit, the 12th day of January, 1891, and jurisdiction of respondent in the matter of said suit has not, during all the times since said 12th day of January, 1891, to and until, to wit, the 17th day of March, 1893, been called in question; that during said time respondent has had submitted to it by the parties to said suit, both plaintiff and defendants, numerous questions of fact and of law, and the same have, when so submitted, been decided by respondent without any objection made to the jurisdiction of respondent in the premises." In answer to the foregoing statement, it is sufficient to say the jurisdiction of the trial court is now directly assailed, and, giving counsel's allegations full credit, they avail nothing in resisting such attack.

The present status of the case of Ross vs. Showers, as disclosed by the facts we have stated, indicate it to be an action to recover the possession of real property, and for an accounting as to the rents, issues and profits thereof. It also appears that said real property is not situated in the county where the action was commenced and is now pending. For these reasons the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, where the action was brought, has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter. This question was directly passed upon, and the law declared, in the case of Fritts v. Camp, 94 Cal. 394, 29 Pac. Rep. 867, which decision has been followed in the recent case of Pacific Yacht Club v. Sausalito Bay Water Co., (decision filed June 8, 1893,) 33 Pac. Rep. 322. The fact that an accounting is asked as to the rents, issues, and profits of the warehouses in no way militates against the position that the action is for the recovery of real property. Such is the usual course in that character of action, and the claim for rents and profits is purely incidental to the main relief sought. In a question of the kind here presented, we are bound by the provisions of the constitution; and the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure pertaining to the matter of a change of venue and the proper county in which to commence actions avail nothing as against the declaration of the constitution of the state "that all actions for the recovery of the possession of real estate * * * shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof affected by such action, is situated." As was said in the concurring opinion in the case of People v. Wong Ark, 96 Cal. 138, 30 Pac. Rep. 1115, upon the jurisdiction of this court: "As the legislature has no power to grant the court jurisdiction, it has no power to deprive the court of jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the court came from a source of power above and beyond the legislature of the state, and the court can only be deprived of it by the source from whence it came."

For the foregoing reasons, let the writ issue as prayed for.

PEOPLE v. NONELLA. (No. 20,959.)

IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS—LAYING FOUNDATION—CRIMINAL LAW.

1. On a prosecution for assault with intent to kill, defendant's wife was asked if she did not tell one B. that defendant had intended to do the shooting some weeks earlier, and that defendant had made her pursue a certain course of action, which statement she denied having made. Held that, as such evidence did not bear directly on the shooting, the witness could not be impeached by a question asked of B. as to what she had told B. about the shooting.

2. In examining an impeaching witness, he should be asked the direct question whether the witness sought to be impeached made the alleged contradictory statement at the time and place mentioned.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county.

Sylvester Nonella was convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, and appeals. Reversed.

Graves & Graves and L. Lamy, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, F. A. Darn, and E. P. Unangst, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of an assault with intent to commit murder, and appealed from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The motion for a new trial should have been granted by reason of error committed by the court in admitting improper evidence before the jury. Mrs. Nonella, wife of the defendant, was an eyewitness to the affray, and testified in behalf of her husband. Upon cross-examination she was asked the following questions, which were answered in the negative: "Didn't you tell Mrs. Bassi the night of the 22d of February, when no one was present but you and Mrs. Bassi, and in the garden near your house, that your husband intended to shoot him some weeks before that? Didn't you tell Mrs. Bassi, at the same time and place, when no one was present but you and Mrs. Bassi, that you didn't want to go out and speak to Firanzi, but your husband made you do it?" Objections were made to these questions upon various grounds, which were overruled, the district attorney stating that his only object in asking them was for the purpose of laying a foundation to impeach the witness. Owing to other matters which will hereafter receive our attention, we do not find it necessary to review the rulings of the court regarding the admissibility of this evidence, especially in view of the fact that the answers were in the negative, and consequently no harm could have resulted to defendant thereby.

In rebuttal, the district attorney, for the purposes of impeachment, placed the witness Mrs. Bassi upon the stand, and she was asked: "What did she tell you about the shooting? Leave out all that outside matter." This question was objected to, upon the ground that it was "irrelevant and incompetent; that no foundation had been laid for the impeachment of Mrs. Nonella; and that no declaration made by Mrs. Nonella to her about the shooting, or any fact connected with the shooting, is binding upon the defendant;" but the objections were overruled. It will be noticed that the question by the district attorney, "What did she tell you about the shooting?" (referring to what defendant's wife had told her,) was hearsay evidence as to the res gestae of the offense charged, and, coming from the wife, was well calculated to weigh heavily against the cause of the defendant. Being hearsay evidence, it could only be admitted for the single purpose of impeaching the testimony of Mrs. Nonella, by showing that her previous statements as to the circumstances of the affray were inconsistent with those made by her when upon the witness stand, and it appears to have been offered and admitted for that purpose. The foundation for such a question was not laid when Mrs. Nonella was upon the stand. Upon an inspection of the two questions addressed to her, touching her conversation with Mrs. Bassi, it appears that neither of them in any way referred to the actual shooting of the prosecuting witness. In order that a witness may be impeached in this manner, the statute (section 2052, Code Civil Proc.) demands that the attention of the witness should be drawn with particularity to the circumstances surrounding the making of the statement, and his mind directed to the very statement itself, and, if in writing, such writing must be shown to the witness. Those requirements are demanded by the statute in order that all the light possible may be cast upon the scene, so that the witness' recollection may be refreshed, and his answer to the interrogatory direct and positive. Such being the fact, the proper course when the impeaching witness is produced is to ask him the direct question, "Did the party make such statement at the time and place mentioned?" In fairness to the witness to be impeached, and in order that the testimony may be of any value for impeachment purposes, such course should be pursued, and for the further reason that such a course will best serve the purpose of keeping from the jury irrelevant and incompetent matter. Beyond all doubt, such should be the rule when opposing counsel object to the question as being too broad and general. The authorities of other states and the text writers upon the law of evidence are not entirely harmonious as to the true rule, but in the case of People v. Lee Ah Yute, 60 Cal. 95, the practice of asking a direct question was held to be proper; and we are satisfied, for the reasons here stated, such should be the course adopted. The question, "What did she tell you about the shooting?" was objectionable even under those authorities which hold it improper to ask a leading question. As already indicated, it did not cover or even refer to the subject-matter involved in the questions addressed to Mrs. Nonella. In those questions not a word is found as to the shooting. One inquiry was addressed as to what the defendant determined to do two weeks before the date of the affray, and the other pertained to alleged acts of the defendant, directed towards the witness, his wife. In response to the question addressed to Mrs. Bassi, she proceeded to state, among other things, that Mrs. Nonella told her that "her husband run inside, and got the rifle, and shot the prosecuting witness." Such evidence was prejudicial to defendant, and clearly objectionable, being the purest hearsay. Considered for the purposes of impeachment, it was objectionable, no such inquiry being addressed to Mrs. Nonella when upon the stand, and consequently no foundation existing upon which to base the inquiry. It becomes unnecessary to consider other assignments of error. For the foregoing reasons it is ordered that the judgment and order denying a new trial be reversed and the cause remanded.

FANNING v. FOLEY et al. (No. 15,023.)
SERVICE OF PROCESS—VALIDITY—INFANT DEFENDANTS.

1. Where a summons has been returned, it is functus officio, and subsequent service on defendant of a copy made by plaintiff from the files of the court is a nullity.

2. In an action against an infant, service on his guardian alone, without appearance by either defendant or the guardian, will not support a judgment by default.

3. Defendant cannot be served with process 11 years after the filing of the complaint.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Lawler, Judge.

Action by E. Fanning against Thomas Foley and others. From orders setting aside a decree, and dismissing the action for want of prosecution, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Wood, for appellant. Mastic, Belcher & Mastic and Frank J. French, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This action was commenced November 1, 1879, in the district court of the twenty-third judicial district, to foreclose a street assessment, and the summons was issued on the same day. November 4th it was served upon certain named defendants, none of whom, as is now admitted, had or ever had any interest in the premises upon which it is sought to foreclose the lien. It is admitted that Joseph D. Gaven was the sole owner of the premises, and continued to be so up to the time of his death, after which his executor sold the land to one Capurro. Gaven was made a defendant, but was not served with summons. It is averred in the complaint that he was a minor, and Mrs. Sarah Ann English was served as his guardian. She made no appearance, and her default was entered as guardian of Gaven. Of course this was of no consequence, as it bound neither Mrs. English nor her ward. The summons was not returned until August 13, 1889, at which time it was filed. September 25, 1891, plaintiff made a copy of this summons without taking it from the files, and handed such copy to Capurro. An affidavit was made on behalf of plaintiff to the effect that the affiant had duly served the summons on Capurro by handing him a copy thereof. This affidavit does not appear to have been filed, but, as is stated, was attached to the summons which had been previously filed,—pinned to it, as is stated in the notices: whether with or without the knowledge of the custodian of the record does not appear, save from the presumption that plaintiff's counsel would not have done such a thing clandestinely. Capurro was never made a party to the suit in any way, nor was he served as John Doe, although such a person appears to have been a defendant. Furthermore, the suit was dismissed as to John Doe by plaintiff. Capurro did not appear in the case by any pleading.

January 29, 1891, a decree was entered in the superior court before Hon. F. W. Lawler, J., foreclosing plaintiff's lien. The decree does not run against Capurro. On motion of Mrs. Sarah A. English, this decree was set aside and vacated September 21, 1891. Mrs. English then gave notice of a motion to dismiss the action because not prosecuted with reasonable diligence. Capurro also moved to quash the service of summons upon himself, and separately, as successor in interest to Gaven, gave notice of a motion to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. Both motions were granted, and plaintiff appeals from all these orders.

It is obvious that all these orders must be affirmed. The decree was absolutely void, and the court was right in removing it from the record. The owner of the fee had never been brought in by appearance or service, and, had Gaven been alive, he could not have been served at the time of the attempted service upon Capurro. It was 11 years after filing the complaint. The summons, having been returned, was functus officio. If the practice adopted by plaintiff can be sustained, it will practically nullify in part sections 406, 408, and 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The fact that Capurro purchased the interest of Gaven after suit brought did not ipso facto make Capurro a defendant. Gaven had never been served, and had not appeared in the suit, and it was then too late effectually to bring him in, had he been alive. Perhaps, had Gaven been alive, Capurro might, under our Code, have appeared and defended in the name of Gaven, or have had himself substituted as defendant, but plaintiff could not at will, without any action on the part of the court or Capurro, consider and treat him as such. The action was properly dismissed. Under the Code, plaintiff had lost his right to bring in the real defendant, and it was of no benefit to him to keep the suit pending. Capurro, as purchaser from Gaven, had such an interest as would authorize him to make the motion. Capurro appeared for that purpose only after the decree had been vacated. Even if it must be considered as a general appearance in that case, it would not help plaintiff. Capurro was entitled to the relief granted. I advise that the orders appealed from be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of burglary, and now appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. HECKMAN v. SWETT et al. (No. 14,999.)

BOUNDARIES — NAVIGABLE STREAM — CHANGE OF CHANNEL — FORMATION OF ISLAND — PATENT TO SWAMP LANDS ON EEL RIVER — OWNERSHIP OF ISLAND — FISHING PRIVILEGE — ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Act April 28, 1855, to provide for the sale of the swamp and overflowed state lands, (section 18,) limits the provisions of the act to the swamp lands granted to the state by Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, under which lands owned by the state by virtue of its sovereignty, including the beds and shores of navigable streams below high-water mark, could not be sold or conveyed. Held, that patents of certain surveys of such swamp lands on Eel river, issued after the channel in such river was changed by a freshet, and which described the lands as bounded on such river, conveyed to the grantees the land to high-water mark only, according to the new channel, and did not convey any part of an island formed on the opposite side of such channel by the change, though part of such island is within the lines of the original surveys made prior to such change.

2. Where such island does not consist of part of such original surveys left intact by the change in the channel, but was formed of deposits within the lines of such surveys, the island is the property of the state, under Civil Code, § 1016, which provides that islands and accumulations of land, formed in the beds of navigable streams, belong to the state, if there is no title or prescription to the contrary.

3. St. 1850, p. 298, entitled "An act to regulate salmon fisheries on Eel river in Humboldt county," (section 2,) provides that the owners of land fronting such river shall have exclusive right and privilege of casting, hauling, and landing seines and nets on their own water fronts; and, for the purposes of this act, all bars and the bed of such river lying between the lines of the official survey and extreme low-water mark shall be deemed and held to be the water front of the landowner whose lines border on such river or run nearest thereto. Held that, where the bed of such old channel is above low-water mark, but below high-water mark, the owner of the land separated from such island by the old channel has the exclusive right to the fishing privilege on such island.

4. Since the owners of the land separated from the island by the new channel owned no part of the island, they could acquire no right to the fishing privilege by adverse possession of such island, since such privilege is a right which attaches to the ownership of the land on the opposite side of the old channel, and can only be acquired by obtaining title to such land.

5. Under St. 1859, p. 298, § 5, which declares that any person who shall cast, haul, or draw any seine or net, not having the right to do so, shall be deemed a trespasser, and may be convicted of a misdemeanor, a person cannot acquire a fishing privilege by adverse possession, since the violation of a penal statute, no matter how long continued, cannot confer a legal right.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by Ezekiel M. Heckman against John A. Swett and others to quiet title to a fishing privilege and for an injunction. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Horace L. Smith, for appellant. P. F. Hart and E. W. Wilson, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Action to quiet title to a fishing privilege, and for an injunction. Findings and judgments were in favor of defendants, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. Plaintiff is the owner of certain lands on the north side of Eel river, known as "Swamp-Land Survey No. 45," patented by the state to plaintiff's grantor in 1882. Defendants are owners, severally, of lots 36 and 42, swamp-land surveys, which lots were surveyed in April, 1858. Lot 36 was patented in 1871, and lot 42 in 1880. At the time of the survey these lots were wholly on the south side of Eel river, a navigable river, in which the tide ebbs and flows, and were described in the surveys and patents as bounded on that river, the courses and distances, including the meander lines on the river and navigable sloughs, and the number of acres, being also given. The court, after finding the foregoing facts, made the following finding: "(4) That Eel river is a navigable stream, and in which the tide ebbs and flows daily; that, at the date of the said several surveys, applications, and purchases as aforesaid, of said lands particularly set forth and described in findings one, two, and three, the said Eel river bounded the said lands of plaintiff particularly described and set forth in said finding one upon the south side thereof, and the said lands of the said defendants particularly described and set forth in said findings two and three upon the north side thereof; that in the winter of 1861 and 1862 there occurred a sudden, unusual, and excessive rise or freshet in the waters of said Eel river, and during which a large portion of the said lands hereinbefore, in findings two and three, particularly described and set forth, with other lands along said river, were submerged or covered with water; that said rise or freshet continued for several days, and during its continuance a very considerable part of the most northern portion of the said lands described and set forth in said findings two and three as aforesaid was cut, washed, and carried away; that such cutting, washing, and carrying away was not slow, gradual, and imperceptible in its progress, but, upon the contrary, the same was rapid, sudden, and perceptible, and its loss could be plainly seen and perceived; that blocks or masses of earth caved off this land, and fell into the river, and were washed and carried away; that houses and outbuildings thereon were also washed and carried away with the land, so rapid was the same done; that said rise or freshet continued for several days; and that, upon the subsidence in the waters of said Eel river, the same was found to have cut for itself a new channel, and the main channel thereof was then running about a quarter of a mile south of the old channel, and through and over the lands of said defendants hereinbefore, in said findings two and three, particularly described and set forth, whereby a portion of said lands thus described were left upon the south bank of Eel river as thus changed, and a portion thereof upon the north bank of said river as thus changed, thereby forming a small island which has grown gradually and imperceptibly, but mostly down stream, until it is now nearly a quarter of a mile wide, and a little more than a quarter of a mile long, and lies between the old or original channel of Eel river and the new channel as thus formed." The court further found that the main body of the water has ever since flowed in the new channel; that the tide ebbs and flows through the old channel; that at high tide there are from 2 to 6 feet of water therein, and a width of 100 to 150 feet; that at low tide the bed of the old channel is dry for a considerable distance between plaintiff's land and the island; that the island is about the level of the lands on either side of the river, and is not covered with water except during freshets; that by reason of the change in the channel plaintiff's lands do not front upon or extend down to the river as thus changed, but since said freshet of 1861-62 are separated from the river by the lands in controversy and by said old channel. The southerly shore of the island is suitable for landing nets, and is valuable for fishing purposes, while the bank on the south side of the present channel is abrupt, and cannot be used for that purpose; and these facts give rise to the present controversy.

An act to regulate salmon fisheries on Eel river in Humboldt county (St. 1859, p. 298) contains the following provisions: "Sec. 2. The owners of land fronting on the above-named river shall have exclusive right and privilege of casting, hauling, and landing seines and nets on their own water front. For the purposes of this act, all bars and the bed of said river lying between the lines of the official survey and extreme low-water mark shall be deemed and held to be the water front of the landowner whose lines border on said river or run nearest thereto. Sec. 3. Where there is a bar or grade suitable for landing seines or nets on one side of the river, and a bold shore and steep, abrupt bank on the other, the owner or owners of the land embracing such bar or grade shall have the exclusive privilege of using the entire width of the river for fishing purposes at such points or places; provided always that such owner or owners shall in no wise impede or interfere with the navigation of said river. Sec. 4. Whenever on both sides of said river there is a bar or grade suitable for landing seines or nets, the owners of the land on each side of said river embracing such bars or grades shall exercise fishing privileges and rights to the center of the river at low-water mark."

Plaintiff contends that there are no private lands between his land which reaches high-water mark on the north side of the river and low-water mark on the south side of the island, and that, therefore, under the provisions of the statute above quoted, he has the exclusive right of the fishery on the south shore of the island; while defendants claim that, by the change of the channel of the river, the southern shore of the island is within the lines of the original survey of their lots, and covered by their patents; that thereby plaintiff is excluded; and that they have the exclusive right. The island is not used by either party for any other purpose. If defendants have title under their patents, their right is clear. If they have not, plaintiff's right is clear, unless he is barred by adverse possession. We think defendants' patents only conveyed to them the lands lying south of the present channel, and did not convey any part of the island. These lands were surveyed under the act of April 28, 1855, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the swamp and overflowed lands belonging to this state," (St. 1855, p. 189.) By the eighteenth section the provisions of the act were limited to the swamp lands granted to the state by the act of congress of September 28, 1850, and under that act lands owned by the state by virtue of its sovereignty, including the beds and shores of navigable streams below high-water mark, could not be sold or conveyed. The patents describe the lands conveyed as swamp land granted to the state by said act of congress, and describe defendants' lands (lots 36 and 42) as bounded by the left or southern bank of the river. The fact that the surveys start at a point on a section or quarter-section line back from the river, and give the courses and distances of all the lines, including the meander lines, along navigable sloughs and the bank of the river, does not control the call for the south bank of the stream. Such survey was necessary in order to ascertain the number of acres contained in each lot. Though both these surveys were made, and the patent to lot 36 was issued, before the adoption of the Code, the law in relation to boundaries upon navigable streams was the same as it now is. "A conveyance by the state of lands bounding upon the sea, or upon a bay or navigable stream, would extend to high-water mark." People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 357; Civil Code, § 830; Packer v. Bird,

71 Cal. 134, 11 Pac. Rep. 873. If defendants' contention can be sustained, it would seem to follow that under their patents they have not only acquired title to the bed of the river, but to the water which covers it. People v. Canal Appraisers, 33 N. Y. 464. The courses and distances of the survey undoubtedly include a section of the river lying between the side lines of the survey, and these courses and distances must be resorted to if any part of the island is included. But not only does the call for a navigable river as a boundary control the calls by courses and distances, but the state could not convey under the act for the sale of swamp lands any land lying below ordinary high-water mark on a navigable stream, nor can the state, under any act that the legislature could enact, convey an absolute and unqualified title to the shore or bed of a navigable stream. Such lands are held by the state in trust for the whole people, and cannot be conveyed for any purpose not consistent with and in furtherance of the purposes of the trust. Grants may be made for the erection of wharves, docks, etc., in aid of the use of the water for purposes of navigation and commerce, "but the state cannot abdicate its trust over property in which the whole people are interested." Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 453, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110. If the state can vest absolute and unqualified title and ownership of any portion of such lands and waters in a private person, there can be no limit to such disposals until all such lands have been converted into private property, and the trust for the benefit of the public has been utterly destroyed. For these reasons, if no other, respondents' contention that the curative act of March 27, 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 587,) "vests in the respondents the legal title to the land embraced within their patents," cannot be sustained, if by the language just quoted counsel mean, as they evidently do, the lands embraced within the courses and distances there given. The patents conveyed to high-water mark on the southerly bank of the river as it existed at the date of the patent, or as thereafter changed by washing or cutting away by the action of the water, or by accretions added by the same agency. By apt words in the patents, they might have been made to include a portion of the island above high-water mark, but those words were not used, and we cannot supply them. What would have been the effect of the change in the channel of the river caused by the freshet of 1861-62 if the title had vested in the defendants prior to such change it is not necessary to determine. These surveys were made April 20, 1858. On April 21, 1858, the act of 1855 was repealed, reserving rights accrued thereunder. The act of 1858 made the certificate of purchase issued by the register prima facie evidence of title. The certificates of purchase of lots 36 and 42 were issued, as shown by the patents, January 26, 1871, and April 28, 1880, respectively, and the patents were issued shortly thereafter; and section 7 of the act of 1858 expressly provided "that neither the patent provided for in this section, nor the certificate provided for in the 6th section of this act, shall have any other legal effect or force than as a quitclaim of all right, title, and interest on the part of the state;" but this quitclaim can only operate to transfer title to that which passes by the controlling calls of those instruments. We do not understand the fourth finding to state that a new channel was cut through lots 36 and 42, leaving a part of those lots intact upon the north side of the new channel, but that the channel was changed by cutting away the south bank until it reached its present location; and that part of the finding which states that a portion of these lots was left upon the north bank only means that a portion of the deposit forming the island is within the lines of the survey. If this finding is not to be so understood, it is not justified by the evidence. The island thus formed belongs to the state. Civil Code, § 1016.¹ We conclude, therefore, that plaintiff's southerly line is high-water mark on the north side of the river, which includes the old channel, and defendants' northerly line is high-water mark on the south side of the river; that the island is the property of the state; and that, as the old channel is above low-water mark, the low-water line is on the south side of the island in front of plaintiff's land, while the high-water line on the north side of the old channel is the south line of plaintiff's land, which brings him within the provisions of section 2 of the act regulating fisheries on Eel river. Nor does the plaintiff attack defendants' patents collaterally, as contended by counsel for respondents, nor attack them at all. They are conceded to be valid, and to vest in defendants title to all the land described within their controlling calls. The attack is only upon the construction sought to be placed upon them, viz. that they vested title in the defendants to a portion of the island.

The only remaining question is as to adverse possession. Upon this defense the court found that the defendants had severally occupied and used the south shore of the island for fishing purposes exclusively, openly, and under a claim of title, for more than five years next before the commencement of the action, and that the plaintiff had not been seised or possessed of any right thereon or attached thereto within five years, or at all. Having concluded that defendants owned no part of the island, we think it must follow that they could acquire no right to the fishery by adverse possession under the facts of that possession as found by the court. The second section of the act of 1859, regulating fisheries on Eel river, grants the exclusive right to the owner of land fronting on the river. It is a right which attaches to the ownership of land as an appurtenance which passes with a conveyance of the land. If defendants had acquired title to plaintiff's land on the north side of the river by adverse possession, they would at the same time and by such acquisition of the land have also acquired the fishery, whether they had used the fishery during the period of adverse possession of the land or not. Navigable streams and the shores to ordinary high-water mark, as we have seen, are held by the state in trust for the public; but qualified rights therein may be granted so far as they are not inconsistent with, or are in aid of, the principal use, viz. for the purposes of navigation. In the absence of the act of 1859, regulating fisheries on Eel river, the right to use the shores between high and low water mark for fishing purposes was common to the people of the state. Aside from that act, there was no statute under which the officers of the state could grant an exclusive right to a fishery of this character; and a title by prescription to the fishing privilege must therefore include the land of plaintiff, as the ownership of the land and the fishing privilege are inseparable. Not only so, but the fifth section of the act declares that any person who shall cast, haul, or draw any seine or net, not having the right so to do, shall be deemed and held to be a trespasser against the person whose rights are by the act fixed and determined, but may, in addition to any civil action had thereon, be convicted of a misdemeanor for every such offense, and be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both. We know of no authority which holds that the violation of a penal statute, no matter how long continued, can confer a legal right or title.

The court further found that the defendants claimed and exercised their rights and interests severally and separately, each to a distinct part of the shore. The question of misjoinder of parties defendant was presented by demurrer and answer. The joinder of the several defendants was proper. They severally claimed rights affecting plaintiff's right appurtenant to his land, and their claim, though under different patents, was from the same source, and the injury to the plaintiff, as well as their defense to the action, depended as to each upon the same facts. Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 372; Fisher v. Hepburn, 48 N. Y. 41-55.

The finding that defendants are the owners of the south part of the island is not justified by the evidence, and is inconsistent with other and controlling facts found by the court, as is also the finding as to adverse possession. The judgment appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

¹Civil Code, § 1016, provides as follows: "Islands and accumulations of land, formed in the beds of streams which are navigable, belong to the state, if there is no title or prescription to the contrary."

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is reversed.

HARPER v. HILDRETH et al. (No. 18,079.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1893.)

APPEAL—NOTICE—NEW TRIAL OF MOTION.

1. An action to dissolve a partnership between plaintiff and defendant H., and to declare certain land claimed by H. to be partnership property, was, on the motion of the other defendants, dismissed, as to the land, and plaintiff's motion to file an amended complaint was denied. Afterwards plaintiff's motion to vacate such rulings was denied, and plaintiff appealed. Held, that defendant was within Code Civil Proc. § 940, requiring notice of appeal to be served on the "adverse party," since his rights would be affected by a reversal, and, notice not having been served on him, the appellate court did not acquire jurisdiction of any of the defendants.

2. No appeal lies from an order denying a motion to vacate an order which is not itself appealable.

3. A "new trial" is defined by Code Civil Proc. § 656, as "a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after trial and decision." Section 590 defines an "issue of fact" as one arising on the pleadings. Held, that a motion which does not ask for a decision on an issue of fact arising on the pleadings is not the subject of a new trial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Harper against Thomas Hildreth and others to dissolve a partnership, and for other relief. There was a judgment in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Motion to dismiss. Dismissed.

Henry E. Highton, Milton E. Babb, Fox & Kellogg, and R. S. Gray, for appellant. Walker C. Graves and A. L. Rhodes, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action in 1884, against Thomas Hildreth, for the purpose of dissolving a partnership between them, and to procure the sale of certain lands described in the complaint, and alleged to be a part of the partnership assets. The other defendants were made parties to the action by reason of their claim to some interest in the lands. In 1891 the defendants, other than Hildreth, moved the court to dismiss the action as against them, and as against the lands described in the complaint; and when this motion came on for hearing the defendant Hildreth moved the court for its dismissal, and the two motions were heard together. The court denied Hildreth's motion, and granted the motion of the other defendants, and ordered that the action be dismissed as against the said defendants and also as against and in regard to the lands described in the complaint, and at the same time denied the motion of plaintiff to file an amended and supplemental complaint, as against the said defendants, and to introduce certain additional evidence. Judgment was entered in accordance with this order on the 28th day of December, 1891, and on the 15th day of February, 1892, the plaintiff gave notice of his appeal therefrom. January 14, 1892, the plaintiff gave notice of his intention to move for an order vacating and setting aside the foregoing decision of the court, dismissing the action, and also to vacate and set aside the decision of the court denying his motions for leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint, and to introduce certain evidence, at the hearing of the motion to dismiss the cause, and to grant a new trial thereof. May 16, 1892, the court made an order denying these motions, and on the same day the plaintiff gave notice of an appeal from this order denying his motion to vacate the decision dismissing the action, and to vacate the decision denying his motions, and his motion "for a new trial of said cause upon and as to each of said motions." These notices of appeal were each directed to and served upon the attorneys for the defendants, who had made the motion to dismiss the cause, but were neither directed to nor served upon the defendant Hildreth, or his attorney. The respondents now move the court to dismiss the appeals from the orders upon the ground that the said orders are not appealable, and also to dismiss the appeal from the judgment upon the ground that, as the notice of appeal was not served upon the defendant Hildreth, this court has no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

1. This court has jurisdiction to entertain an appeal only upon a compliance by the appellant with the procedure prescribed by the legislature for taking the appeal. Section 940, Code Civil Proc., requires that the notice of appeal shall be served on the "adverse party." Unless such service is made this court has no jurisdiction over him, and any order or judgment it might make with reference to the judgment appealed from would be ex parte, and could not affect his rights, or be binding upon him. The "adverse party" referred to in this section is defined in Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 640, to be "every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal is adverse to or will be affected by the reversal or modification of the judgment or order from which the appeal has been taken." In Williams v. Association, 66 Cal. 195, 5 Pac. Rep. 85, it was said: "This court has not jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a judgment unless the appellant shall have served the notice of appeal on all the adverse parties; that is to say, upon all whose rights may be affected by a reversal of the judgment, or, where the appeal is from part of the judgment, by a reversal of the part appealed from." It was held in that case that, when the appeal is from the whole judgment, notice need not be served upon all the parties to the action, if the modification sought can be effected without affecting the rights of those not served. In Re Castle Dome Mining &

Smelting Co., 70 Cal. 246, 21 Pac. Rep. 746, the corporation had suffered default, and although it appeared that it would not be affected in any practical manner, however the appeal might be determined, yet it was held to be an "adverse party," inasmuch as the judgment dismissing the action was practically a judgment in its favor, and could not be reversed without depriving it of an apparent advantage, and the appeal was dismissed for the reason that no notice thereof had been served upon it. In Millikin v. Houghton, 75 Cal. 540, 17 Pac. Rep. 641, an execution running against several parties was quashed upon the motion of a part of the defendants. The plaintiff appealed from the order, serving his notice only upon those who had made the motion, but it was held that the codefendants who had not joined in the motion were "adverse parties," as the reversal of the judgment would revive the execution against them. The present action was brought for the purpose of dissolving the partnership between the plaintiff and Hildreth, and determining their respective rights in the Hildreth rancho. The ownership of this land is the chief issue presented by the pleadings between the plaintiff and Hildreth, and the plaintiff seeks its sale, and a division of the proceeds, under the judgment of the court. Hildreth admits the existence of the partnership, but denies that the land forms any portion of its assets, or that the plaintiff has any interest therein. The plaintiff and Hildreth are thus adverse to each other upon one of the main issues in the case. The judgment of the court, dismissing the land from the action, has taken this issue out of the case, and left Hildreth free to make such disposition of the land as he may choose, and to render such disposition free from the effect of any judgment or order that may hereafter be made in the action. The court has thereby lost its jurisdiction over the land, for the purposes of this action, as fully as if it had never been brought under its jurisdiction. The reversal of this judgment would have the effect to revive the issue of ownership in the land between the plaintiff and Hildreth, and to restore the land to the control of the court in the action, and deprive Hildreth of the free and unrestrained power of alienation which followed the judgment of dismissal. Thus it is clearly for the interest of Hildreth that the judgment dismissing the land from the action should stand, and he is directly interested in any question involving the right of the superior court to determine its ownership, as between him and the plaintiff, and it is very evident that this court cannot render a judgment that will have this effect unless Hildreth is before it. Whether a party to the action is "adverse" to the appellant must be determined by their relative position on the record, and the averments in their pleadings, rather than from the manner in which they may manifest their wishes at the trial, or from any presumption to be drawn from their relation to each other, or to the subject-matter of the action, in matters outside of the action. It would hardly be contended that the strength or relevancy of the argument of a party at the hearing in the court below could be conclusive for the purpose of determining whether he was in reality adverse, or in accord with the matter argued. If his position on the record makes him nominally adverse, he must be so considered for the purpose of an appeal from the judgment thereon. The fact that Hildreth made a motion to dismiss the motion of the other defendants did not take away the adverse character which he holds to the plaintiff, and his failure to object to the action of the court in denying that motion, as well as his failure to appeal from the judgment dismissing the lands from the action, indicates that he is satisfied with the action of the court, and does not wish to have its judgment disturbed.

2. Section 963, Code Civil Proc., enumerates the orders from which an appeal can be taken, and when an appeal can be taken from an order a subsequent order denying a motion to vacate that order is not appealable. Holmes v. McCleary, 63 Cal. 497; California S. R. Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 65 Cal. 295, 4 Pac. Rep. 13; Reay v. Butler, 69 Cal. 572, 11 Pac. Rep. 463; Tripp v. Railroad Co., 69 Cal. 631, 11 Pac. Rep. 219; Railroad Co. v. McGrath, 74 Cal. 49, 15 Pac. Rep. 360; Larkin v. Larkin, 76 Cal. 323, 18 Pac. Rep. 396; Goyhinech v. Goyhinech, 80 Cal. 409, 22 Pac. Rep. 175. An exception to this rule is made when the original order was irregularly issued. People v. Grant, 45 Cal. 97; San Jose v. Fulton, Id. 319. If the original order was in itself not appealable, a fortiori an order refusing to vacate it is not appealable. Estate of Keane, 56 Cal. 409. As neither of the orders dismissing the action, denying leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint, and denying the motion to introduce certain evidence, is appealable, under the provisions of section 963, it follows that the orders denying the plaintiff's motion to vacate those orders are not appealable.

3. Upon a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order, on the ground that it is not an appealable order, the order itself must be examined; and, if it is an order which was not authorized, it does not become appealable by reason of its purporting to do that which the court was not authorized to do. The provision of section 963, authorizing an appeal from an order denying a new trial, is limited to those cases in which a new trial is authorized; and an appeal from an order denying a new trial in a matter wherein a new trial is not authorized will be dismissed upon the ground that the court below had no jurisdiction to entertain the motion. A "new trial" is defined by section 656, Code Civil Proc., to be "a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court, after a trial and decision;" and this issue of fact is defined by section 590, Id., to be that arising upon the pleadings. There is no authority in the Code for the new trial of a motion, but if, after the decision of the motion, it is desired to present any new facts for the consideration of the court, the proper practice is to ask for leave to renew the motion. If it is desired to review the action of the court upon an appeal, it is sufficient to present the order in connection with a bill of exceptions containing the matter upon which the court based its action. A motion which does not ask for a decision upon an issue of fact that arises upon the pleadings is not the subject of a new trial, and it needs little reflection to see that if every motion which is made in the courts on a trial, or with reference to an action, could be followed by a motion for a new trial of such motion, the case itself would be inextricably involved in the determination of these motions, and the final judgment in the action indefinitely postponed. It follows that inasmuch as the notice of appeal from the judgment was not served upon the defendant Hildreth, and as the orders appealed from are not appealable, the several appeals must be dismissed, and it is so ordered. Remittitur stayed 30 days.

WETZEL v. WEBB. (No. 18,115.)

MORTGAGED CHATTELS—CONVERSION—ACTION BY MORTGAGEE.

In an action by a chattel mortgagee of growing crops, for conversion thereof, the defense being a justification as purchaser thereof, a finding that at the time of giving the mortgage the mortgagor was the owner and in possession of the crop authorized a judgment for plaintiff.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by Alois Wetzel against C. C. Webb for conversion of grain. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Warren & Taylor and T. M. Osmont, for appellant. James Farraher, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Respondent held a chattel mortgage upon a growing crop of grain situate upon the land of one Jones. At a time when said grain was in the stack upon the land, preparatory to threshing, appellant, Webb, took possession of the same, and, on threshing it, converted it to his own use. This action was brought in the nature of conversion, to recover damages in the amount of respondent's lien. Judgment was so awarded, and an appeal from that judgment is now before us.

Cal.Rep. 32-34 P.—42

The demurrer was properly overruled. All the facts constituting the cause of action were set out in the complaint, and that is the proper procedure, as declared by the Code. Appellant justified his acts by setting up title to the growing crop under an oral agreement that it should be his, to be applied to the payment of certain interest due from said Jones to him on the purchase price of the land upon which the crop was grown. The question of the title to the grain is the only matter involved in the litigation, and its determination necessarily points the judgment. Among the matters of fact found by the court is the following: "That at the time of the execution of said note and mortgage to plaintiff by the said James T. Jones, and thereafter, and at the time the advances were so made, as alleged in the complaint, by defendant, and under the terms of said mortgage, the said James T. Jones was the owner of, and in possession of, all said grain crop." This finding has ample support in the evidence, and demands that judgment should go in favor of respondent. It is insisted that certain other findings of fact made by the court are not supported by the evidence. Conceding such contention to be true, the validity of the judgment is not affected, for those findings passed upon collateral matters. Especially is this so in view of the finding that the grain was the property of the mortgagor at the time the mortgage was executed. For the foregoing reasons, let the judgment and order be affirmed.

GUNN v. BANK OF CALIFORNIA. (No. 14,248.)

REAL-ESTATE BROKERS—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—FINDING PURCHASER.

A real-estate broker, having land to sell, made an oral contract with a person able to purchase, whereby the person agreed to purchase, and made a deposit with him as part payment, to be returned if title was defective. The broker, without naming the purchaser, wrote the owner's agent that he had sold the land, specifying the terms, and the agent replied that he approved the sale. The customer objected to the title, and refused to complete the purchase. Held, that the broker was not entitled to his commissions, as having found a purchaser, it being necessary either that he introduce the customer to the owner, or that he take a binding contract from him.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by one Gunn against the Bank of California for real-estate brokerage commissions. Judgment for plaintiff, and new trial denied. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Newlands, Allen & Herrin, for appellant. Rhodes & Barstow, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff is a real-estate broker, and brought this action to recover from the defendant $1,000 for commissions alleged to be due him for obtaining a purchaser of certain real estate owned by defendant. Judgment was rendered in the superior court in favor of the plaintiff for the amount demanded, and from this judgment, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

It appears from the record that the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract by which the plaintiff was authorized "to sell" the property described therein on or before January 20, 1890, for the sum of $41,000, or any less sum which might thereafter be fixed by defendant; and in the event of the property being sold by plaintiff within the time named the defendant promised to pay to him a commission of $1,000 upon any sum which defendant might accept for the same. The court below found that the plaintiff complied with this contract on his part by obtaining within the time fixed in the contract a purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to purchase the property mentioned for the price of $41,000, "and that plaintiff before said 20th day of January, 1890, notified defendant, in writing, that he had found such purchaser, who was ready, willing, and able to purchase said real estate for said purchase price," and that defendant ratified the sale, and furnished and delivered to the purchaser an abstract of title to said real estate. The defendant contends that the finding of the court to the effect that plaintiff found a purchaser who was able, ready, and willing to purchase the property described in plaintiff's contract of employment is not sustained by the evidence, and this is the only matter necessary to be determined by us. There is no conflict in the evidence upon this point, so that the real question which we are called upon to decide is whether what was done by plaintiff amounted to finding a purchaser, within the meaning of the law which entitles a broker to recover his commissions when he has found a purchaser who is able, ready, and willing to enter into a contract of purchase upon the terms authorized by his principal. The facts upon which this question arises are these: On the 19th of December, 1889, one Keating orally agreed with the plaintiff to purchase the property referred to for the sum of $41,000, and paid to the plaintiff $500 on account of such purchase price, taking a receipt therefor, signed by the plaintiff alone, which receipt recited that the purchaser was to have 20 days within which to examine the title to the property, and that the deposit would be returned to him, should the title prove defective. On the same day the plaintiff sent to a Mr. Brown (who seems to have been acting for defendant in the matter) the following letter: "Dear Sir: I beg leave to inform you that I have this day sold the lot and improvements known as 'The Golden Age Flour Mill Property,' * * * for the sum of forty-one thousand dollars, less $1,000 commission, and have given purchaser 20 days to examine title to same. Please send me abstract, and approve sale, and oblige." This letter was returned by Brown with this indorsement: "I herewith approve above sale. The Bank of California. Thomas Brown." It is conceded that Keating was financially able to pay the price he orally agreed to pay for the land, but he signed no contract which bound him to complete the purchase in case the title to the land was perfect, and plaintiff did not introduce him to Brown, or inform him who was the purchaser referred to in the above letter, and Brown did not learn his name until about the time the title was rejected by the attorney of such purchaser. Keating refused to complete the sale "because he was informed and advised by his attorney that the title of defendant to said real estate was defective;" and in this connection the court also found that "at the time of the making of the said contract between the plaintiff and defendant the title of defendant to a certain portion of said real estate was defective, and said defect, up to the time said purchaser refused to complete said purchase, had not been cured or remedied."

It is, of course, well settled that when a broker employed simply to negotiate a sale of real estate has found a purchaser able, ready, and willing to purchase upon the vendor's terms, his right to the agreed commission is complete, and does not depend upon the final acceptance by the purchaser of a conveyance of the property sold. This proposition is very clearly stated in the cases of Middleton v. Findla, 25 Cal. 76; Gonzales v. Broad, 57 Cal. 224; Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 244; Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 311; Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 626, 23 Pac. Rep. 1111,—cited by the plaintiff, and is also declared to be the law in the later case of Smith v. Schiele, 93 Cal. 144, 28 Pac. Rep. 857, in which this court construed a broker's contract similar to that under which the plaintiff claims, saying: "Nor was the payment of commissions contingent upon the consummation of the sale, for all that the brokers were required to do, by the terms of their employment, to entitle them to their commissions, was to produce a bona fide purchaser for the property on the vendor's terms; and such is the well-settled meaning, in this state, of a broker's authority to sell." But the question here is, what is "finding" or "producing" a purchaser, within the meaning of the rule of law declared in this and the other cases cited? Is it sufficient for a broker to merely find a person financially able, and who verbally agrees with him to purchase upon the terms of the vendor, and makes a deposit, but who neither signs a binding agreement to purchase upon such terms, nor is produced before the vendor as a person ready and willing to enter into such a contract? It seems to us very clear that this question must be answered in the negative. The contract of the broker is to negotiate a sale; that is, to procure a valid contract to purchase, which can be enforced by the vendor if his title is perfect, or if he does not procure such contract, to bring the vendor and the proposed purchaser together, that the vendor may secure such a contract, unless he is willing to trust to an oral agreement. In speaking of the ordinary contract of a broker, the court of appeals of the state of New York, in Sibbald v. Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 378, say: "The duty he undertakes, the obligation he assumes, as the condition of his right to demand commissions, is to bring the buyer and seller to an agreement. In this all the authorities substantially concur, although expressing the idea with many differences of phrase and illustration." In Hayden v. Grillo, 35 Mo. App. 647, the court, in a well-considered opinion, say: "This contract on the part of the broker is complete when he delivers or tenders to the owner a valid written contract, containing the terms of the sale agreed on signed by a party able to comply therewith, or to answer in damages if he should fail to perform. This is all the agent can do, and when it is done he is entitled to his commissions. But the necessity of a written contract of sale may be rendered unnecessary if the agent bring the vendor and vendee together, and the latter is able and willing, and offers, to complete the contract, provided the vendor will make the conveyance. In such a case the agent has done all that he can do, and if the vendor, under such circumstances, refused to complete the sale, he nevertheless will be compelled to pay the agent his commissions. * * * The reason of the foregoing rule is very apparent. The object of the vendor is to effect a sale of his property, and, when the real-estate broker produces a contract executed by a solvent purchaser, he is then entitled to pay for his services, whether the trade is finally consummated or not, because, if the vendee refuses to take the property, the vendor holds the contract, which renders the former liable for all damages (including commissions paid by the vendor to the broker) for a failure to comply." So, also, in the case of Yeager v. Kelsey, 49 N. W. Rep. 199, it was held by the supreme court of Minnesota that an agent authorized to sell real estate does not earn his commission by procuring a person to proceed so far as paying a part of the agreed price, but who entered into no obligatory contract of purchase. The finding of the court in the present case, that the title of the defendant to the land plaintiff was employed to sell was defective, and was for this reason rejected by Keating, is not material to the question discussed in this opinion. The defendant was not called upon to litigate that question with the plaintiff in this action. The right of plaintiff to the agreed compensation depends upon the performance of his contract to procure a purchaser, and as he did not do this, and defendant neither waived nor prevented such performance, he has not earned his commission. The case of Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 626, 23 Pac. Rep. 1111, which is cited and relied upon by plaintiff, is not in conflict with the views expressed by us at this time. In that case the judgment really turned upon the fact that the vendor himself prevented a consummation of the sale. He was informed of all that the brokers did in the matter of making the sale, and knew who the purchaser was, and, after being thus fully informed, acquiesced in what they had done, but afterwards became dissatisfied, and exerted himself to and succeeded in preventing the sale. In the case of Smith v. Schiele, 93 Cal. 144, 28 Pac. Rep. 857, the proposed purchaser did not sign a binding contract, but he was produced before the vendor as such purchaser, and the vendor fully informed of what the brokers had done, and such purchaser was accepted by the vendor. In effect, it appeared that the vendor was satisfied with the security afforded by the deposit paid, and trusted to the verbal agreement, and it was properly held in that case that the brokers had earned their commissions. The difference between that case and the one we are now considering is apparent. The plaintiff here did not produce before the defendant any purchaser, nor even inform the defendant of the name of the person with whom he was negotiating. It follows from what has been said that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, upon the facts disclosed by the record before us. Judgment and order reversed.

MARTEN v. PAUL O. BURNS WINE CO.
et al. (No. 15,068.)

CONTRACTS—RESCISSION—ESTOPPEL.

1. Plaintiff cannot rescind a purchase of stock of defendant corporation on the ground that he was induced to take the stock by false and fraudulent representations, where it appears that on the day that he claimed to have discovered the fraud he attended a stockholders' meeting, and voted for an assessment on the stock, and that afterwards, before attempting to rescind, he attended another stockholders' meeting, and voluntarily paid the assessment on the stock.

2. Under Civil Code, § 1691, subd. 2, providing that a party desiring to rescind a contract must return, or offer to return, everything of value received by him under it, a purchaser of corporate stock from the corporation cannot rescind the purchase unless he returns or tenders dividends on the stock received from the corporation.

3. The offer to rescind, in such case, is vitiated by the purchaser's demand for the return to him of the amount of an assessment on the stock voluntarily paid by him after the alleged discovery of the fraud.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by G. A. Marten against the Paul O. Burns Wine Company and others to recover money paid by plaintiff to defendant corporation on the ground that plaintiff was induced to take the stock by false representations. There was a judgment in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Yoell, for appellant. S. F. Leib, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, J. This action was brought to recover $4,000 and interest, paid by plaintiff to the defendant corporation for 5,000 shares of its capital stock. The recovery is sought upon a rescission of the contract of sale, on the ground that plaintiff was induced to make the purchase by the false and fraudulent representations of the defendant as to the profits of its business, and the value of its stock. The stock was purchased in March, 1887, and the alleged discovery of the facts constituting the fraud complained of was made January 20, 1890, and the attempt to rescind was made on April 23, 1890. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals therefrom, and also from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Upon the question of rescission, which is the only one necessary to be determined on this appeal, the court, in its decision, found, in effect, that at the time of the purchase of the stock by plaintiff he had full knowledge of the true value thereof, and of the resources, liabilities, assets, and actual condition of the defendant corporation; that the stock, when purchased by plaintiff, was worth the price paid for it, and that he never discovered any fact or facts constituting fraud by defendants; that after plaintiff purchased his stock he received a dividend of $100 thereon, and on the 20th day of January, 1890, was present at a stockholders' meeting of the defendant corporation, and voted for an assessment of 5 cents per share, or $250, upon his stock, and on March 19, 1890, he voluntarily paid the same. On April 23, 1890, having prior thereto dealt with and claimed said stock as his own, plaintiff demanded of defendant that it pay to him the $4,000 paid by him for the stock, and the $250 paid by him on said assessment, and thereupon offered to return the stock so purchased to defendant, but without deducting, or offering to deduct, or accounting in any way for, the $100 received by him as dividend thereon. Upon these facts, which must be taken as undisputed, as the findings thereof are not attacked by the specifications, it follows that plaintiff was not in a position to rescind. But conceding, as he alleges, that he did not discover the facts constituting the fraud complained of until the 20th day of January, 1890, it appears that on that day he was present at a stockholders' meeting of the defendant, and voted for the levy of an assessment on the capital stock thereof, and that subsequent to that day he attended another meeting of the stockholders, and afterwards, on March 19th following, he paid the assessment so levied without objection. This was, in effect, an affirmation of the contract, which plaintiff will not be permitted to disaffirm, after having, with full knowledge of the fraud, dealt with the subject-matters thereof under circumstances and to an extent that amount to a ratification. It further appears that he did not offer to rescind until April 23, 1890, more than three months after his alleged discovery of the fraud. Subdivision 1 of section 1691 provides that the party rescinding must do so "promptly upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind if he is free from duress, menace, undue influence, or disability, and is aware of his right to rescind." The language of this section, except as to the cases therein enumerated, and in others where a sufficient showing for the delay is made, is mandatory as to promptitude by the defendant upon the discovery of the fraud; and, as the case before us is not embraced within these exceptions, we are of the opinion that plaintiff was too late in making his offer to rescind. But, assuming that he was in time, subdivision 2 of the same section provides "that he must restore to the other party everything of value which he received from him under the contract; or must offer to restore the same upon condition that such party shall do likewise, unless the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so." It appears that plaintiff, in his offer to rescind, did not then, or at any time thereafter, offer to return or account for the $100 dividend received by him from the defendant on his stock. This was fatal to the validity of the offer, for the reason that he was bound, upon a rescission of the contract, to restore to the defendant everything of value which he received from it thereunder, so as to place the parties in statu quo, and for him to withhold any part thereof would be "incompatible with rescission," within the meaning of this section. The restoration or offer to restore the dividend received was absolutely indispensable, in order to put the parties in the position they were in before the making of the contract, and anything less than this would not amount to a rescission of the contract in toto, without which plaintiff could not recover in this action.

There is another objection to the offer to rescind which is equally fatal to its validity, and that is plaintiff's demand, as a condition of rescission, that defendant return to him the $250 assessment which he voted for, and afterwards voluntarily paid, with full knowledge of the alleged fraud.

The errors principally relied upon by appellant for a reversal of the judgment relative to the rulings of the court in sustaining defendants' objection to evidence offered by plaintiff of conversations had by him with officers of the corporation, with reference to the value of the stock, prior to its purchase by plaintiff, and of striking out, upon defendants' motion, after its admission against its objection, a newspaper article claimed to be an authorized statement by the defendant corporation of its profits for the year ending in March, 1887, and upon which plaintiff alleges he relied in making the purchase. These rulings, admitting them to be erroneous, are not necessary to be considered, as they are harmless, for the reason that they have no bearing upon the question of rescission, upon which, alone, the judgment and order herein are affirmed. So ordered.

CONNOLLY v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 14,397.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 22, 1893.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENTS —CONTRACT PAYABLE BY ASSESSMENTS—ABANDONMENT—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—AGREEMENT TO EXEMPT CITY.

1. Where a contractor for street improvements, who is to be paid by assessments of benefits, abandons the contract before it is completed because the assessments made were illegal, he is not entitled to any warrant or assessment thereunder.

2. Where a contractor is to be paid for street improvements by assessment of benefits, and the supreme court decides that no legal assessment can be made under the act authorizing the same and the improvements, the personal liability of the city, if any, becomes fixed, and the statute of limitations begins to run not later than the date of such decision, and an action against the city to recover therefor, commenced more than nine years after such decision, is barred.

3. Where a contractor for street improvements is to be paid by assessment of benefits, and he agrees to exempt the city from any liability under his contract, he cannot recover of such city for the improvements, because no legal assessment can be made to pay him therefor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. Shafter, Judge.

Action by Peter Connolly against the city and county of San Francisco to recover money alleged to be due on certain contracts for grading streets. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John J. Coffey, for appellant. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On the 8th day of May, 1867, the plaintiff entered into a written contract with George Cofran, superintendent of streets of the city and county of San Francisco, to grade Market street, in that city, from Valencia street to Castro or Seventeenth street. Under the contract the work was to be commenced within 30 days, and completed within 365 days after its date, and the superintendent, "acting in his official capacity," agreed that on its completion "he will duly make and issue an assessment, and attach a warrant thereto, as provided for in the aforesaid acts, (the consolidation act and its amendments,) for the expenses of the work," at a price named per cubic yard. The terms of the contract were further stated as follows: "And it is agreed and expressly understood by the parties to this agreement that in no case, except where it is otherwise provided in the acts aforementioned and referred to, will the said city and county of San Francisco be liable for any portion of the expense of the work aforesaid, nor for any delinquency of the persons or property assessed." The plaintiff commenced work and expended a considerable sum of money pursuant to the terms of his contract, but, before the time for its completion had arrived, he discovered that a portion of the line of the street to be graded was the private property of individuals, who refused to recognize the validity of his contract, or to be bound thereby; and thereupon he petitioned the board of supervisors to take such action as would save him harmless. Five extensions of the time to complete the contract were thereafter granted, aggregating 1,065 days, and extending down to April 18, 1871, but he did not in fact complete the work until November, 1871, about seven months after the expiration of the time extended, and after the contract had become extinguished by his failure. On April 2, 1870, an act was passed by the legislature entitled "An act to authorize the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to open and grade Market street, in said city, from the intersection of said street with Valencia street to its intersection with Seventeenth street, and to condemn private property for the roadway of said street." St. 1869-70, p. 626. By this act the board was "authorized and required to cause Market street, * * * from its intersection with Valencia street to its intersection with Seventeenth street, to be opened and graded; * * * and wherever the line of said Market street, as now projected upon the official map of said city, between said points of intersection, crosses or passes over land the private property of any person, and which has not heretofore been dedicated to the public as a part of said street, and any portion of such land is necessary to be included within the limits of such street, it shall be the duty of said board of supervisors to proceed as herein directed for the condemnation of said land so included within the limits of such street." The act provides that the board shall, within 20 days after its passage, cause a petition to be filed in the county court of the city, describing the property necessary to be condemned, and stating the names of the owners. Notice to such owners and a hearing are then provided for, and if, upon such hearing, the court is satisfied that the lands are necessary or proper for the opening of said street, it is to appoint commissioners to ascertain and assess the compensation to be paid for the land condemned, such payment to be made out of the first moneys received under the special assessment provided for by the act; and that, immediately upon the filing of the petition for condemnation, the city and county "shall and may, by its agents, employes, or contractors, enter into and upon" the land, "and proceed to grade and open the same as a public street, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as they might or could do after the confirmation of said commissioners' report, and the actual payment of the compensation therein provided for;" and that "it shall be the duty of the board, * * * within thirty days after the passage of this act, to cause notice of the proposed work to be published, * * * inviting sealed proposals for the work of grading Market street, * * * and the duty of the superintendent of public streets and highways * * * to enter into a contract with the person to whom the contract shall have been awarded." The act defines the district deemed to be benefited by the work, and makes it the duty of the board of supervisors, after the completion of the work, to appoint commissioners to assess such benefits, and also makes it the duty of the said commissioners to determine the value of the work done upon Market street by the plaintiff under the contract of May 8, 1867, and to add thereto the expenses incurred by plaintiff in building railroad tracks, cars, and other appliances that he may have deemed necessary in the performance of his work, and to allow him interest on the whole amount found due at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per month from the 8th day of May, 1868, until the filing of the report of the commissioners. The said commissioners were also required to "assess the actual amount due for the work of opening and grading authorized and directed to be done," together with the amounts awarded as compensation for land appropriated and the costs of the proceedings upon the several lots benefited within the district defined, in proportion to the benefit deemed to have accrued to each lot. The act also, in section 22, provides that the tax collector shall, at the end of every 10 days after the receipt by him of said assessment roll, "pay over to the treasurer of said city and county the amount of money collected by him within the preceding ten days upon said assessment; and, as soon as a sufficient sum has been received by said treasurer, he shall pay to the said Connolly the amount of money which may be awarded to him by the commissioners' report as aforesaid;" and, after paying the other charges as provided for, the said treasurer shall pay over to the superintendent of streets the residue, "and the said superintendent shall immediately pay the same in like gold coin to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, as hereinbefore directed, until the full amount due for said work, as per contract hereinbefore authorized, is paid and discharged."

In November, 1870, proposals for the work to be done under this act of the legislature were advertised for, and upon a bid of plaintiff therefor the contract was awarded to him; and on November 22, 1870, a contract was entered into between plaintiff and M. C. Smith, superintendent of streets. It is recited therein that Connolly has been awarded the contract for the work, under and pursuant to the act of the legislature of April 2, 1870, above referred to; and Connolly agrees with Smith, "as such superintendent, acting under and in pursuance of said act of the legislature, and in conformity therewith, that he will do and perform" the work specified within nine months from the date of the contract, "as provided and conditioned in section 13 of said act." Then follows a provision for Connolly's payment as follows: "And it is agreed and expressly understood by the parties to this agreement that payments for the said work shall be made as provided in section 22 of the said act hereinbefore referred to, and that the said superintendent of the said city and county of San Francisco shall not be otherwise made liable therefor than is provided in and by said act." Pursuant to this contract the plaintiff commenced, and on November 22, 1871, completed, the work to be done thereunder, and the same was accepted by the superintendent of streets. As required by the act, a petition was filed, and proceedings had in the county court, and the said court determined that the lands described in the petition were necessary for the opening of the street, and appointed commissioners, as directed, to ascertain and assess the compensation to be paid to the owners thereof. Subsequently these commissioners made their report as to the ownership and compensation to be paid for said lands. In due course, also, the three commissioners to assess the benefits and to determine the amount to be awarded to the plaintiff under his first contract, and the amount due for his work under his second contract, as required by the act, were appointed and organized as a board. To these commissioners the plaintiff presented his claims under both contracts, and the same were allowed for certain specified sums. The report of the commissioners to the county court was by that court set aside on March 6, 1873, and it was "ordered that no further proceedings be had in the premises, on the ground that no valid assessment could be made under the act." From this order an appeal was taken to this court, where the order was affirmed in January, 1875. In re Market St., 49 Cal. 546. On March 17, 1884, plaintiff presented to the board of supervisors of defendant his claim for the amounts alleged to be due him under his said contracts, and demanded in writing payment thereof, but the board rejected the claim, and refused to pay the same, or any part thereof. Thereafter, on April 3, 1884, plaintiff commenced this action to recover the amount so claimed to be due, with interest.

The defendant by its answer denied most of the averments of the complaint, and alleged that the causes of action set forth therein were barred by the provisions of sections 337, 338, (subd. 1,) 339, (subd. 1,) and 343, Code Civil Proc., and also by the provisions of section 90 of the consolidation act.

The case was tried by the court without a jury, and, among other things, the court found that the action was barred by the provisions of each of the sections of the Code pleaded, and also by the provisions of the section of the consolidation act pleaded; the findings upon these issues being numbered 12-16. Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, from which judgment, and an order denying a new trial, he has appealed.

The only specifications of the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to justify the findings above referred to are as follows: "The defendant having failed to give to the plaintiff the warrant and assessment agreed upon in the first contract, and having failed to pay, or cause to be paid, the sum for the second contract, in this findings 12-15 are not supported by the evidence. There being no evidence, either on the part of the plaintiff or the defendant, that the claim sued upon in this action was one of the class mentioned in section 90 of the consolidation act, finding 16 is not supported by the evidence." Under these specifications the findings and judgment cannot be disturbed. The first contract was never completed by the plaintiff, and he therefore never became entitled to any warrant and assessment thereunder. Mahoney v. Braverman, 54 Cal. 570; Fanning v. Schammel, 68 Cal. 428, 9 Pac. Rep. 427; Raisch v. City of San Francisco, 80 Cal. 1, 22 Pac. Rep. 22. The amounts awarded the plaintiff by the commissioners, and due him under the second contract, were to be paid as provided in the act of April 2, 1870. Those amounts became due and payable when the work was completed and accepted by the superintendent of streets in November, 1871, and, if any personal liability on the part of the defendant to pay them thereafter arose, because no valid assessment for their payment was or could be issued, that liability became fixed and certain as early at least as January, 1875, when the decision of this court in the case of In re Market St., supra, was rendered. The statute of limitations then, if not before, began to run, and the causes of action were barred long before the complaint was filed in 1884.

There is another ground, also, on which the decision of the court below might have been safely rested. By the terms of each of the contracts the plaintiff expressly agreed to the exemption of the defendant from any liability thereunder, and thereby, as against the defendant, waived all legal claims to the money now sought to be recovered. These agreements were made and still are binding on the plaintiff, and he cannot now escape their consequences. Conlin v. Board, (decided July 21, 1893,) 33 Pac. Rep. 753.

In view of what has been said, it is not necessary to consider the other points discussed by counsel. The judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. GLEASON. (No. 21,005.)

INCEST—CONSENT—NEW TRIAL.

Where, on a trial for "attempt" to commit incest, the evidence, without any conflict, showed that defendant, both by solicitation and overt acts, attempted to have carnal connection with his daughter; that the attempt proceeded to the extent of contact of sexual organs, lacking only penetration to complete the act; and that it was without the daughter's consent, and against her will and active resistance,—an order granting a new trial on the ground that the crime charged could not have been committed without the consent of the daughter will be reversed on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

John Gleason was convicted of an attempt to commit incest. From an order granting him a new trial, the people appeal. Reversed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People. Carroll Cook, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendant was accused and found guilty of the crime of "an attempt to commit incest" with his daughter, aged 14 years and 7 months. On motion of defendant, the court below granted him a new trial, and this appeal is by the people, from an order granting a new trial. The evidence, without any conflict, shows that the defendant, both by solicitation and overt acts, attempted to have carnal connection with his daughter; that the attempt proceeded to the extent of contact of sexual organs, lacking only penetration to consummate the act; and that it was without her consent, and against her will and active resistance. It appears that the new trial was granted on the ground that the crime charged could not have been committed without the consent of the daughter, and the record shows no other ground upon which the order can be sustained. Conceding that the consent of both parties to the carnal intercourse is necessary to constitute the crime of incest, it does not follow, as contended by counsel for respondent, that a man may not be guilty of the crime of attempting to commit incest without the consent of the woman with whom he attempts to commit the latter crime. His intent to commit the crime of incest, and his concurrent, overt acts in the use of means adapted to the immediate perpetration and consummation thereof, are sufficient to constitute a criminal attempt to commit the crime of incest, and the failure of such means to effect the purpose intended will not exculpate him. There may be found some conflict of the authorities as to whether mere solicitation to commit incest, adultery, or sodomy is an adequate overt act in the composition of a criminal attempt to commit either of those crimes; but, that such overt acts as were proved in this case are sufficient, there seems to have been no question. This conclusion, I think, is warranted by the text and the authorities cited in chapter 51, Bish. Crim. Law, (8th Ed.) §§ 723-772, especially sections 767 and 768. I think the order should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to proceed to judgment on the verdict of the jury.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to proceed to judgment on the verdict of the jury.

Ex parte GOULD. (No. 21,008.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 23, 1893.)
CONTEMPT—POWER TO COMPEL ACCUSED TO TESTIFY.

A proceeding to punish a person for contempt in violating an injunction is criminal in character, and the court has no authority to compel him to be sworn as a witness therein, under Const. art. 1, § 13, which declares that no person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself.

In bank.

Application by James C. Gould for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted, and applicant discharged from custody.

C. W. Cross and Judge Van Fleet, for petitioner. R. T. Devlin and W. T. Phipps, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. In an action pending in the superior court in and for the county of Yuba, wherein the county of Sacramento is plaintiff, and the petitioner one of the defendants, a writ of injunction was served upon the defendant, requiring him to refrain from doing certain acts therein specified. While this writ was in full force the petitioner was charged before said court with having violated its terms, and was ordered to show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt therefor. Upon the hearing of this charge the court required the petitioner to be sworn as a witness, to which he objected upon the ground that he could not be compelled to be a witness against himself in the proceedings, for the reason that they were of a criminal nature. The court, however, overruled his objection, and required him to be sworn as a witness; and he, acting under the advice of his counsel, still declining and refusing to be sworn, for the aforesaid reason, the court adjudged him guilty of contempt, and committed him to the county jail, there to remain until he should purge himself of said contempt by consenting to be sworn as a witness in said case, and to testify therein.

Article 1, § 13, of the constitution of this state, declares that "no person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself." Section 1323 of the Penal Code provides that "a defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself." Contempt of court is a public offense, and by section 166 of the Penal Code is expressly declared to constitute a misdemeanor, and the refusal of a witness to be sworn is an offense committed in the presence of the court. It is none the less a criminal offense that the statute authorizes it to be punished by indictment or information, as well as by the summary proceedings provided in sections 1209-1222 of the Code of Civil Procedure. By these provisions, the procedure for the investigation of the charge is analogous to the criminal procedure, and the judgment against the person guilty of the offense is visited with fine or imprisonment, or both,—the essential elements of a judgment for a criminal offense. "Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense. It is punished sometimes by indictment and sometimes in a summary proceeding, as it was in this case. In either mode of trial the adjudication against an offender is a conviction, and the commitment in consequence is execution." Passmore Williamson's Case, 26 Pa. St. 19. "Although the alleged misconduct of the defendants occurred in the progress of a civil action, the proceeding to punish them for such misconduct is no part of the process in the civil action, but is in the nature of a criminal prosecution. Its purpose is not to indemnify the plaintiff for any damages he may have sustained by reason of such misconduct, but to vindicate the dignity and authority of the court. It is a special proceeding, criminal in character, in which the state is the real plaintiff or prosecutor." Haight v. Lucia, 36 Wis. 360. In Ex parte Hollis, 59 Cal. 408, it was said: "To adjudge a party guilty of contempt of court, for which he is fined and imprisoned, is to adjudge him guilty of a specific criminal offense. The imposition of the fine is a judgment in a criminal case." See, also, Ex parte Kear- ney, 7 Wheat. 38; Ex parte Crittenden, 62 Cal. 534; New Orleans v. Steamship Co., 20 Wall. 387; In re Mullee, 7 Blatchf. 23; Rap. Contempts, § 21. In Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524, Justice Bradley has given an exhaustive and interesting historical discussion of the power of a court to compel a defendant in a criminal proceeding to give testimony against himself. In that case an information was filed against certain property for its confiscation under the revenue laws of the United States, and the claimants, having been directed by the court to produce in evidence certain invoices, for the purpose of establishing the claim of the government, objected thereto on the ground that the statute under which the order was made was in violation of the fourth and fifth amendments to the constitution. It was held that, although the proceeding was in rem, and in the nature of a civil proceeding, yet an action for the forfeiture of property for the violation of law is, in effect, a criminal proceeding, and that the owner of the goods, after making his claim, is entitled to all the privileges which appertain to a person who is prosecuted for a forfeiture of his property by reason of committing a criminal offense, and cannot be compelled to furnish evidence against himself. Personal liberty is, however, more sacred than mere rights of property, and the reasons for protecting the owner of property against being compelled to give evidence against himself in a proceeding for its forfeiture are in the same degree more cogent when his personal liberty is at stake. It was said by Justice Bradley in the case last cited: "Constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy, and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon. Their motto should be, 'obsta principiis.'" We hold, therefore, that the court was not authorized to direct the petitioner to be sworn as a witness in the proceeding, and that its order adjudging him guilty of contempt for his refusal, and punishing him therefor, was without authority, and that the petitioner should be discharged, and it is so ordered.

HILDRETH v. WILLIAMS. (No. 19,125.)

PROMISSORY NOTE—ATTORNEY'S FEE—PLEDGE.

1. St. 1873-74, p. 707, providing that "in all cases of foreclosure of mortgage the attorney's fee shall be fixed by the court, * * * any stipulation in said mortgage to the contrary notwithstanding," relates only to mortgage foreclosures, and does not apply to an action to enforce a pledge.

2. Where a stipulation in a note for an attorney's fee in case the note is sued on does not fix the amount of such fee, a reasonable sum therefor will be allowed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Hugh R. Hildreth against Henry A. Williams. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Oscar A. Trippet, for appellant. Conklin & Hughes, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $350, as an attorney's fee in an action in equity to enforce a pledge upon certain stocks given to secure the payment of a promissory note made by defendant to plaintiff for $3,500. The case comes up on the judgment roll. The promissory note was in the usual form, with this addition: "And I further agree that, in the event of suit being brought against me, then there shall be added to any judgment against me, rendered in said suit, as counsel fees, an additional sum of — per centum, in like gold coin, upon the amount of the principal and interest hereof accrued at the time of the entry of such judgment, or if paid before judgment, and after action commenced, then on the amount at the date of payment." The only defense was as to the right of plaintiff to recover the counsel fee claimed in his complaint, and at the trial the amount claimed on the note, less counsel fees, was paid by defendant, and a stipulation filed that such payment should in no wise affect the question of plaintiff's right to recover counsel fees.

The whole right to recover counsel fees, in this state, is founded in statute, or in contract. Sichel v. Carrillo, 42 Cal. 508; Mascarel v. Raffour, 51 Cal. 242. Section 1 of the act of March 27, 1874, (St. 1873-74, p. 707,) provides that: "In all cases of foreclosure of mortgage the attorney's fee shall be fixed by the court in which the proceedings of foreclosure are had, any stipulation in said mortgage to the contrary notwithstanding." In Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 568, 14 Pac. Rep. 514, the court doubted the right of the court to fix an attorney's fee, under this statute, in a case in which the mortgage failed to provide for a fee, and that the statute operated to limit the fee which the court could allow in a case where the parties had agreed upon a sum to an amount not greater than the sum so fixed; in other words, that the court can scale the agreed sum down, but not up. The reason given in that case for confining the action of the court to cases in which the parties have provided for an attorney's fee is that the title of the act is, "An act to abolish attorneys' fees, and other charges in foreclosure suits;" thus evincing an intention to abolish, rather than to provide by law for their recovery. The statute, whatever its construction, only treats of attorneys' fees in actions of foreclosure of mortgages, and has no application to this case, which is an action to enforce the lien created by a pledge of personal property.

The question here must turn upon the contract contained in the promissory note. That contract provides that there shall be added to the judgment, or, if paid before judgment, and after action commenced, to the amount due, as counsel fees, "an additional sum of — per centum." In other words, the agreement is for a counsel fee, but the amount thereof is not provided. The contracting parties doubtless had in view the necessity of counsel in the event of proceedings in court to enforce the obligation of the promissory note, and the maker of the note agreed to pay such counsel, in manner and form as quoted. In contracts for services, where the remuneration is not fixed by agreement, a recovery may be had upon a quantum meruit; that is to say, as much as the services are reasonably worth. If the clients of the learned counsel in this case have employed them herein, and agreed to pay them a counsel fee, without specifying the amount to be paid, it will doubtless occur to them that they are entitled to such sum as their services are reasonably worth. In principle, the case at bar does not differ from the example put. The contingency upon which the liability of defendant depended occurred when, at maturity, the note was not paid, and an action was commenced to enforce its collection. The amount of the counsel fee not having been stipulated, the plaintiff, in his complaint, averred that $500 was a reasonable sum. The court, as was its duty, passed upon the question, and awarded $350 as a proper amount. The evidence is not brought up, and hence we must conclude that it supported the findings upon this issue, and such findings are ample to support the judgment. Rickards v. Hutchinson, 18 Nev. 215, 2 Pac. Rep. 52, and 4 Pac. Rep. 702, was a case almost precisely like the present. The mortgage provided for the allowance of counsel fees "at the rate of — per cent. upon the amount which may be found to be due for principal and interest;" and the court said, "The allowance of counsel fees for the foreclosure was authorized by the terms of the mortgage." Alden v. Pryal, 60 Cal. 215, is another case in point, and the ruling was against the contention of appellant here. It is true these last two cases were upon the foreclosure of mortgages, but the decisions turned, not upon that fact, nor upon any statute, but upon the contract which had been entered into by the mortgagors. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

DAW v. NILES et al. (No. 19,140.)¹

PAROL EVIDENCE—ILLEGALITY OF CONTRACT.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage given by defendant to secure a note for money loaned to him by plaintiff, defendant may show by parol evidence that at the time of executing the note and mortgage it was agreed, as part of the same transaction, that defendant should pay all taxes levied on the money loaned, or on the mortgage, but that the agreement was purposely omitted from the mortgage, in order to evade Const. art. 13, § 5, which provides that imposing such an obligation on a borrower shall avoid the contract, as to any interest specified therein, as such parol evidence tends to "establish illegality" of the contract, within Code Civil Proc. § 1836, prescribing when such evidence is admissible to affect a writing.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by George W. Daw against William Niles and John B. Niles to foreclose a mortgage. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. W. Hutton and Minor & Woodward, for appellants. Albert M. Stephens, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendants to secure their promissory note to plaintiff for $10,000, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, and payable 10 years after date; the interest, if not paid annually, to be compounded. The note further provides that, if the interest is not paid annually, "then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable, at the option of the holder." The note was given for money loaned. The mortgage, of the same date as the note, (July 1, 1887,) contains a copy of the note, and provides that "in case of default in payment of the same, [the note,] or of any installment of the interest thereon, when due, the mortgagee may foreclose this mortgage, and may include in such foreclosure a reasonable counsel fee, to be fixed by the court, together with all payments made by the mortgagee for taxes on said premises, other than the taxes on this mortgage, or the money secured thereby. * * *" The defendants having made default in the payment of interest, the plaintiff exercised his option by electing to consider both principal and interest due, and commenced this action on March 27, 1891. The defendants pleaded as a defense to the action that at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage, and as a part of the same contract and of the same transaction with the making of the note and mortgage, it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and defendants that the defendants "should and would pay and discharge all taxes and assessments which might be assessed or levied upon said money so loaned by plaintiff to defendants, and on said mortgage, or on either said money or mortgage, anything in the said promissory note or mortgage to the contrary notwithstanding, and that said agreement was knowingly made and omitted from said mortgage with intent to evade the provisions of section 5 of article 13 of the constitution of this state." And by reason of this agreement defendants deny that any interest ever became due or payable on the note, and, as a conclusion of law, claim that the action was prematurely commenced. The decree was in favor of the plaintiff, foreclosing the mortgage for the full amount of principal, with compound interest. The defendants appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll, containing a bill of exceptions showing that defendants offered to prove the alleged contemporaneous agreement to pay the taxes and assessments on the mortgage by oral evidence, which was rejected by the court on the ground that such agreement could be proved only by written evidence, and the defendants excepted to this ruling of the court. Counsel for appellants contend that the court erred in rejecting the proffered oral evidence to prove the alleged agreement, and this raises the only question that need be considered.

The only substantial difference between this case and the late case in this court of Burbridge v. Lemmert, 32 Pac. Rep. 310, is that in that case the concurrent agreement to pay the taxes on the mortgage was in writing. In that case it was held that the written agreement was in contravention of section 5 of article 13 of the constitution of this state, and subjected the mortgagee to the penalty denounced by that section, namely, that the note and mortgage, as to any interest specified therein, "shall be null and void," and, consequently, that no interest ever accrued or became due, and the failure of the mortgagor to pay the interest specified in the note or mortgage was not such a default as entitled the mortgagee to treat the principal as due before the expiration of the term of credit expressed in the note, (in this case, 10 years after the date of the note.) I think the court erred in rejecting evidence of that part of the contract which was oral. The "contract," in the sense of section 5, art. 13, of the constitution, existed as an entirety, independently of any writing, though parts of that contract were evidenced by writing. Indeed, writing is no part of any contract, though it is often made evidence of contracts; and, according to some general rules, certain classes of contracts can be proved only by written evidence, but to all these general rules there are exceptions. As an example in point here, section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "When the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties, it is to be considered as containing all those terms, and therefore, there can be, between the parties and their representatives or successors in interest, no evidence of the terms of the agreement, other than the contents of the writing, except in the following cases: '(1) Where a mistake or imperfection of the writing is put in issue by the pleadings. (2) Where the validity of the agreement is the fact in dispute; but this section does not exclude other evidence * * * to establish illegality or fraud.'" In this case the express and only object of proving that part of the contract which is alleged to have been omitted from the writing for the purpose of evading the constitution was to show the illegality, and consequent nullity, of the note and mortgage, "as to any interest specified therein." See, also, Whart. Ev. § 935; Greenl. Ev. § 284; Buffendeau v. Brooks, 28 Cal. 641. The purpose of section 5 of article 13 of the constitution, so far as it goes, is on a line with the object of the usury laws of other states, and therefore the decisions of other states in respect to attempted evasions of usury laws are more or less applicable to this case. Of these, the following seem very aptly in point: Clark v. Badgley, 8 N. J. Law, 233; Stein v. Swensen, 46 Minn. 360, 49 N. W. Rep. 55. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

DUPUY v. MACLEOD, (No. 19,118.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1893.)

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—SIGNATURE OF PARTY TO BE CHARGED.

The fact that a contract for the sale of chattels is reduced to writing does not, under the statute of frauds, render necessary the signature of the party to be charged, where the requirement of a writing was obviated by an immediate delivery of the goods sold.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. N. Clark, Judge.

Action by E. Dupuy against Malcolm Macleod to recover for goods sold and delivered. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Pendleton, for appellant. O'Melveny & Henning, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to recover the sum of $500, the balance due on a sale of a stock of merchandise and store fixtures sold and delivered by the plaintiff to defendant, at Los Angeles, May 31, 1890. The real question in issue is this: Plaintiff avers the sale was made for $1,500, to be paid as follows: $1,000 in cash, the remaining $500 to be paid as follows: When $100 worth of stock was sold, $20 to be deducted by defendant as commissions, and $80 paid to plaintiff, and so on until the $500 was paid. If the stock sold did not amount to sufficient to pay plaintiff $500, after deducting 20 per cent., plaintiff was to receive the 80 per cent. of proceeds in full payment. He avers the sale of sufficient stock to entitle him to full payment under this agreement, and the evidence sustains him in this last assertion. Defendant avers that the agreement was that the $1,000 paid in cash was first to be deducted from the proceeds of sales, before any further payments were made, and then payments were to be made as averred by plaintiff; and he avers that $1,000 had not been realized from sales when the action was brought, and hence that nothing was due. Conceding his theory to be correct, the evidence sustains his position that $1,000 had not been realized from sales. It is admitted on all hands that the sum of $1,000 was paid by defendant to plaintiff at the date of the sale, and that the defendant went into possession of the property at once, and has ever since retained the same. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, this appeal is prosecuted.

The first error assigned by appellant is that the court did not find upon all the issues made by the pleadings, and (1) that it did not find upon the facts set forth by defendant in his second and separate answer. The facts set up in the separate defense were that the agreement was that defendant was first to appropriate from the proceeds of sales the $1,000 cash, as before stated, before any proceeds were to go to plaintiff. The finding was quite full on the point, and fully sustained the allegations of the complaint. It was not necessary for the court, after finding that the agreement was that defendant was to keep an accurate account of all sales, and, when the sales amounted to $100, $80 thereof was to be paid to plaintiff, and $20 retained by defendant, etc., to go on, and find, as a negative proposition, that they did not agree as set out by defendant. It was conceded that an agreement was made. Just what that agreement was, was the point submitted to the court, and the finding specifies it distinctly, and passes upon the question.

It is further objected that the court failed to find upon the fourth allegation of the complaint, which was denied by the answer. The substance of this allegation is that the agreement of sale was reduced to writing, and signed, and that the writing was in the possession of defendant. The agreement had been pleaded, and this allegation was evidently inserted for the purpose of showing, as is often done, that it was out of plaintiff's possession, and as a predicate for an amendment, if it should turn out different from the pleading, and also for the purpose of giving to the defendant notice that it would be relied upon in sustaining plaintiff's cause of action. The important question was, was there a sale, and what were its terms? These questions were fully passed upon, and it was unnecessary to go further. There was a finding upon all the material issues, which is sufficient.

It is next contended that the court erred in admitting in evidence what is termed a "written memorandum of the contract," which is the contract of sale alluded to in the complaint, and is in the following language: "Los Angeles, Cal., May 31, 1890. I have this day sold my entire interest in the seed, feed, produce, commission, and all business of whatever nature, carried on at the store 245 South Main street, Los Angeles, to Malcolm Macleod, on the following terms, viz.: The price to be one thousand cash in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and five hundred dollars to be paid in the following manner: A correct account to be kept of all goods sold, and when sales to the amount of ($100) one hundred dollars are made, after deducting twenty per cent. commission for selling the same, ($80) eighty dollars to be paid over to E. Dupuy or order, and the same to be done until the full amount of five hundred dollars, net, is paid: provided so much can be sold from the stock now on hand, belonging to said Dupuy; but if there is not enough stock on hand to come to the amount of five hundred dollars, net, then the said Dupuy to accept the amount the stock sells for, as full compensation. The stock and fixtures turned over to M. Macleod is now in the store at 245 South Main street, and is entered on an invoice book, May 13, 1890, which book is marked 'A,' with the exceptions of some that has been sold from the same since that time, which is fully understood by said Macleod. Ed. Dupuy. Witness: J. M. Hixson." The instrument was admissible in evidence. There was evidence that it was drawn by J. M. Hixson, who witnessed it at the store where the sale was made, at the request of the defendant, and at the time of the sale and delivery of the goods; that the consideration of $1,000, mentioned therein, was paid at the time; and that the bill of sale was left by Dupuy, the vendor, after signing it, on the desk; and that it remained in the possession of defendant until the trial, when, upon notice to him so to do, he produced it. As evidence to avoid the statute of frauds, it was defective, in not being signed by defendant, Macleod, the party to be charged thereby. The statute of frauds, however, was not pleaded, and, if it had been, the plea would have been of no avail, under section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because there was an immediate delivery of all the goods sold to the purchaser, who thereafter retained possession, and a payment of $1,000, being part of the purchase price, to plaintiff. A writing to satisfy the statute of frauds is one thing. A writing which is admissible in evidence as to some of the facts of a sale is, or may be, quite a different thing. Beyond determining what shall be a sufficient compliance with the statute, the legislature has not attempted to change the principles of the law of evidence relating to written contracts. "Parties entering into any contract may either reduce its terms to writing, or may refer to some other writing, already in existence, as containing the terms of their agreement; and when they do so they are bound by what is written, whether signed by them or not." Benj. Sales, § 201. This, of course, assumes that the parties assent to the contract as written. Had plaintiff made an oral statement to defendant, precisely as contained in the writing, it would have been admissible in evidence. The fact that he made it in writing, and gave it to, or left it with, defendant, does not render it less admissible. There was sufficient evidence of assent on the part of defendant to entitle the instrument to admission in evidence. There was also evidence upon the part of defendant tending to show that he never assented to the agreement, as set out. Not having been signed by him, this was proper; and it remained for the court to pass upon the issue thus raised, which it seems to have done to the exclusion of the defendant's theory. There was a substantial conflict in the evidence, and evidence sufficient to support all the findings of the court, and the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BITUMINOUS LIME ROCK PAVING & IMP. CO. v. FULTON et al. (No. 14,907.)

JUDICIAL NOTICE—EXISTENCE OF CITY—STREET ASSESSMENTS—ENFORCING LIEN.

1. The courts will take judicial notice that the city of Los Angeles is a municipal corporation, by virtue of the several statutes organizing it into such corporation, and extending its limits, and adding to and changing the powers of its officers.

2. An averment that "the city council of the city of Los Angeles * * * passed a resolution of intention * * * that New High street, in said city, * * * be paved," is a sufficient averment that such street is an open public street; St. 1885, p. 147, § 1, providing that "all streets * * * in the municipalities of this state now opened or dedicated, or which may hereafter be opened or dedicated, shall be deemed and held to be open public streets, * * * and the city council of each municipality is hereby * * * invested with jurisdiction to order to be done thereon any of the work mentioned in" the act.

3. Code Civil Proc. § 456, provides that in pleading the determination of a board or officer the facts conferring jurisdiction need not be stated, but such determination may be stated to have been duly given or made. Held that, in an action to enforce the lien of a street-paving assessment, an averment "that all the several acts required to be done by said city council, said superintendent of streets, and this plaintiff have been duly done, made, and performed by it and them, in the manner and at the times and in the form required by law," is sufficient on general demurrer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by the Bituminous Lime Rock Paving & Improvement Company against J. E. Fulton and others to enforce a lien for street assessments. There was a judgment in favor of defendant Henderson, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Jay E. Hunter, for appellant. Jones & Carlton, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. The plaintiff in this cause appeals from a final judgment entered in favor of defendants. The action was instituted in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles to enforce a lien against certain property of the defendants, described in the complaint, which lien was created by an assessment made by the street superintendent of the city of Los Angeles, to obtain payment for certain work done under an act entitled "An act to provide for work upon streets," etc., "within municipalities," approved March 18, 1885, as amended March 14, 1889, and known and designated as the "Vrooman Act." St. 1885, p. 147; St. 1889, p. 157. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, which demurrer was sustained by the court, and, plaintiff declining to amend, final judgment was entered in favor of the defendant Charles Henderson. The demurrer was general, and averred that plaintiff's complaint "fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against these defendants." The particular reasons moving the court below to sustain the demurrer do not appear in the record, and we can only divine them by a perusal of the complaint, aided by the suggestion of causes therefor contained in the briefs of counsel.

It is urged by respondents that the complaint fails to aver that the city of Los Angeles is a municipal corporation, or that New High street is an open public street. The allegation of the complaint is "that * * * the city council of the city of Los Angeles, state and county aforesaid, passed a resolution of intention * * * that New High street, in said city, from the north line of Franklin street to the south line of Temple street, * * * be paved and curbed," etc. The court will take judicial notice that the city of Los Angeles is a municipal corporation under and by virtue of several statutes of this state, duly passed for the purpose of organizing it into such corporation, and extending its limits, adding to and changing the powers of its municipal officers, etc. Code Civil Proc. § 1875.

A street is a "public thoroughfare or highway in a city or village." Black, Law Dict. tit. "Street." A street is something more than a highway, for, besides its use as a highway for travel, it may be used for the accommodation of drains, sewers, aqueducts, water and gas pipes, and for other purposes conducive to the general police, sanitary, and business interests of a city. Bouv. Law Dict. It is a public highway of a city or village, over which all the citizens of the land have a right to pass and repass at pleasure. State v. Moriarty, 74 Ind. 104; Perrin v. Railroad Co., 36 N. Y. 126; Kelsey v. King, 33 How. Pr. 43; City of Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 244. Section 1 of the act of 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147) provides that "all streets * * * in the municipalities of this state now open or dedicated, or which may hereafter be opened or dedicated, shall be deemed and held to be open public streets * * * for the purposes of this act, and the city council of each municipality is hereby * * * invested with jurisdiction to order to be done thereon any of the work mentioned in section two of this act." Section 2 of the act, as amended in 1889, (St. 1889, p. 157,) authorizes the city council to order work done upon the streets, of the character in question in this case. The evident object of the first section of the statute of 1885 was to enlarge the term "street" so as to include, not only those that had been opened, but those also dedicated to street purposes, although not formally or officially accepted or opened as such. The effect was simply to make streets of a class which might not otherwise come within that category. When plaintiff, in its complaint, averred the passage of a resolution to pave and curb New High street, in said city, it was as comprehensive as the definition of the term "street," and was tantamount to an averment that it was an open public street in said city.

The complaint, critically considered, is defective, in this: that many of its statements of facts are not full and explicit, but the demurrer is general. Where a complaint fails to state facts essential to a recovery, the defect may be reached by a general demurrer. Where, however, it states all the essential facts, but states them defectively, the error can only be reached by a special demurrer. Again, several of the apparent defects in regard to publication of notices, etc., are cured by the twelfth paragraph of the complaint, which avers "that all the several acts required to be done by said city council, said superintendent of streets, and this plaintiff have been duly done, made, and performed by it and them, in the manner and at the times and in the form required by law," etc. Section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, in pleading a determination of a board or officer, it is not necessary to state the facts conferring jurisdiction, but such determination may be stated to have been duly given or made, etc. Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 512; City of Los Angeles v. Waldron, 65 Cal. 283, 3 Pac. Rep. 890; Paving Co. v. Bolton, 97 Cal. 8, 31 Pac. Rep. 625. Applying this rule to the jurisdictional facts, so far as the city council and street superintendent are concerned, and the complaint, although far from perfect, was impervious to the general attack made upon it. To mention the several objections of respondent in detail would subserve no useful purpose. The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to defendant to answer.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the court below is directed to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to defendant to answer.

PERKINS v. WEST COAST LUMBER CO.
(No. 19,124.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1893.)

PLEADINGS—FINDINGS AS TO MATTERS NOT IN ISSUE—AMENDMENT ON APPEAL.

1. In an action for services as an attorney between certain dates, a finding of damages for defendant because of negligent advice given defendant at a time prior thereto must be disregarded, such negligence not having been pleaded.

2. Where the value of services sued for is found to be more than alleged in the complaint, the latter cannot be amended on appeal to conform to the findings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by C. J. Perkins against the West Coast Lumber Company for attorneys' fees. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Paris & Fox and Rolfe & Freeman, for appellant. Harris & Gregg, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll. The points presented arise upon the pleadings and the findings of the court. Plaintiff sues for services as an attorney and counselor at law. His complaint states three causes of action. In the first it is alleged that defendant contracted with him June 1, 1888, for his services, agreeing to give him $35 per month as a general retainer, and as compensation for writing letters, adjusting claims, and for advice, and agreed to pay a reasonable compensation for services in prosecuting and defending suits; that he performed the general services until March 1, 1890, which were worth $735, and also performed other services during the same period in prosecuting and defending suits and drafting instruments for defendant worth $3,044.75; that he has been paid on account of such services $1,865.15. The second cause of action is for $116.20, money laid out and expended for defendant. The third count is a quantum meruit to recover for services alleged to have been rendered between June 1, 1888, and April 1, 1890, worth $4,079.75, and admitting a payment on account thereof of $1,865.15. Plaintiff demands judgment for $1,981.35. The answer consists of (1) a general denial; (2) an averment of a contract different from that alleged by plaintiff, with a plea of payment; (3) another statement of the contract between the parties, with a claim of full performance on the part of defendant; and (4) a counterclaim for goods sold plaintiff amounting to $2,867.10, of which $1,574.60 has not been paid. Defendant demands judgment in the sum of $1,574.60. The court finds the contract as it is averred by plaintiff. It also finds the value of the services on the general retainer to be $735, and for the other services $3,228.53, and that plaintiff laid out and expended for defendant the sum of $116.20; total, $4,079.73. It also finds that plaintiff is indebted to defendant for goods sold in the sum of $1,332.28. Plaintiff admits in his complaint payment of the sum of $1,865.15. There is no finding in regard to this matter. The court did find, however, that on the 17th day of April, 1888, which was prior to the employment alleged in the complaint, to which the other findings refer, plaintiff was employed by defendant in regard to its claim against one Newman, and in such employment so negligently advised the defendant in regard to the said demand that defendant lost the sum of $3,408.77, which sum it finds is justly due defendant as damages, and thereupon, as a conclusion of law, finds that defendant is entitled to judgment against the plaintiff in the sum of $661.40, for which, with costs, judgment was entered.

The appellant contends here that the finding in regard to the damages resulting to defendant through the alleged negligence of the plaintiff must be disregarded, because it is not responsive to any issue in the case, and that plaintiff should be permitted to so amend his complaint that it will sustain a judgment for the sum of $2,747.47, which the findings show is due plaintiff, if the finding in regard to the alleged damage be stricken out. The first part of this contention I think must be sustained. There is no allusion to the alleged negligence in any pleading, and there is therefore nothing to support the finding of the damage as a counterclaim. The alleged negligence was not in the performance of any part of the services for which suit is brought, and therefore, if the contention was well founded, did not affect the value of those services. Even if it were conceded that the claim for such damage by defendant is a cross demand, within the meaning of section 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it would still be necessary to plead it under the circumstances of this case. It cannot be considered the debit side of the account sued on. It is an unliquidated demand for damages. But it does not follow that plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the findings for the balance that will then appear to be due. Leave might as well be granted the defendant to amend its pleading to cover the judgment already entered. I think the fairest thing will be to remand the case for a new trial, when the trial court can allow such amendments to be made to the pleadings as will be conducive to justice.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings as they may be advised.

CHARLTON v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO.
(No. 14,921.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1893.)

QUIETING TITLE—POSSESSION.

Mere possession of land within the limits of a grant to a railroad company, which had complied with the terms of the grant, but had not received a patent from the United States, will not enable such person to maintain an action to quiet title against the railroad company, where he does not show that he was qualified to take land under the pre-emption or homestead laws, or that he settled on it with the intention of filing a pre-emption or homestead claim.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action by G. G. Charlton against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to quiet title. There was a judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Conklin & Dunlap, for appellant. Jos. D. Redding and J. D. Bicknell, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff commenced this action on September 30, 1890, to quiet his title as against the defendant to a tract of land in Los Angeles county, described as "fractional section 7, in township 2 north, range 16 west, San Bernardino base and meridian." The complaint alleged "that the plaintiff is now, and for a long time hitherto has been, in the possession of and is the owner (subject only to the paramount title of the United States) of that certain real property situate," etc. The answer denied the plaintiff's possession or ownership of the land described, subject only to the paramount title of the United States, admitted that defendant claimed an interest in and to said property adverse to the plaintiff, and denied that its claim was without right. It then alleged, in substance, that the land in controversy was granted to defendant by act of congress of March 3, 1871; that a map of definite location of the grant, including the land in controversy, and showing the same to be within the 20-mile limit of the grant, was filed by defendant in the office of the commissioner of the general land office on April 3, 1891, and that defendant completed its railroad opposite to the said land in 1876; "that by reason of the aforesaid acts this defendant is the owner of the land in controversy, and is entitled to the patent therefor;" "that the said lands and premises have never been finally and completely surveyed by the proper officers of the United States, so that a patent therefor could issue, but this defendant is informed and believes, and so states the fact to be, that, when the proper returns of the survey of said lands are made, a patent will forthwith issue for the said lands and premises to this defendant." The case was tried without a jury, and the court found: "(1) The plaintiff was not at the time of filing the complaint herein, or for any length of time prior thereto, and is not now, the owner or in possession, subject to the paramount title of the United States, of the land described in the complaint, or any portion thereof. (2) The land described in the complaint is unsurveyed government land, and within the twenty-mile or granted limits of the grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the defendant herein, made by congress of the United States, on March 3, 1871; that said grant was duly located by a map of definite location, which was filed by the defendant in the office of the commissioner of the general land office on April 3, 1871; that said map of definite location included the land in controversy, and showed the same to be within the granted limits of said grant to the defendant herein; that the defendant completed its railroad from a point at or near Tehachapi Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to Fort Yuma, opposite the land in controversy, in the year 1876, and had its road fully equipped and in running order in the said year, and has continued to have its road in such condition ever since." Judgment followed in favor of defendant, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

In support of the appeal it is contended that the findings do not respond to or cover all the issues raised by the pleadings, and that the first finding, if construed to mean that the plaintiff was not in possession of the premises in controversy at the time the action was commenced, is not sustained by the evidence, and hence that the judgment and order should be reversed. The second finding is not assailed on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify it. The only evidence brought up in the record is that of the plaintiff. He testified: "I reside upon fractional section seven," etc. "At the time the complaint in this action was filed, I was in possession of all the premises described therein. I have been in possession of it ever since October, 1889. I am cultivating the land, and raising bees. * * * I know that this land is a part of section seven, for the reason that it has been surveyed, and there is a section corner stake at the southwest part of the land. It is along the border of the San Fernando grant. I believe the survey has been returned, but do not know of my own knowledge. An officer at Washington informed me so." The case then seems to be this: The plaintiff took possession of the land in controversy, and when he had occupied it for less than a year commenced this action to have his title to it quieted. It does not appear that he had the qualifications necessary to enable him to take up any land under the pre-emption or homestead laws, or that he settled upon this land with any intention to ever file a pre-emption or homestead claim on any part of it. He is in no way in privity with the title, but relies only on his naked possession. Prior to the time of the trial the section had probably been surveyed in the field, but the plat of the survey had not been returned, approved, and filed. The defendant has a grant from the government of all the odd-numbered sections, with certain specified exceptions, within the limits of 20 miles on each side of its railroad. The section in controversy is within the 20-mile limit, and not, so far as appears, within any of the exceptions. The grant was one in praesenti, and a complete title to the granted sections vested in the grantee as soon as the line of its road was definitely located, and the sections identified by government survey. Forrester v. Scott, 92 Cal. 398, 28 Pac. Rep. 575; Jatunn v. Smith, 95 Cal. 154, 30 Pac. Rep. 200, and cases cited. The line of the road opposite this land was definitely located in 1871, and the road was fully constructed and put in running order in 1876. Counsel for appellant say in their brief: "Plaintiff, being in possession of the land in controversy, brought this action for the purpose of determining whether the government or defendant was the owner of the fee." The case was evidently tried upon the theory on both sides that the land in controversy was then, or would be when fully surveyed, an odd-numbered section, and we shall therefore so regard it. This being so, it was immaterial for the purposes of the case whether the fee still remained in the government or had passed to the defendant. Unquestionably the defendant had an estate or interest in the land, which was superior and paramount to any right the plaintiff had by reason of his mere possession. The first finding was, in effect, that the plaintiff was not the owner or in possession of the land, subject only to the paramount title of the United States; and this finding was, in our opinion, fully justified. We advise, therefore, that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PENNEY et al. v. SIMMONS. (No. 14,661.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 26, 1893.)

MORTGAGE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—EVIDENCE.

A deed absolute on its face will not be declared a mortgage, unless the evidence that it was so intended is plain and convincing, and the sufficiency of the evidence is a question for the trial court.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

Action by Penney and others against Simmons to declare a deed absolute on its face a mortgage. There was a judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellants. Blake, Williams & Harrison, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiffs brought this action to have a certain deed, absolute upon its face, declared to be a mortgage, and for a judgment directing the defendant, the grantee named in such deed, to execute to plaintiffs a reconveyance of the property described in the deed, upon the payment of the debt alleged to have been secured by the deed in question. The action was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found that the deed referred to in the complaint was not intended as a mortgage, or as security for any debt. The main contention of appellants upon this appeal is that this finding is not sustained by the evidence. In the late case of Mahoney v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 53, 30 Pac. Rep. 1020, this court, in discussing the nature of the proof required upon the part of the plaintiff in this class of actions, said that the "presumption of law, independent of proof, is that the instrument is what on its face it purports to be,—an absolute conveyance; and that this presumption should be allowed to prevail, unless the evidence offered to show that the deed was in fact intended as a mortgage is entirely plain and convincing." And it was further said that "unless the evidence is such as to leave in the mind of the trial judge a clear and satisfactory conviction that the instrument, which in form is a deed, was intended by all the parties as a mortgage, the finding should be against the plaintiff." Whether, in any case, the evidence is sufficiently strong and clear to produce this conviction, is, like all other questions of fact arising in the trial, a matter for the trial court to determine, (Brisson v. Brisson, 90 Cal. 327, 27 Pac. Rep. 186; Ensign v. Ensign, 120 N. Y. 656, 24 N. E. Rep. 942;) and the finding of the trial court that the deed was not intended as a mortgage will not be set aside in this court, when there is a substantial conflict in the evidence. We think this case presents such a conflict upon the point whether the deed mentioned in the complaint was intended by all the parties thereto as a mortgage, and for this reason the finding of the superior court cannot be disturbed by us.

The other questions discussed in the brief of counsel for appellants require no special consideration. It is sufficient to say that we discover no material error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

SULLIVAN v. HUME. (No. 15,104.)

JUDGMENT—VACATION—WRITTEN FINDINGS—FAILURE OF CLERK TO ENTER WAIVER—APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

1. Where the clerk of the trial court, through inadvertence, failed to enter on the minutes the fact that the parties, by oral consent, in open court, waived written findings, the court properly directed that the minutes be corrected and amended nunc pro tunc as of the day of the waiver, and denied a motion to set aside the judgment on the alleged ground that written findings had not been waived.

2. Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed, on appeal, on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to support them.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Daniel T. Sullivan against one Hume for professional services as attorney at law. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Estee, Fitzgerald & Miller, for appellant. Daniel T. Sullivan, in pro. per.

DE HAVEN, J. This action was brought to recover a balance of $850 claimed to be due from the defendant for professional services rendered to him by the plaintiff in his capacity as an attorney at law. The plaintiff obtained a judgment in the superior court for $500, and the defendant appeals.

1. There were no written findings, and the defendant moved the court to set aside its judgment upon the alleged ground that such findings had not been waived. The motion was denied. The record shows that findings of fact were expressly waived by the oral consent of the parties, given in open court at the time of the submission of the case, but the clerk, through inadvertence, failed to enter the fact of such waiver upon the minutes of the court at the time. This appearing, the court did not err in denying the motion of defendant, and in directing that the minutes of the court be corrected and amended nunc pro tunc as of the day of such waiver, so as to show the real facts in relation thereto. The court had an undoubted right to correct its minutes so as to make them state the truth in relation to the matter, and when this was done the minutes showed a waiver of findings in one of the modes prescribed by section 634 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to wit: "By oral consent in open court, entered in the minutes."

2. Nor can we disturb the judgment upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the implied finding of the court to the effect that the plaintiff was employed by defendant to act as his attorney in the trial of the case referred to in the complaint. This case comes squarely within the settled rule of this court that, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the finding of the trial court or jury upon the disputed fact is conclusive here. The court below evidently gave credit to the testimony of the plaintiff, and that evidence was certainly sufficient to justify the judgment appealed from. Judgment and order affirmed.

JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—VACATION.

Where, in ejectment, default and judgment were taken and rendered against a tenant without the knowledge of his landlord, a motion to set aside the default and vacate the judgment was properly granted.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Ejectment by George B. Mowry against Joseph S. Nunez. There was judgment by default for plaintiff. From an order setting aside the default, and vacating the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. J. E. Simmons and A. A. Moore, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order made December 1, 1890, setting aside the default of defendant, and vacating a judgment theretofore entered against him. The motion of respondent to open the default was upon the grounds "that said judgment and the said default were taken against him by and through the mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect of said Nunez." Afterwards, at the suggestion of the court, another ground was added, viz. irregularity of process, consisting of the issuance of the second summons upon an amended complaint without an order of court allowing it, and the court based its order vacating the judgment upon this latter ground. But the affidavits showing mistake, excusable neglect, etc., were such that the court should have opened the default on that ground, and therefore it is not necessary to discuss the question about the invalidity of the process. This is a case where, in an action of ejectment, default and judgment were taken and rendered against a tenant without the knowledge of his landlord, and in such a case an order vacating a judgment will rarely be disturbed. The order appealed from is affirmed.

DIVORCE—DECREE OF OTHER STATE—COLLATERAL ATTACK—COMPLAINT—JURISDICTIONAL GROUNDS—PROCESS—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE.

1. A decree of divorce, rendered by a court having general jurisdiction, cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that the complaint in the action does not state facts entitling the plaintiff to the relief demanded and awarded.

2. A decree of divorce of another state can be impeached on the ground that the court had not jurisdiction thereof, by reason of plaintiff's not having been a resident of the state for the period prescribed by statute before bringing the action.

3. An implied finding on a point as to which there was a substantial conflict of evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

4. On collateral attack of a judgment by default, rendered on process served by publication, the process will be held to have given the court jurisdiction, where the published order for defendant to appear was in every way formal, and the only defect in the process was the failure of the clerk, on entering the original order in the records, to sign his name to it.

5. Where one has obtained a valid divorce in one state, the fact that his wife afterwards brings an action in another state for divorce from bed and board, and for support, and obtains judgment therefor, he not pleading his decree of divorce, will not change his status of a single man.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCann, Judge.

Petition by Sarah M. James for revocation of letters of administration issued to Leonora A. James on the estate of William E. James, deceased, and for grant of such letters to petitioner. Petition denied, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Horace W. Philbrook, for appellant. Z. N. Goldsby and Joseph H. Skirm, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This proceeding was commenced in the superior court of Santa Cruz county under the provisions of section 1383 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the petitioner therein, Sarah M. James, appeals from an order of that court refusing to revoke letters of administration theretofore issued to the respondent, Leonora A. James, upon the estate of William E. James, deceased, and also refusing to grant letters of administration upon the said estate to the petitioner. The petitioner and the respondent each claims to be the widow of the deceased, and these conflicting claims present the general question which the court is required to determine at this time.

The petitioner, Sarah M. James, was married to the deceased, in the state of New York, in the year 1859, and they lived together in that relation until 1871, when they separated. Thereafter, James went to Missouri, and on May 18, 1874, commenced, in one of the circuit courts of that state, an action against petitioner for a divorce, and on July 3, 1874, obtained a decree purporting to dissolve the bonds of matrimony theretofore existing between himself and the petitioner. The petitioner here was, during all the times of the pendency of the divorce proceedings, a resident of the state of New York, and had no actual knowledge of the pendency of that action, the process therein having been served by publication only. James subsequently became a resident of this state, and in February, 1883, married the respondent, then Leonora A. King, in the county of Santa Cruz, in this state. The marriage ceremony was performed by a minister of the Baptist church, at the home of the parents of respondent, and was witnessed by them, and others invited for that purpose. After their marriage, he and respondent lived together as husband and wife until or about the time of his death, which occurred in April, 1887. It will be seen from the foregoing statement that the decision of this case must turn upon the question of the validity of the decree of divorce which the deceased obtained in the state of Missouri. While there is some conflict in the decisions upon this point, we entertain no doubt that a decree of divorce which has been regularly obtained in one state, by a citizen thereof, against a nonresident defendant, constructively served with process in the action, and without other notice, and which is valid and effectual in the state in which such decree is rendered, is equally valid in a sister state. Ditson v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 87; Leith v. Leith, 39 N. H. 20; Gould v. Crow, 57 Mo. 200; 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. (6th Ed.) §§ 156, 157, 199e. See, also, Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 734, 735; Cheely v. Clayton, 110 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 328. We do not understand the appellant to question this proposition, but her contention is that the decree referred to is absolutely void (1) because the complaint in the action in which the decree was given did not state sufficient facts to entitle the plaintiff therein to a divorce; (2) that the court did not have jurisdiction to render it, for the reason that the deceased was not a resident of the state of Missouri for one year next before the commencement of the action resulting in the decree,—such residence being necessary, under the laws of that state, in order to give its courts jurisdiction in actions for divorce; and (3) because no process was ever issued in the action. These objections will be noticed in their order:

1. The attack here made upon the judgment in James v. James is collateral, and it is well settled that the judgment of a court having general jurisdiction of the subject-matter involved in the judgment cannot be successfully attacked in a collateral proceeding because of an imperfect or defective complaint in the action in which it was rendered. If the facts stated in the complaint are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded therein, and awarded by the judgment, the action of the court in deciding otherwise, and rendering its judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, can be nothing more than error. Head v. Daniels, 38 Kan. 1, 15 Pac. Rep. 911; Rowe v. Palmer, 29 Kan. 337; Frankfurth v. Anderson, 61 Wis. 107, 20 N. W. Rep. 662; Van Fleet, Collat. Attack, § 61. See, also, Blondeau v. Snyder, 95 Cal. 521, 31 Pac. Rep. 591. The complaint in James v. James was sufficient to inform the court and the defendant therein of the relief which the plaintiff demanded, and of the facts upon which he based his right to the relief sought, and this was all that was necessary, in the way of a statement of facts, to give the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action.

2. In regard to the second ground of objection to the decree in James v. James, we agree with appellant that it is competent to collaterally impeach the record of a judgment rendered in another state by extrinsic evidence showing that the facts necessary to give the court pronouncing it jurisdiction to proceed, did not exist, and this is true although the record sought to be impeached may redite the existence of such jurisdictional facts. Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457; Machine Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92; Starbuck v. Murray, 5 Wend. 148; Eager v. Stover, 59 Mo. 87. But in this case there was a substantial conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the deceased was a bona fide resident of the state of Missouri at the time and for one year prior to the commencement of the divorce proceeding there, and, this being so, we cannot disturb the implied finding of the court below to the effect that he was such a resident, and had resided in the state for the length of time alleged in his complaint in that action.

3. The laws of the state of Missouri in regard to the constructive service of process upon nonresident defendants in actions for divorce was introduced in evidence, from which it appears that the process prescribed in such cases is an order made by "the clerk or court in vacation * * * directed to the nonresidents or absentees, notifying them of the commencement of the action; and stating briefly the object and general nature of the petition," etc.; such order to be published for four weeks "in some newspaper, * * * which the court, judge or clerk making the order may designate as most likely to give notice to the person to be notified." The order directing the defendant to appear in the divorce proceedings of James v. James was made by the clerk of the court in vacation. In form and contents, it complied with the statute, and was entered by him in the proper book of record kept in his office, but the name of the clerk was not signed to such entry. The copy of the order, as published, purported to be attested by the clerk, with the seal of the court, and was published in the paper named in the order for the length of time required by the order, and the laws of the state of Missouri. Upon this state of facts the appellant contends that no process was ever issued in the action of James v. James, and that the order notifying the petitioner here to appear as defendant therein was absolutely void, because of the failure of the clerk to sign the same as entered by him in the records of the court, and that the default judgment taken against the petitioner here, as defendant in that action, was and is, for this reason, void, in the broadest sense of that word, and must be so held in this collateral attack upon that judgment. But we do not think so. In the cases of Wilson v. Owens, 45 Ala. 451; Costley v. Driver, Id. 230; Winnemore v. Mathews, Id. 449,—cited by appellant, and also in Sheppard v. Powers, 50 Ala. 377, it was held that a summons not signed by the clerk issuing it is invalid, and will not support a judgment by default. But the question arose in each of these cases upon a direct appeal from the judgment based upon such defective summons, and not in a collateral attack upon the judgment, as in the case at bar; and, as the rule in relation to the effect of errors or irregularities of practice in obtaining a judgment is not the same in the case of a direct appeal from the judgment as when the judgment is collaterally assailed upon the same grounds, we do not regard the cases just referred to as any authority for the proposition that a judgment regular in all other respects must be held void, when collaterally brought under review, because of such an infirmity in the process upon which it is based. There is a clear distinction between the entire want of jurisdiction, and an irregularity in some one of the steps taken in obtaining jurisdiction. In the former case the judgment is absolutely void at all times, and whenever brought forward or called in question, but in the latter case the judgment is valid until reversed or set aside. "No principle of law," says Mr. Black in his work on Judgments, "is more firmly settled than that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, so long as it stands in full force and unreversed, cannot be impeached in any collateral proceeding on account of mere errors or irregularities not going to the jurisdiction." Black, Judgm. § 261. See, also, 1 Freeman Judgm. (4th Ed.) § 126. In the case of Ambler v. Leach, 15 W. Va. 677, the court, in a careful opinion reviewing many cases, reached the conclusion that a summons otherwise regular is not absolutely null and void because not signed by the clerk, and that a judgment by default, based thereon, should not be held invalid upon a collateral attack. It is true that in the judgment held good in the case just mentioned the defective summons was personally served upon the defendant, while in the judgment now under consideration the service was by publication, but we do not regard this difference as material to the question we are now discussing. The order, as actually published in the case of James v. James, was full and complete, and purported to have been signed by the proper officer, and we think that the neglect of the clerk to sign his name at the foot of the order entered by him in the proper book kept for the entry of such orders should be treated, in this collateral attack upon the judgment based on such order, as a mere clerical omission in a matter more of form than substance, and such as was certainly cured by the entry of the judgment. The order was in fact made when it was entered in the records of the court, and, while it would have been more regular to have authenticated it with the signature of the clerk, the irregularity was not of such vital character as to deprive the court of jurisdiction to enter the judgment which it did, based upon the constructive service of process, of which that order was a material part.

4. It also appears from the record before us that, after the rendition of the decree of divorce, James returned to the state of New York, and the petitioner here brought an action against him to obtain a divorce from bed and board, and in October, 1874, obtained such a judgment against him; and it was also further adjudged in that action that he pay to her, for the support of herself and children, $25 per week, and costs of the action. The validity of the decree of divorce obtained by James in the state of Missouri was not directly put in issue in that action, and there is nothing in the record to indicate that it was ever brought to the attention of the court in New York rendering this latter judgment. We do not think that the judgment just referred to is a bar to the right of the respondent to assert in this proceeding the binding force of the former decree of divorce rendered in the state of Missouri in the case of James v. James, and the lawfulness of her subsequent marriage to the deceased in this state. The decree of divorce obtained by the deceased in Missouri was valid, and established the status of the deceased as an unmarried man, leaving him free to again enter into the marriage relation with any other person consenting thereto. His failure to plead the judgment of divorce in bar of the subsequent action brought by the petitioner for the separation from bed and board, and the judgment of the court in New York decreeing such separation, did not have the effect to change the status of deceased from that which was given him by the decree of divorce rendered in the state of Missouri. After that decree, and until reversed or vacated by some appropriate proceeding, his status as a single man could not be changed without his consent. Judgment and order affirmed.

KREISS v. HOTALING. (No. 15,088.)

DISMISSAL OF ACTION—DELAY IN SERVING SUMMONS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. On a motion to dismiss an action for unreasonable delay in serving the summons, it appeared that the summons was issued on November 11, 1889, and was served on October 12, 1891; that defendant's place of business was well known; and that he could have been found at any time, except on three occasions, when he was out of the city. Plaintiff's counter affidavit stated that the delay was to avoid putting defendant to the expense of a trial; that the matter involved in the action had been the subject of arbitration between the parties; that a judgment on an award in defendant's favor had been set aside, and defendant had appealed; that it would have been a useless expense to proceed with the action during the pendency of the appeal, which was decided only a few days before the motion to dismiss was made; and that the action was brought to avoid any plea of the statute of limitations. Held, that an order dismissing the action would not be disturbed on appeal on the ground that the trial court abused its discretion.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 581, as amended in 1889, which provides that any action shall be dismissed by the court on its own motion, or on the motion of any party interested, unless summons shall have been issued within one year, and served within three years, after commencement of the action, or unless defendant has appeared within said three years, is not a legislative declaration that three years is a reasonable time within which to serve summons.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter N. Levy, Judge.

Action by Kreiss against Hotaling. The action was dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry E. Highton, for appellant. A. N. Drown, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The appeal in this case is from a judgment dismissing the action, on motion of plaintiff, on the ground that there had been an unreasonable delay in service of the summons. The action was commenced November 11, 1889, and summons was issued on the same day, but was not served on defendant until October 12, 1891. Upon the hearing of the motion it was shown that the defendant's places of business and residence were well known, and that he could have been found at any time, except on three occasions, when he was temporarily away from the city; that he had repeatedly conversed with the attorney for the plaintiff after the commencement of the action. The counter affidavits of plaintiff show that the plaintiff delayed the service of the summons because he desired not to put the defendant to the expense and annoyance of a trial, or even answering in the case; that all the matters involved in this action had been the subject of arbitration between the parties, which had resulted in an award and judgment in favor of the defendant; that if said award should stand it would finally dispose of all the matters in dispute between the parties, but on motion of the plaintiff it had been held to be invalid as a judgment of the court; that the defendant had appealed from the decision of the court holding that it was not good as a statutory award and judgment; and that it would be a useless expense to proceed with the trial of this action during the pendency of said appeal. It appears from the affidavit of counsel for plaintiff that "on or about November 11, 1889, when this action was commenced by filing the complaint and issuing the summons thereon, the situation of the controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant was such that it was deemed necessary to file the said complaint, so as to avoid any possible plea of the statute of limitations." The appeal referred to was taken in May, 1889. The matter was argued in this court in August, 1891, but was not determined until a few days before the motion was made in the court below to dismiss the action. 28 Pac. Rep. 806. At the conclusion of his affidavit the defendant stated that counsel for the plaintiff visited his house to examine the work done and materials furnished by the plaintiff, compensation for which forms the basis of this action, and said to defendant, as he left the latter's residence: "You have been wronged, and I can see it, and I will never serve those papers." Upon this showing, we cannot say that the court below abused its discretion in granting the motion to dismiss. It is probable that if the motion had been denied, and the defendant had appealed, we would have said that the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion. "To say that the law allows no latitude for the exercise of discretionary power is to deny that the power is discretionary. The only limitation that the law has placed upon the exercise of discretionary judicial power is that it must not be abused." Clavey v. Lord, 87 Cal. 419, 25 Pac. Rep. 493. It was for the court, in the exercise of its discretion, after hearing the statements of the parties, to say whether the plaintiff was acting in good faith, and had exercised reasonable diligence. The facts that the statute of limitations would have run against plaintiff's cause of action unless the suit had been commenced in November, 1889, and that the appeal from the order of the court below granting a perpetual stay of execution on the judgment proceeding was pending, are immaterial. Simmons v. Keller, 50 Cal. 38.

We think counsel for appellant puts an erroneous construction upon section 581, Code Civil Proc., as amended in 1889. That amendment provided that no action shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings had therein, and that all actions theretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court on its own motion, or on the motion of any party interested, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, unless summons shall have been issued within one year, and served within three years, after the commencement of the action, or unless an appearance has been made by the defendant within said three years; and it is claimed that the amendment is, in effect, a legislative declaration that three years is a reasonable time within which to make service of the summons. Prior to the adoption of that amendment the court had no power,—at least there was a question whether the court had power,—on its own motion, to dismiss an action which had been pending for a long time without service of the summons. In the various superior courts of the state, numerous cases, chiefly tax and street assessment cases, were pending, which affected the title to real estate, and which could not be disposed of, because of the death or removal of parties, and the fact that there was no one entitled to give or receive notice. It was to meet the objection found in Soule v. Billings, 42 Cal. 285, and to enable the courts to avoid this difficulty, and rid their calendars of dead cases, that this amendment was passed by the legislature. This new provision is in no sense prohibitory. It does not limit the power of the court, but enlarges the same. It provides what must be done under certain circumstances. The discretion of the court to determine whether there has been an inexcusable delay within the term of three years still remains, and each case must be determined upon its own peculiar circumstances. Judgment affirmed.

TOWLE v. CARMELO LAND & COAL CO.
(No. 15,025.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1893.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY — PARTIES.

1. An agreement stated that the parties of the first part, on confirmation of the title to a designated rancho, would convey to the parties of the second part "the land within the limits of said rancho, and in the occupation of each of said parties on the first day of July, 1881, in severalty, at the rate of $1.25 per acre: provided, that coal lands, and also lands within a mile of the bay or landing known as the 'E. Landing,' are not included in this agreement." Held, that the description of the land was sufficient to withstand a demurrer in an action for specific performance, as it did not appear on the face of the agreement that the exact location and particular boundaries of the land intended could not be shown by parol evidence.

2. Nor was the complaint demurrable for a defect of parties defendant, in that all the persons named in the contract were not joined, since the contract showed that it was made separately with each person named as a grantor, who was to be entitled to a separate parcel, of which he was to be in possession on July 1, 1881, and the complaint did not show that either of the parties to the contract, not sued, were on that day in possession of any part of the land, or claimed any interest in it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; John K. Alexander, Judge.

Action by Towle against the Carmelo Land & Coal Company for specific performance of a contract to convey land. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Baggett, for appellant. W. A. Kearney and N. A. Dorn, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Action to enforce the specific performance of an agreement for the conveyance of land forming a part of the Rancho San Jose y Sur Chiquito. The superior court gave judgment in favor of plaintiff, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and the defendant appeals. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, and this contains no bill of exceptions. The only grounds urged for a reversal of the judgment, which we deem necessary to notice in this opinion, arise upon the face of the complaint.

1. The contract which is the subject of this action was entered into between the grantors of defendant, as parties of the first part, and the plaintiff and several other named persons, parties of the second part, and, so far as necessary to be here stated, is as follows: "This memorandum of agreement * * * witnesseth that the parties of the first part covenant and agree with all of the parties of the second part that, upon the confirmation of the title to said rancho, they will convey to the said several parties of the second part the land within the limits of said rancho, and in occupation and possession of each of said parties on the first day of July, 1881, in severalty, at the rate of one dollar and a quarter per acre: provided, * * * that coal lands, and also lands within a mile of the bay or landing known as the 'Emery and Bassett' or 'Stone Quarry' landing, are not included in this agreement." It is claimed by the defendant that the description of the land agreed to be conveyed is so uncertain that the contract is not one which can be specifically enforced by a court of equity.

The rule is, of course, a familiar one, that the subject-matter—the particular land to be conveyed—is an essential term in every agreement for the sale of land, and unless this subject-matter is so described that it can be identified a court of equity will not undertake to enforce it; but, while this is so, it is equally well settled that the description need not be so clear and precise as to make a resort to extrinsic evidence unnecessary. Pom. Cont. § 90. This learned author, in the section just cited, says: "The subject-matter of the agreement must all be included in the memorandum, and must be described with sufficient exactness to render its identity certain, upon the introduction of extrinsic evidence simply disclosing the situation of the parties at and immediately before the time of making the contract." If, upon reading the contract in the light of the facts shown by such extrinsic evidence, it appears clear what land the vendor intended to convey, and the vendee intended to purchase, the description will be deemed sufficiently certain. This proposition is forcibly illustrated in the cases of Preble v. Abrahams, 88 Cal. 245, 26 Pac. Rep. 99, and Mead v. Parker, 115 Mass. 413, and many others might be cited to sustain it. In Preble v. Abrahams the land mentioned in the agreement to convey was described simply as "forty acres of the eighty-acre tract at Biggs." The court held this description sufficiently definite, aided, as it was in that case, by parol evidence showing the situation of the parties at the time of making the contract, and other surrounding circumstances, in view of which the contract was made. In its opinion, delivered by the late Mr. Justice Sharpstein, the court in that case said: "We think the evidence makes the subject-matter sufficiently certain, and that is all that is necessary. Prof. Pomeroy says: 'It is not strictly accurate to say that the subject-matter must be absolutely certain from the writing itself, or by reference to some other writing. The true rule is that the situation of the parties and the surrounding circumstances when the contract was made can be shown by parol evidence, so that the court may be placed in the position of the parties themselves, and if then the subject-matter is identified, and the terms appear reasonably certain, it is enough.' Pom. Cont. p. 227, note." In Mead v. Parker, 115 Mass. 413, the court held the following writing sufficiently definite in its description of the property agreed to be conveyed, when read in connection with the parol evidence, received upon the trial of that case: "Boston, December 17, 1872. This is to certify that I, Jonas Parker, have sold to Franklin Mead a house on Church street for the sum of fifty-five hundred dollars; and in payment said Mead assumes the mortgage of twenty-nine hundred dollars, and pays cash one hundred dollars; balance, bill of sale of a steam engine and crushing machine, and trucks and railway, and all the implements in the building; and also the building in which the said machinery and tools now with the same; and papers necessary to convey above to be made and passed on or before 25th December, 1872." In passing upon the objection that this contract was void because of uncertainty in the description of its subject-matter, the court said: "The most specific and precise description of the property intended requires some parol proof to complete its identification. A more general description requires more. When all the circumstances of possession, ownership, situation of the parties, and of their relation to each other and to the property, as they were when the negotiations took place and the writing was made, are disclosed, if the meaning and application of the writing, read in the light of those circumstances, are certain and plain, the parties will be bound by it, as a sufficient written contract or memorandum of their agreement. That parol evidence is competent to furnish these means of interpreting and applying written agreements is settled by the uniform current of authorities." In the contract set out in the complaint in this action, the defendant's grantors agreed to convey to plaintiff all that portion of the San Jose y Sur Chiquito Rancho in his occupation and possession on the 1st day of July, 1881. Upon the face of this agreement, there is no uncertainty as to what land is to be conveyed, and nothing to suggest that there could be any difficulty in showing by parol evidence the exact location and particular boundaries of the land in the occupation and possession of plaintiff on the day mentioned. This general description is therefore sufficient, and it was competent for the plaintiff in the action for the specific performance of such agreement to allege, as he did, in his complaint, and prove by extrinsic evidence, the particular boundaries of the land thus generally described, and that no portion of the land within such boundaries was excepted from the agreement by reason of being coal land, or within a mile of the bay or landing known as the "Emery and Bassett" or "Stone Quarry" landing.

2. The defendant further contends that there was a defect of parties defendant, because all the parties named in the contract upon which plaintiff sues were not made parties to the action, and this was one of the grounds upon which defendant demurred to the complaint. There was no error in overruling the demurrer thus interposed. The contract, which is the foundation of this action, shows upon its face that it was, as between defendant's grantors, and each of the other persons signing it, a separate and distinct contract. Each party was to be entitled to the particular tract of which he was in occupation on July 1, 1881, and it does not appear from anything which is alleged in the complaint to suggest that either of the other persons who signed the contract sued upon were on that date in possession of any part of the particular tract now claimed by plaintiff in this action, or that either of them asserts any right under that contract to a conveyance of any portion of such land; and, this being so, it cannot be said that the complaint shows upon its face any defect of parties defendant.

There are other points made in the brief of counsel, but we do not deem it necessary to particularly discuss them. Judgment affirmed.

In re IRVINE'S ESTATE. (No. 14,988.)¹
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1893.)

APPEAL—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

A verdict rendered on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, though the preponderance is apparently in favor of appellant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceeding by Endora V. Smith to recover a claim against the estate of William Irvine, deceased. There was a judgment in favor of petitioner, and the administrator appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Seawell and J. B. Reinstein, for appellant. H. N. Clement and G. W. Haight, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal by the administrator of the estate of William Irvine, deceased, from a decree requiring him to pay to Endora V. Smith the sum of $500. Petitioner, having a claim against the estate of said deceased, alleges that by reason of certain false representations made to her by the administrator and his attorney, and upon which representations she relied, she compromised her claim against said estate for $500 less than the amount that was legally due her, and this proceeding was brought against the administrator to recover that sum. The main contention of appellant's counsel is that the evidence does not support the findings. After a careful examination of the record, we cannot say but that a substantial conflict in the evidence arises upon all material matters. While the preponderance is apparently favorable to appellant, yet the only safe rule, and therefore the only wise rule, for this court to follow, where a substantial conflict does arise, is to affirm the action of the trial court. This principle is settled law. The findings are sufficient to support the decree. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

LEWIS v. WIDBER, Treasurer. (No. 15,452.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1893.)
MUNICIPAL INDEBTEDNESS—SALARY OF OFFICER—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Const. art. 11, § 18, which provides that no city shall incur any liability exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of said city, has no application to the liability of a city for the salary of a municipal officer, whose office has been created, and whose salary has been fixed, by statute, as such liability, in that it is established by the legislature, cannot be said to be incurred by the city. Shaw v. Statler, 15 Pac. Rep. 833, 74 Cal. 258; Schwartz v. Wilson, 17 Pac. Rep. 449, 75 Cal. 502,—distinguished.

2. Under Consolidation Act, (Charter San Francisco County and City,) § 95, providing that the fixed salaries of officers shall be paid out of the general fund, the salary of the chief clerk of the registrar of voters, the amount of which is fixed by the legislature, is payable out of such fund.

In bank.

Application by George E. Lewis for a writ of mandate to compel J. H. Widber, treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, to pay an audited claim of applicant for salary as chief clerk in the office of registrar of voters. Granted.

S. C. Denson, for petitioner. T. C. Van Ness, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an original application here for a writ of mandate requiring the respondent, who is treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, to pay an audited claim of petitioner for his salary as chief clerk in the office of registrar of voters for the month of June, 1893. The facts are that the office of petitioner was established, and his salary fixed at $150 per month, by a statute of the state legislature; that when on August 3, 1893, he made demand on the respondent for the payment of his claim for salary for the month of June preceding, there was plenty of money in the general fund of said city and county to pay the same, but that there was no money in said fund which had been derived from the revenues of the city for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893. The charter of said city and county, commonly called the "Consolidation Act," provides that the fixed salaries of officers shall be paid out of the general fund, and that, in case of a deficiency in the fund, demands for salaries shall be registered and paid out of any moneys afterwards coming into the fund. Sections 95, 96. It nowhere limits the payment of such salaries to the revenue of any particular year. The respondent contends—or, rather, he suggests that somebody else might give him trouble by contending—that he should not pay petitioner's salary on account of section 18 of article 11 of the state constitution, which reads as follows: "No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district, shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner, or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters," etc. It is quite apparent, however, that this clause of the constitution refers only to an indebtedness or liability which one of the municipal bodies mentioned has itself incurred; that is, an indebtedness which the municipality has contracted, or a liability resulting, in whole or in part, from some act or conduct of such municipality. Such is the plain meaning of the language used. The clear intent expressed in the said clause was to limit and restrict the power of the municipality as to any indebtedness or liability which it has discretion to incur, or not to incur. But the stated salary of a public officer, fixed by statute, is a matter over which the municipality has no control, and with respect to which it has no discretion, and the payment of his salary is a liability established by the legislature at the date of the creation of the office. It therefore is not an indebtedness or liability incurred by the municipality, within the meaning of said clause of the constitution. Counsel for respondent does not very strenuously contend that the foregoing construction would not be the correct one if the question were res integra; but he contends that this court has decided otherwise in the cases of Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 641; Shaw v. Statler, 74 Cal. 258, 15 Pac. Rep. 833; and Schwartz v. Wilson, 75 Cal. 502, 17 Pac. Rep. 449. But the point under discussion here was not involved in either of those cases, and therefore could not possibly have been there decided. In neither of those cases was the subject of the litigation the payment of the fixed salary of a public officer prescribed by law. In each case there was involved only an ordinary debt created by the municipality itself,—an indebtedness which it had incurred; and we agree with the decision of the court in those cases that debts and liabilities of that kind must be paid out of the revenue of the year in which such indebtedness or liability was incurred by the municipality. In the Brickwedel Case the matter involved grew out of a contract made by the city about the purchase of gas; in Shaw v. Statler, out of the hiring of a man as boss of the chain gang; and, in Schwartz v. Wilson, out of a sale to the county of certain goods, wares, and merchandise. Those cases were therefore properly decided; but, of course, general language used by a judge when delivering the opinion of the court must be considered with reference to points before the court, and the matters involved in the case. And the general language used by Mr Justice Ross in the Brickwedel Case,—upon which the fears of respondent are based,—even if taken in the abstract, does not warrant the construction put upon it. The words, "no such indebtedness or liability should be incurred exceeding," etc., means incurred by the municipality; and in speaking of the object of the provision he refers to a system previously prevailing in some of the municipalities, "by which liability and indebtedness were incurred by them far in excess," etc. And in speaking of the result of the enforcement of the constitutional provision, after referring to the principle that all are presumed to know the powers of a municipality, he says that "those who contract with it, or furnish it with supplies, do so with reference to the law." And, of course, when taken with reference to the point then before the court, there is nothing in the opinion which conflicts with the conclusion at which we have arrived in the case at bar. The cases cited by respondent, of People v. May, 12 Pac. Rep. 838, decided by the supreme court of Colorado, and Lake Co. v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 662, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 651, are not in point. Those cases dealt with a constitutional provision very different from the one invoked in the case at bar,—a provision which limited the amount of "debt by loan" which a county could contract, and the "aggregate amount of indebtedness" which it could incur. On the other hand, the cases of Cashin v. Dunn, 58 Cal. 581, and Welch v. Strother, 74 Cal. 413, 16 Pac. Rep. 22, are strongly in point, for while the "one-twelfth act," and not the said constitutional provision, was involved in those cases, still the same rule was applied there which we apply here. In the former case the court said that the said act "has no application whatever to the auditing and payment of demands for salaries of officers whose appointment is provided for and salaries fixed by law," and in the latter case this court said as follows: "Salaries are not liabilities against the treasury, which rest upon any authorization or contract by the board of supervisors, or any other officer. They are fixed by law, and are not subject to the control of such officers. They are payable out of the general fund, and are not limited to any particular part of that fund which the board may choose to set apart for their payment." Our conclusion is that the payment of the salary of a public officer, whose office has been created and salary fixed by law, either statutory or constitutional, is not within the provision of said section 18 of article 11 of the constitution; that his salary is to be paid out of said general fund when there is sufficient money therein, without regard to revenues of separate years; and that it was a duty specially enjoined by law upon respondent to pay the said audited demand of petitioner when it was presented, on said 3d day of July. Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue, as prayed for in the petition.

HIMMELEIN v. SUPREME COUNCIL AMERICAN LEGION OF HONOR. (No.
14,951.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—ACTION ON CERTIFICATE—PLEADING—INTEREST.

1. An application for membership in a benefit society, and statements of the applicant to the medical examiner, both of which are on file in the office of the secretary of the society, and are referred to in the benefit certificate, and made part of the contract, need not be set out in the complaint in an action on the certificate. Cowan v. Insurance Co., 20 Pac. Rep. 408, 78 Cal. 181, followed.

2. In an action on a benefit certificate, by which defendant promised "to pay out of its benefit fund to [plaintiff] a sum not exceeding $500," the complaint after setting out the certificate alleged that "by the terms and conditions of the said contract the said defendant promised to pay to the plaintiff, out of its benefit fund, the sum of $5,000;" that the member had performed all the conditions of the contract; "and that said sum of $5,000 is now due and owing from the said defendant to this plaintiff." Held, that the complaint sufficiently stated a cause of action for $5,000.

3. A provision in a benefit certificate, that it shall be payable only on its surrender, is waived where the benefit society refuses to pay solely on the grounds of nonpayment of assessments, and that another beneficiary had been substituted.

4. In an action on a benefit certificate, by the terms of which the claim was not due until proof of death was furnished, interest will be allowed only from the commencement of the action, where the complaint merely states that proof of death had been made, without showing when, and the findings only show that the proof was made "before the commencement of this action."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Sarah A. Himmelein against the Supreme Council American Legion of Honor. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified.

Walter D. Mansfield, for appellant. Davis Louderback, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendant is an association incorporated under the laws of the commonwealth of Massachusetts for several purposes, one of which is: "5th. To establish a benefit fund from which, on the satisfactory evidence of the death of a beneficial member of the order who has complied with all its lawful requirements, a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars shall be paid to the family, orphans, or dependents, as the member may direct." It has power to institute subordinate councils and grand councils in other states and countries, and in 1879 did institute at the city of San Francisco, in the state of California, a subordinate council called "Golden Council, No. 118," of which Eugene Alphonso Millard became a member, of the sixth degree, on the 1st day of May, 1881; and thereafter, June 2, 1881, the said supreme council issued and delivered to Millard the following "benefit certificate" or policy of life insurance: "No. 24,311. $5,000.

American Legion of Honor Benefit Certificate. This certificate is issued to companion Eugene Alphonso Millard, a member of Golden Council, No. 118, A. L. H., located at San Francisco, Cal., upon evidence received from said council that said companion is a sixth degree contributor to the benefit fund of this order, and upon condition that the statements made by said companion in application for membership in said council, and the statements certified by said companion to medical examiner, both of which are filed in the supreme secretary's office, be made a part of this contract, and upon condition that the said companion complies in the future with the laws, rules, and regulations now governing the said council and fund, or that may be hereafter enacted by the supreme council to govern said council and fund. These conditions being complied with, the supreme council of the A. L. H. hereby promises and binds itself to pay out of its benefit fund to Sarah Alexandrina Millard, wife, a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, in accordance with, and under the provisions of, the laws governing said fund, upon satisfactory evidence of the death of said companion and upon the surrender of this certificate: provided, that said companion is in good standing in this order at the time of death: and provided, also, that this certificate shall not have been surrendered by said companion, and another certificate issued, in accordance with the laws of this order." From 1874 until the death of Eugene A. Millard, Sarah Alexandrina Millard, who is named as beneficiary in said certificate, was his lawful wife, but after his death she married John Himmelein, and, by the name Sarah Alexandrina Himmelein, commenced this action on said certificate on July 30, 1885, to recover from defendant $5,000 and interest thereon; and the judgment of the court, without the intervention of a jury, was rendered in her favor on May 18, 1891, for the sum of $5,000, and interest thereon from the death of Millard, (February 23, 1884), the judgment for principal and interest amounting to $7,535.53. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

1. It is contended for appellant that the complaint does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action:

First. Because the statements in Millard's application for membership, and his statements to the medical examiner, both on file in the office of the supreme secretary, and both referred to in the policy, and made parts of the contract, are not set out in the complaint. A sufficient answer to this point may be found in the opinion of this court in the case of Cowan v. Insurance Co., 78 Cal. 181, 20 Pac. Rep. 408.

Second. It is claimed the complaint does not state a cause of action, because it appears on the face of the policy set out in the complaint that it is not a contract to pay

$5,000 absolutely, but only to pay a sum not exceeding $5,000, and that no facts are alleged by which the court can estimate and determine what sum the plaintiff is entitled to. There was no demurrer to the complaint, and therefore appellant is not entitled to complain on the ground of mere uncertainty or ambiguity. The policy set out in the complaint states that the defendant "promises and binds itself to pay out of its benefit fund to [plaintiff] a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, in accordance with, and under the provisions of, the laws governing said fund." After setting out the policy, the complaint states "that by the terms and conditions of the said contract the said defendant promised to pay to the plaintiff, out of its said benefit fund, the sum of five thousand dollars;" then alleges that Millard performed all the conditions of said policy to be performed by him; that the defendant has, and always has had, in its benefit fund, sufficient money to pay $5,000, and the interest thereon; "and that said sum of five thousand dollars is now due and owing from the said defendant to this plaintiff." These allegations are to the effect, and must have been understood by a person of ordinary understanding to mean, that by the performance of all the conditions precedent on the part of Millard, and by virtue of, and "in accordance with, * * * the provisions of the laws governing said fund," the conditional promise of the defendant had matured into an absolute obligation to pay the full sum of $5,000, with interest thereon. Yet it is contended that the "provisions of the laws governing said fund," referred to in the policy, should have been stated or set out in the complaint, and that otherwise the sum due on the policy could not have been estimated or determined from the complaint. Conceding the complaint to have been defective in this respect, the defect was waived, and rendered harmless, if not entirely cured, by a stipulation between the attorneys of the respective parties, made and filed before the defendant answered the complaint, by which it was agreed that two printed pamphlets then on file in the case contained all the laws of defendant applicable to or bearing upon this case, or referred to in the policy, and that such laws were to be "introduced, admitted, and read in evidence." This stipulation is expressly referred to in the answer of defendant, and in pursuance thereof the answer refers to said pamphlets as then being on file in this action, and containing the laws and constitutions of the defendant, as though they were exhibits annexed to the answer. The object and substantial effect of the stipulation was to make it a part of the pleadings by which all the laws of the defendant, applicable to the case, became conclusively admitted facts. Both parties acted upon, and had the benefit of, the stipulation. Each party read from the pamphlets such portions of the laws as deemed favorable to its theory of the case, without objection, and the stipulation and the contents of the pamphlets are made parts of the statement or motion for new trial. If the stipulation had not been made, and defendant had demurred to the complaint, or had objected to evidence of the laws on the ground that they had not been pleaded, the plaintiff might have been permitted to amend her complaint so as to make it unobjectionable. The laws of the defendant, admitted by the stipulation, together with the facts properly alleged in the complaint, and found by the court to be true, warrant the legal conclusion that the policy obligated the defendant to pay the plaintiff the full principal sum of $5,000; and in view of the stipulation, and the action of the parties thereunder, in which appear all the elements of an estoppel in pais, the defendant cannot be heard on this appeal, for the first time, to object to the complaint on the ground that those laws were not therein set out. Donner v. Palmer, 51 Cal. 630.

Third. The third objection to the complaint is substantially the same as the second, and admits of the same answer.

Fourth. Inasmuch as the policy is made payable "upon the surrender of this certificate," it is contended that the complaint is defective, in that it does not aver a surrender of the certificate. It is alleged in the complaint that satisfactory evidence of the death of Millard was furnished to defendant, but that defendant refused, and still refuses, to pay to plaintiff said sum of $5,000, or any part thereof. The answer not only admits (by not denying) the alleged refusal to pay, but denies defendant's liability to pay any sum on other grounds than the failure of plaintiff to surrender the certificate, namely, nonpayment of assessments, and that another beneficiary had been substituted for the plaintiff, without alleging as a defense, or at all, a failure or refusal to surrender the certificate. Conceding, for the sake of the argument, merely, that the surrender of the policy is a condition precedent to the right to recover, yet like the condition in a policy of fire insurance requiring proof of loss, etc., it may be waived by the insurer's denial of all liability on other grounds. In Bacon on Benefit Societies and Life Insurance, (section 413,) the author says: "No proofs of loss are necessary if the company disclaims all liability under the contract. Probably no rule of insurance is better settled than this. * * * And so, when the insurer declines to pay the loss, and assigns a reason other than want of proofs, as, for example the nonpayment of an assessment, then proofs of loss are excused. This rule, also, has never been denied. Many other acts and circumstances will be construed to amount to a waiver of proofs of loss, or of any defects which might, under other conditions, be taken advantage of." See, also, Schwarzbach v. Protective Union, 25 W. Va. 648. And thus the defendant in this case waived a surrender of the certificate, since it must be presumed that its agents had knowledge of the failure to surrender the certificate, if such was the fact, at the time they denied all liability of defendant on other grounds.

2. It is contended for appellant that the court erred in allowing interest on the principal sum found due on the policy from the date of Millard's death, or any interest whatever, for the reason that before adjudication the sum which plaintiff was entitled to recover was uncertain and unliquidated; and, furthermore, that it does not appear when defendant was furnished with proof of Millard's death. It is true that, while it is alleged that proof of Millard's death had been made, the complaint does not show when it had been made, and the findings show only that it was furnished to defendant "before the commencement of this action." It was therefore error to allow interest for any time before the commencement of the action, since by the terms of the policy the demand was not due until such proof was furnished. Millard died February 23, 1884, and this action was commenced July 30, 1885. Therefore, interest should have been allowed only from and after this last-mentioned date. Chase v. Insurance Co., 67 Me. 85-91; Trager v. Insurance Co., 31 La. Ann. 235, 442. It is not true, however, that the sum to which plaintiff was entitled was unliquidated or uncertain at the time the action was commenced. On the complaint and stipulated facts the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the contract (policy) the certain principal sum of $5,000, and interest thereon from and after the maturity of defendant's obligation to pay the same. The court found all the facts stated in the complaint to be true, and the defendant is estopped from denying the stipulated facts as to the laws and constitution of the defendant. Donner v. Palmer, 51 Cal. 630. By the terms of the policy, and according to defendant's answer, the defendant was to pay "out of its benefit fund * * * a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, in accordance with, and under the provisions of, the laws governing said fund." According to those laws, the plaintiff, on the facts alleged in the complaint, was entitled to recover the certain sum of $5,000. No assessment was necessary, since it is admitted by the pleadings that there was sufficient money in the benefit fund to pay the sum demanded. Nor was any assessment authorized, unless the benefit fund required it. Appellant's objections to interest, after the demand became due, ultimately rest on the alleged insufficiency of the complaint, in that it did not set out the laws, entirely ignoring the stipulation as to those laws. The reading of the laws governing the benefit fund as a part of the contract, in connection with the facts alleged in the complaint and found by the court, removes all uncertainty as to what sum the plaintiff was entitled to recover at the date of the commencement of the action, and furnishes an answer to all objections to the allowance of interest from and after that date. Civil Code, § 3287. This conclusion is not in conflict with the decision of this court in the case of Deardorff v. Association, 89 Cal. 600, 27 Pac. Rep. 158, as will become obvious on comparison of the facts of this case with those of that.

3. It is contended that the finding that Millard was a member in good standing immediately before he died, and the finding that no other person had been substituted for plaintiff as beneficiary, are not justified by the evidence. There is but little real conflict of evidence upon either of these issues, and the evidence tending to sustain the findings on both seems amply sufficient.

4. The contention of appellant that, although no substitution of beneficiary was actually made, yet it should have been made, and therefore, upon equitable principles, should be considered as having been made, has no foundation either in defendant's answer or in the evidence. It does not appear that the substitution claimed would have been equitable, but the contrary.

5. The contention that plaintiff was estopped from claiming the benefit of the policy by her acquiescence in the proceedings in an action by Nellie C. Millard upon the same policy, (81 Cal. 340, 22 Pac. Rep. 864,) is without merit. That action is not mentioned or referred to in the pleadings. This plaintiff was not a party to it. No record of it was introduced in evidence, and there was no evidence that plaintiff acquiesced in it, or in any proceeding therein. The cause is remanded, with direction to the court below to modify the judgment by deducting therefrom the interest thereby allowed for any time prior to the commencement of the action. As so modified, the judgment and order are affirmed; costs of appeal to be taxed to respondent.

ILLINOIS TRUST & SAV. BANK v. PACIFIC RY. CO. et al. (No. 15,460.)

APPEALABLE ORDERS.

An order in foreclosure proceedings, entered before an order of sale, directing the application of the proceeds of the mortgaged property, is not a final judgment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank against the Pacific Railway Company and others to foreclose a mortgage. There was an order settling priority of claims, and defendants Alvord and Brown appeal. Dismissed.

Allen, McAllister & Frohman and John D. Pope, for appellants. Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland and Marble & Phibbs, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. These are motions to dismiss the appeal of Alvord and Brown from an order made in the above-entitled action before the entry of the final judgment. The action is to foreclose a mortgage of the property of a street-railway company. The defendants and cross complainants, Brown and Alvord, as trustees of the mortgaged property, bonds of the corporation, have the first mortgage lien, which by the order appealed from is subordinated to the indebtedness contracted by two receivers of the mortgaged property,—one (Trask) appointed in this action, and the other (Crank) previously appointed by another department of the same court in another action. It seems that Crank had been operating the road for a year or two under the orders of the court, when he was superseded by his own consent and the consent of all the parties to this action by the appointment of Trask. Thereupon he presented a report and account of his receivership, with an application for its settlement and allowance and for his discharge. Notice of said application was duly served on all the parties to this action, and Alvord and Brown appeared by their attorneys at the hearing, and contested the account. After the hearing the court made an order reciting the fact that Crank had been duly appointed receiver of the property of the railway company in an action commenced by one Russell; that he took charge of the road and other property; that he operated the road under the orders of the court, and in so doing received and expended money and incurred a considerable indebtedness to the Puente Oil Company, the L. A. Oil Burning & Supply Company, and others, for necessary and proper expenses, for which indebtedness he had by direction of the court issued receiver's certificates. After other recitals, not material here, the account of the receiver, Crank, is approved, and he is directed to turn the property over to Trask, who is required to assume and pay any balance remaining due from Crank, including the indebtedness evidenced by said receiver's certificates, out of the net receipts from the operation of the road, and, if this shall prove insufficient, then out of the first proceeds of the sale of the property. In short, the order in effect and in express terms makes the indebtedness contracted by the receiver appointed in another action a lien prior and paramount to the liens of any and all of the mortgages, judgments, etc., which are in litigation in this action, and directs the immediate application of the net receipts of the road to its discharge so far as they will go. This order was made March 2, 1893. On July 13, 1893, a final decree of foreclosure was entered in the action directing the sale of the mortgaged property subject to the lien of the creditors of the receiver. On July 12th—one day before the entry of the final judgment, and four months after the making of the above-mentioned order—Alvord and Brown gave notice of their appeal from so much of said order as gives a prior lien to the Puente Oil Company and the L. A. Oil Burning & Supply Company for their claims against the receiver. Those corporations now move to dismiss the appeal upon the grounds: First, that the order is not appealable; and, second, that, if it is appealable, the notice was not served in time.

It is conceded by counsel for appellants that, unless the order appealed from is in effect a final judgment, the motion to dismiss must prevail upon both grounds. The only interlocutory or intermediate orders from which a separate appeal can be prosecuted are those enumerated in subdivision 3 of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and this order is not included in that enumeration. All other intermediate orders involving the merits or necessarily affecting the judgment are reviewable only on appeal from the judgment itself. Code Civil Proc. § 956. And even if this had been an order from which a separate appeal might be prosecuted, the notice of appeal, not having been served within 60 days after entry of the order, was too late. Id. § 939. The question to be decided is, therefore, as appellants concede, whether the order appealed from is in effect a final judgment. The statute which authorizes the appointment of a receiver in an action by a mortgagee for the foreclosure of the mortgage (Code Civil Proc. § 564) assumes that the rents and profits of the mortgaged property, pending the litigation, are, like the property itself, subject to the mortgage lien, and a part of the fund to which the creditor is entitled to resort for its satisfaction. But it does not follow from this that such rents and profits are, therefore, as much exempt from the control and disposition of the court pending the litigation as the property out of which they issue. The appointment of a receiver is for the benefit of the mortgagee, and is made upon his application. It carries with it, therefore, the necessarily implied condition that he is to be answerable for the legitimate costs of the receivership; that—as against him, at least—the receiver shall have a preferred lien upon the funds and estate which come into his hands, and that the rents and income of the property may be applied to the payment of the necessary and proper expenses of the receivership. The parties to the litigation, and all claimants of the fund, are secured against waste or misapplication by the personal liability of the receiver and the sureties on his official bond. To enforce this liability the court may compel the receiver to account for the funds that have come into his hands, and the order settling his account is reviewable in this court, on appeal from the judgment if made before judgment, or on appeal from the order if made after judgment. In Rochat v. Gee, 91 Cal. 355, 27 Pac. Rep. 670, we held that there could be no separate appeal from such an order when entered before final judgment; and so, in this case, there can be no separate appeal unless the order in question is essentially different from the order made in Rochat v. Gee. It is true that this order is unusual, and in some respects peculiar, but as it affects Alvord and Brown it is in no wise different from an ordinary settlement of a receiver's account. The fact that it allows certain claims against the receiver in advance of payment, instead of approving them after payment,—the more usual course,—can make no difference. The merits of such claims can be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, and, if their allowance is disapproved, the effect will be the same as if they had been first paid and afterwards approved in the settlement of the receiver's account. As to that part of the order which directs the payment of these contested claims out of the first proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property, its enforcement clearly depends upon the entry of a final decree directing such sale; and since there will be an opportunity to appeal from the judgment before any sale can be made, or any of its proceeds disposed of, no rights of the appellants can be prejudiced by denying them a separate appeal from the order if it can be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, as we have no doubt it can, for the final decree necessarily supersedes the order as to this matter, and leaves it of no force except in so far as its directions for the sale of the property and the application of its proceeds conform to the terms of the order. The appeal is dismissed.

REAY v. BUTLER et al. (No. 14,141.)

COSTS—TAXATION—EXECUTOR.

1. Where the supreme court reverses a judgment for intervener, and orders the intervention dismissed, the costs of the trial should be taxed, with those of the appeal, against intervener.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1031, provides that, in an action prosecuted or defended by an executor, costs may be recovered as in an action by and against a person prosecuting or defending in his own right; but such costs must, by the judgment, be made chargeable only on the estate represented, unless the court direct them to be paid by the executor personally, for mismanagement or bad faith. Held, that the section does not forbid the taxation of a memorandum of costs against an executor, but merely provides how they should be made chargeable by the judgment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Reay against Butler and others. From an order denying motion of Mabel Treadwell, executrix of J. P. Treadwell, intervener, to strike out cost bill filed by plaintiff, she appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Goodfellow, for appellant. J. B. Mhoon and W. W. Foote, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from an order of the superior court, by Mabel Treadwell, executrix of the will of J. P. Treadwell, deceased, denying appellant's motion to strike out (or, in the alternative, to retax) a cost bill filed by plaintiff. In 1866 the plaintiff, Reay, commenced an action of ejectment against Butler and Owens to recover the possession of a tract of "outside lands" known as "Speck Ranch." J. P. Treadwell, appellant's testator, filed an intervention in said action, alleging, in substance, that he was the owner and in possession of said ranch; that the defendants, Owens and Butler, were his servants and employes, merely; that they were in collusion with the plaintiff; and that the action was commenced and was being prosecuted for the fraudulent purpose of tricking him out of the possession of his property upon legal process. Whereupon he prayed that the plaintiff be enjoined from prosecuting said action, and that the intervener's title be quieted, etc. The plaintiff, Reay, answered the intervener's complaint, denying all the material allegations thereof. The court ruled that the issues raised by the intervention and answer should be first tried, and a trial of said issues was had by the court without a jury, which resulted in findings and a judgment in favor of said intervener. From that judgment the plaintiff appealed to this court. Here the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to strike out the intervention, so that a trial might be had by a jury, if not waived, of the issues raised by the complaint and answer. The representative of the intervener, who died after the action was commenced, was allowed to defend in the name of the defendants. The intervener died in 1884, after the appeal from the judgment in his favor had been taken and perfected, and while it was pending in this court. Appellant was substituted as respondent here in place of said deceased. The remittitur was filed in the superior court on September 27, 1886, and two days thereafter plaintiff, Reay, filed his memorandum of costs, including those incurred on the trial of the issues raised by said intervention and answer, together with the costs of his appeal from the judgment rendered therein. It was that bill of costs that appellant moved to strike out or have retaxed, and this appeal is from the order denying her said motion.

If the original intervener were alive, we think it quite clear that he would be liable for the costs of the trial of the issues raised by his intervention and answer. If this court, in reversing the judgment, had ordered a new trial of those issues, the costs of the first trial would be taxable against the party against whom judgment was rendered on the new trial. Ex parte Burrill, 24 Cal.

350. But in the case at bar no new trial was ordered, and none could be had, of the issues between the intervener and the plaintiff. The judgment dismissing the intervention, which this court directed the superior court to enter against the intervener, was to be a final judgment, which completely disposed of his intervention, and the prevailing party was entitled to have his costs taxed.

Appellant, however, contends that the costs should not have been taxed against her, because she was not in the case until it was in this court on appeal, and that she was substituted for the deceased respondent, as his executrix, and cites section 1031, of the Code of Civil Procedure in support of that contention. That section reads as follows: "In an action prosecuted or defended by an executor, administrator, trustee of express trust, or a person expressly authorized by a statute, costs may be recovered as in action by and against a person prosecuting or defending in his own right; but such costs must by the judgment be made chargeable only upon the estate, fund or party represented, unless the court directs the same to be paid by the plaintiff or defendant, personally, for mismanagement or bad faith in the action or defense,"—while the respondent contends that under section 1509 of the Code of Civil Procedure the appellant is individually liable for the costs of the action in the first instance, but that she may be allowed the same in her account as executrix, unless it appears that the suit in which the costs were taxed was defended without just cause, and that this is a matter for the exclusive determination of the probate court settling such account. In the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary to determine whether the judgment should have been in the form prescribed by section 1031, above cited, or under section 1509 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1031 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as we construe it, does not forbid the taxation of a memorandum of costs against an executor in an action prosecuted or defended by him, but provides that such costs must, by the judgment, be made chargeable only upon the estate, unless the court, for a certain specified reason, directs the same to be paid by such executor. There is no judgment of the court before us, and we do not know that the court has not, by its judgment, made the costs chargeable upon the estate of appellant's testator. The taxation of the memorandum of costs would not prevent the court from directing in the judgment for costs that the same be chargeable upon the estate of appellant's testator. The refusal to strike out the memorandum of costs, or to retax them, does not determine the form of the judgment, or that it will not be or was not in exact accordance with the contention of appellant upon this point. If, in fact, it was not, and appellant felt aggrieved thereby, her remedy was an appeal from the judgment. The views we have reached upon the merits make it unnecessary to again consider the motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal. It is a matter of very grave doubt whether the case of Muir v. Galloway, 61 Cal. 498, was correctly decided, in so far as it holds that the superior court may, by the entry of two or more orders, (the first or any order or orders preceding the last expiring on Sunday,) extend the period of time within which any of the acts mentioned in section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure may be performed for a longer period than authorized by that section, if only one order of extension is made. We do not, however, undertake at this time to definitely pass upon this, and the question may be regarded as an open one. No sufficient ground appearing for the reversal of the order appealed from, it must be affirmed.

GILL v. DUNHAM et al. 4 Cal. Unrep. 220
(No. 18,145.)
(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1893.)
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS —ASSESSMENTS—ASSIGNMENT—PLEADING.
1. Act March 14, 1889, amending Act March 18, 1885, in relation to improvement of streets, provides (section 3) that before ordering improvements the council shall pass a resolution of intention, which shall be "published and posted for two days in the manner prescribed by section 34." The latter section provides that resolutions required to be published shall be published in a newspaper, etc.: provided, however, that in case there is no newspaper they shall be posted and kept posted for the same time as required for publication. Held, that a resolution which is published need not also be posted.

2. Though acts which the statute requires to be performed before making a public improvement are conditions precedent to the power to levy a tax on the property owners, only a substantial compliance with the statute is required; and the assessment is not vitiated by want of technicality of expression, or precision of statement as to the work, which does not affect the essential object in view.

3. Under Acts 1889, p. 159, relating to public improvements, and providing that plans and specifications shall be furnished to the city council, if required by it, by the city engineer, but not specifying the mode of requiring them, the fact that they were prepared by the engineer, and were on file, and approved by the council, is sufficient evidence of their authenticity.

4. Where all the members of the council were present at a special meeting, except one, and a resolution was adopted unanimously, there is no error in admitting testimony of the clerk of the council that he served a proper notice of the meeting on all the members, the notice not having been entered of record.

5. In an action by an assignee to enforce an assessment for a public improvement, which was against a certain lot, but to an unknown owner, the fact that the assignment, which describes the lot, also states that the assessment was to a certain person as owner, does not render it inadmissible, as the name of the alleged owner may be rejected as surplusage.

6. The lien of an assessment for a public improvement is merely an incident of the demand, and passes with an assignment thereof.

7. The fact that evidence is introduced to contradict a fact alleged in the complaint is immaterial, where the fact is not denied in the answer, as there is no issue on the question.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by T. A. Gill against S. Dunham and another to foreclose a lien for a street assessment. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Louitt, Woods & Levinsky, for appellants. J. M. Kile and J. A. Plummer, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to foreclose a lien for street assessment in the city of Stockton. The plaintiff had judgment as prayed for in his complaint, from which judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants prosecute this appeal.

A demurrer was interposed by defendants to the complaint upon the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and upon the further ground that the complaint is uncertain, in that it fails to show that R. R. Ramsbottom ever reassigned to plaintiff his interest in the amount assessed against the land in the complaint described. The complaint avers that the resolution of intention to perform the work in question was duly published in the Stockton Daily Independent, a newspaper printed, published, and circulated at said city of Stockton, etc., and further avers that it was posted conspicuously on or near the council chamber door of the said council of said city of Stockton, and remained so posted for two days consecutively, etc. The resolution of intention was passed by the said council of the city of Stockton on the 14th of October, 1889, and subsequent to the passage of the act of March 14, 1889, amendatory of the act of March 18, 1885, entitled "An act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys," etc. The question presented by the demurrer relates to the necessity of posting the resolution of intention or notice thereof in three public places in the city. Section 2 of the amendatory act amends section 3 of the act of 1885, and reads, so far as applicable to the question in hand, as follows: "Sec. 3. Before ordering any work done or improvements made, which is authorized by section 2 of this act, the city council shall pass a resolution of intention which shall be published and posted for two days in the manner prescribed by section 34 of this act." Section 34 reads as follows: "Fourth: The notices, resolutions, orders or other matter required to be published by the provisions of this act and of the act of which this is amendatory shall be published in a daily newspaper in cities where such there is, and, where there is no daily newspaper, in a semi-weekly or weekly newspaper, to be designated by the council of such city, as often as the same is issued, and no other statute shall govern or be applicable to the publications herein provided for; provided, however, that in case there is no daily, semi-weekly or weekly newspaper printed or circulated in any such city, then such notices, resolutions, orders or other matters as are herein required to be published in a newspaper, shall be posted and kept posted for the same length of time as required herein for the publication of the same in a daily, semi-weekly or weekly newspaper, in three of the most public places in such city," etc. This section would seem to imply that notices and resolutions are to be published where there is a newspaper in which to publish them, and, when so published, posting becomes unnecessary, and that the posting referred to in the section is only required where no newspaper is published. If the contention of appellants is correct, and the resolution of intention is required to be posted in all cases, then, under section 34, it would be necessary to post it twice in those instances where there is no newspaper published or circulated in the city. We can scarcely conceive that this result was intended by the legislature, and are of opinion that under section 34 the notice or resolution in question, when duly published in the newspaper, was not required to be posted.

The assignment from plaintiff, Gill, to Ramsbottom, and the reassignment by the latter to the former, as averred in the complaint, are sufficient to reinvest plaintiff with the right to collect, to the money collected, and to its incident,—the lien sought to be declared and enforced in this action. Hence, we are of opinion the demurrer was properly overruled.

It is next objected by appellants that the work provided for in the resolution of intention is not identical with that subsequently ordered done, while that included in the bid of plaintiff, and for which the contract was awarded to him, differs from both. The resolution of intention, among other things, provided for cross walks laid at the intersection of Church, Sonora, and Lafayette streets; culverts constructed at the east side of the intersection of Church street. The resolution ordering the work done called for cross walks laid as follows: "One on each of the north, west, and south sides of the intersection of Church street, and one on each of the four sides of the intersection of Sonora street and Lafayette street, and a combined culvert and cross walk on the east side of the intersection of Church street." The bid of plaintiff for the performance of the work included 11 new cross walks and 1 culvert, but did not mention specially a combined cross walk and culvert. The resolution ordering the work follows substantially the resolution of intention. The 11 cross walks, and the combined culvert and cross walk, so called,—by which we understand a culvert, the top of which was to serve as a cross walk,—constitute the 12 cross walks spoken of elsewhere, and involve a substantial specification, as in the resolution of intention and resolution for performance of work so required. It is conceded that, where the statute requires a series of acts to be performed before the owners of the property are properly chargeable with the tax, such acts are conditions precedent to the exercise of the power to levy the tax, and all the requirements of the statute must be complied with, or the tax cannot be collected. But, while this is admitted, it is a substantial compliance with the provisions of the law which is required; and, so that such substantial compliance is had, a mere want of technicality of expression or precision of statement which does not affect the essential object in view will not vitiate the proceedings. The award to the contractor by the city council seems to have been regular, and in consonance with the resolution, and was the authority to the superintendent of streets, under which he, in his official capacity, entered into the contract; and the contract entered into between the superintendent of streets and plaintiff was for the work described in the resolution ordering the work, which is deemed sufficient.

It is next contended that the plans and specifications introduced in evidence were not prepared by the order of, or under the direction of, the said council of the city, and were not authenticated as being the work of the city surveyor of said city, or under such direction, and were therefore improperly admitted in evidence. The specifications, as offered in evidence, are indorsed as follows: "Plans and specifications for grading, graveling, laying cross walks and culvert on Aurora street, Nov. 25, 1889. Approved and adopted as submitted and read. [Signed] C. A. Campbell, City Clerk." The third section of the statute (St. 1889, p. 159) provides that "plans and specifications and careful estimates of the cost and expenses thereof shall be furnished to said city council, if required by it, by the city engineer of said city." G. A. Atherton, who was called as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff, testified that he was the city surveyor of the city of Stockton, and that he prepared the plans and specifications for this work. The statute does not, in terms, specify the mode by which the city surveyor or engineer shall be required to furnish the plans and specifications for work, nor does it, in terms, require such plans and specifications in all cases, but only "if required by it," (the city council.) The fact that the plans and specifications were prepared by the city engineer, were on file, and were approved by the city council, is sufficient evidence of their authenticity.

The time for completion of work under the contract was extended by resolution of the city council, passed at a special meeting called for that purpose, at which meeting one member of the council, to wit, the president thereof, was not present. Notice of the meeting, specifying the time, place, and object thereof, was served upon each member of the board by the clerk, but such notice was not entered of record. Objection was made at the trial to proof of the service of the notice otherwise than by record evidence, and to the ruling of the court permitting such proof. Exception was taken, and the action of the court is assigned as error. The record of the meeting shows that all the members of the city council were present, except Lehe, the president, and that the resolution extending the time for plaintiff to perform his contract was adopted by the unanimous vote of all the members present. Under these circumstances, there was no error in admitting the evidence of C. A. Campbell, clerk of the council, to prove that he served notice of the meeting, specifying the time of meeting, and the object thereof, upon each and every member of the city council. San Luis Obispo County v. White, 91 Cal. 432, 24 Pac. Rep. 864, and 27 Pac. Rep. 756.

The next point made by appellants relates to the record of the warrant which was recorded and issued to T. A. Gill, plaintiff herein, October 17, 1890, and under the law was to be returned and recorded within 30 days thereafter, and during which time the demand for the payment of assessments listed thereon is required to be made. The complaint avers the issuing and recording of the warrant, with the assessment and diagram attached, and their delivery to plaintiff, the demand thereafter of payment of the sum specified in the warrant as assessed against the lot in question, and that defendant has not paid any part thereof, and that thereafter, within 30 days from the date of said warrant, the same was duly returned to the said street superintendent, with the return indorsed thereon, verified by oath, stating the name and character of the demand made, etc., as required by the statute; that thereupon the said street superintendent duly recorded the said return so made by the said warrant in the margin of the record of said warrant, etc. These allegations are not denied by the answer. It follows that the contention of appellants that the demand was made after the return of the warrant is one not in issue in the court below, and upon which no question could properly arise. There was, it is true, testimony introduced tending to show a mistake in the date of the filing of the return, and that, while it purported to have been filed and recorded on the day of its issue, such return was in fact recorded on November 15, 1890. This, however, was of no importance, for the reason, as before stated, there was no issue on that question.

The plaintiff herein, on January 15, 1890, assigned the contract for the performance of the work in question to Robert Ramsbottom. To show a retransfer from the latter to plaintiff, a reassignment from Ramsbottom to plaintiff was offered in evidence, which, so far as material here, is in the following language: "I hereby assign to said T. A. Gill all my right and interest in and to the amounts assessed to S. Dunham, for street work, against lots 1, 3, 5, 13, 14, in block 259, east of Center street, in the city of Stockton, and all my right to collect the said amounts so assessed against said Dunham, and all my right to proceed against the said Dunham for the collection of said amounts." The introduction of this instrument in evidence was objected to by defendants upon the ground that it does not, upon its face, purport to be an assignment of any cause of action or right of lien against the property described herein, but simply a right to collect certain amounts assessed against said Dunham, and that there are no amounts assessed against said Dunham, and that his name does not appear in the official proceedings herein. Lot No. 1 in block No. 259, east of Center street, in said city of Stockton, referred to in the assignment, is the lot upon which the lien is sought to be foreclosed in this action. It was assessed to "unknown owner," and the name of S. Dunham does not appear in the assessment. It is averred, however, in the complaint, and admitted by the answer, that said Dunham was and is in fact the owner thereof. The name of S. Dunham may be treated as surplusage, and the assignment sufficiently identifies the claim or demand sought to be assigned in the instrument. It would then read as an assignment in and to the amounts assessed for street work against lot 1, etc., in block 259. As the only object is to identify the subject-matter embraced within the assignment, the identification is sufficient, whether the name S. Dunham be retained or rejected. The lien was but an incident of the demand, and passed with its assignment.

The motion for nonsuit was properly denied. There was evidence tending to sustain, on the part of the plaintiff, all the issues in the case.

Upon the question of the fulfillment of the contract in the doing of the work, the testimony was conflicting, and the finding of the court, in consonance with the allegations of the complaint, is amply supported by the evidence. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MCDONALD v. CONNIEFF et al. (No. 15,085.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1893.)
STREET ASSESSMENTS — ENFORCING LIENS — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. St. 1889, p. 157, § 7, subd. 8, provides that "where any work * * * is done on either or both sides of the center line of any street for one block or less, and further work opposite to the work of the same class already done is ordered to be done to complete the unimproved portion of said street, the assessment to cover the total expense of said work so ordered shall be made upon the lots or portions of the lots only fronting the portions of the work so ordered." Held, that where a street was ordered to be paved for one block, where not already so paved, the assessment was properly made on those lots, only, on which the work done abutted.

2. St. 1889, p. 166, provides that a diagram shall be attached to the assessment, "exhibiting each street on which any work has been done, and showing the relative location of each lot to the work done, numbered to correspond with the numbers in the assessments, and showing the number of feet fronting, or number of lots assessed for said work." Held, that the diagram need not show on what portion of the street the work was done.

3. The provision of the act of 1889 which makes a street assessment prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceeding is not a special or local law, within the constitutional provision that the legislature shall not pass special or local laws "regulating the practice of courts of justice."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by John W. McDonald against Michael Conniff and others to enforce the lien of a street assessment. There was a judgment in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Horace W. Philbrook, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Action to foreclose a lien of a street assessment in the city and county of San Francisco. At the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence the assessment, diagram, warrant, certificate of engineer, with the affidavit of demand and nonpayment indorsed upon the warrant, to the introduction of which the defendants objected upon the grounds "that the same were immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, because the assessment is void on its face, as only a part of the lots on Tenth street, between Folsom and Harrison streets, were assessed; and also that the diagram did not show on which side of Tenth street, or what particular part of Tenth street, the work for which the assessment was made, or the relative location of the lot of defendant Conniff assessed to the work done, or any part thereof; also, because no foundation had been laid for introducing the diagrams, or any of them, offered, no prior proceeding having been shown, authorizing the assessment, diagram, warrant, or certificate, or any of them; also, because the item in the assessment of $25.-83 engineering is unauthorized and illegal." The court sustained the objection, and excluded the evidence. Judgment of nonsuit was thereupon entered, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom.

1. Section 2 of the act under which the proceedings were had (St. 1889, p. 157) authorizes the city council to order the improvement of "the whole or any portion, either in length or width," of the streets of the city; and in subdivision 11 of section 7 the council is authorized, in its order for any of the work mentioned in the act, "to except therefrom any of said work already done upon the street to the official grade." Subdivision 8 of section 7 of the act provides that "where any work * * * is done on either or both sides of the center line of any street for one block or less, and further work opposite to the work of the same class already done is ordered to be done to complete the unimproved portion of said street, the assessment to cover the total expense of said work so ordered shall be made upon the lots or portions of the lots only fronting the portions of the work so ordered." It thus appears that authority is given to the city council, in certain cases, to order the improvement of only a portion of a street lying between two main street crossings, and that such improvement may be confined to a portion of the street upon one side of its middle line, and also that, when only such portion of a street is to be improved, the assessment therefor must be upon only the lots which front the portions of the work ordered. In the present case the improvement ordered by the supervisors, and for which the assessment was made, was "that granite curbs be laid on Tenth street, between Folsom and Harrison streets, where not already laid; that the roadway thereof be paved with basalt blocks where not already so paved; and that granite curbs and plank sidewalks be laid on angular corners of the intersection of Sheridan and Tenth streets, and that granite cross-walks be laid across said intersection." It was for the supervisors to determine what portion of Tenth street they would order improved, and if, in fact, prior to the passing of the resolution of intention, any portion of the street had been so improved, it was the duty of the superintendent to make the assessment for the work done under the contract upon only the lots "fronting upon the work so ordered," and to exclude therefrom the lots "fronting upon said excepted work already done." If the superintendent, in making such assessment, included lots which ought not to have been assessed, or failed to include those which should have been assessed, the remedy of the party aggrieved was by an appeal to the supervisors for a correction of the assessment. Inasmuch, therefore, as there are instances in which an assessment is authorized to be made upon only a portion of the lots fronting upon a street on which an improvement has been ordered, it cannot be said that the assessment in question is void upon its face.

2. The objection that the diagram does not show "on which side of Tenth street or what particular part of Tenth street the work for which the assessment was made," is not clear. The grammatical construction of the objection is that the diagram does not show the work for which the assessment was made, and it is sufficient to say that there is no requirement in the statute that the "work" shall be shown or even designated upon the diagram; but, if it be construed as an objection that the diagram does not show upon what portion of Tenth street the work was done, it may also be said that the statute does not make this requirement. The provision of the statute is that a diagram shall be attached to the assessment, "exhibiting each street on which any work has been done, and showing the relative location of each lot to the work done, numbered to correspond with the numbers in the assessments, and showing the number of feet fronting, or number of lots assessed for said work contracted for and performed." The diagram is only auxiliary to the assessment, and is intended to be merely a map exhibiting "each street" upon which the work has been done, and not the particular portion of the street in which the work was done. The requirement that it shall show "the relative location of each lot assessed to the work done" is satisfied if it shows their location in relation to the "exhibited" street upon which the work was done. Taken in connection with the description of the work for which the assessment was made, it can then be seen from an inspection whether any of the lots assessed are so located as to be liable for any part of the expense of the work, and if, for any reason, a particular lot ought not to have been assessed for that work, the error can be corrected upon application to the proper tribunal. The diagram is not intrinsically invalid unless the lots shown thereon are so located that they could not, under any circumstances, be made liable for a portion of the expense of the work. It is not essential to the validity of an assessment that the lots assessed should front upon the entire portion of the street exhibited upon the diagram. In the case of an assessment for work done upon main street crossings, or at the termination of one street in another, the street crossing or the termination is required to be exhibited on the diagram, while the lots to be assessed front upon portions of the streets on which none of the work was done, and the diagram is to show their relative location to the work done, by showing that they are within the quarter blocks or territory liable to be assessed. The diagram in the present case sufficiently complies with the statute. It exhibits Tenth street as the street upon which the work was done, and it also delineates the several lots assessed, and shows that each of the lots assessed fronts upon Tenth street, and that its location is within the territory liable to be assessed for work done upon Tenth street.

3. The statute makes the assessment, with the other documents offered by the plaintiff, prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment, and of the prior proceedings and acts of the superintendent of streets and city council, upon which it is based, and it was therefore not necessary to offer any evidence of these prior proceedings as the foundation for introducing these documents. It is competent for the legislature to prescribe rules of evidence for the trial of actions, and statutes which make a document prima facie evidence of the regularity of official proceedings in reference thereto, or which cast the burden of proof in an issue upon either party to the action, are within the constitutional power of the legislature. Cooley, Const. Lim. 450. Neither does this provision of the statute contravene the provision of the constitution prohibiting the legislature from passing special or local laws "regulating the practice of courts of justice." It is not necessary that a law shall affect all the people of the state in order that it may be general, or that a statute concerning procedure shall be applicable to every action that may be brought in the courts of the state. A statute which affects all the individuals of a class is a general law, while one which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special. A statute regulating the rights of married women, or which affects all mining corporations, or confers rights upon municipal corporations of a certain class, or places restrictions upon all foreign corporations, is a general law. City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. Rep. 604; In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 316, 28 Pac. Rep. 272, 675; Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. St. 348; Land Co. v. Soper, 39 Iowa, 112; In re New York El. R. Co., 70 N. Y. 350. The provision under consideration is neither a local nor a special law. It is applicable to all actions for the foreclosure of street-assessment liens, and is in force in all parts of the state. That the legislature may prescribe different rules of procedure, as well of pleading as of evidence, for different actions, is illustrated by what it has done in defining the form of pleading upon judgments and in other special actions, in requiring the pleadings in forcible entry and detainer to be verified, in denying a divorce upon the mere default of the defendant, in making a tax deed prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings prior to its issuance, and in requiring a different form of proof for the execution of a will from that of any other written instrument, as well as in numerous other instances.

4. The objection to an item for engineering is evidently the result of an oversight. Section 8 of the act under consideration requires the superintendent to include "any incidental expenses" in the assessment to be made by him. Section 34 provides that the city and county surveyor shall do the surveying and "other engineering work necessary to be done," and that his compensation therefor shall be included in the term "incidental expenses." Upon the face of the assessment, it must be assumed that the engineering work was done, and that the amount included therefor is correct. The court, therefore, erred in excluding the evidence, and for this error its judgment is reversed.

GRUNWALD et al. v. FREESE. (No. 15,-

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)
EXPERT EVIDENCE — RELEASE — FOREIGN DEBT—DOMESTIC VALUE.

1. Testimony as to the quality of old wire rope sold by sample, that the outer wires were broken into short pieces; that the rope was "rotten, and a little broken, instead of being as the sample;" that much of it was "broken, rusty, and rotten,"—relates to facts open to common observation, and not requiring expert knowledge.

2. Merchants and clerks of merchants in a foreign country who deal in a certain article are competent to testify as to the market value of the article in such foreign country.

3. A release of a cause of action is not available unless it is specially pleaded.

4. A debt contracted in a foreign country is payable in the currency of that country, and therefore, where the creditor sues in the United States, he is entitled to recover such sum in money of the United States as equals the debt in the foreign country when it was payable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Fritz Grunwald and Otto Munch, partners under the firm name of H. C. Morf & Co., against William Freese. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

SEARLS, C. This appeal is prosecuted by the defendant from a final judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and comes up on a bill of exceptions. The action was brought by plaintiffs, factors and commission merchants at Yokohama and Hiogo, in the empire of Japan, to recover from the defendant, a merchant, in the city and county of San Francisco, $4,999.60 Mexican dollars, of the value of $4,149.67 gold coin of the United States, a balance due on a mutual, open, and current account, with interest, etc. For some time prior to 1888, defendant had shipped from San Francisco to plaintiffs in Japan, for sale by them as his factors in the Japanese market, merchandise of various kinds, and plaintiffs had also shipped Japanese goods to defendant, for sale by him in like manner, and for their account in San Francisco. On July 10, 1888, defendant wrote to plaintiffs that he could buy in San Francisco a large amount of old cable rope after it was laid aside by the cable railroad companies, and sent a sample of the rope, asking plaintiffs to notify him by return mail what they could do with the article in Japan; what quotations they could make per picul (133½ lbs.) in Mexican dollars, and about how many tons they could dispose of per month. Defendant also inquired if the plaintiffs would authorize him to draw on them, against consignments, for an advance of say $10 gold per ton of 2,240 lbs., F. O. B., (free on board,) San Francisco, 90 days' sight draft, etc. Plaintiffs responded by letter under date of August 16, 1888, saying: "The article in condition like sample is very salable here, only the thickness is not suitable. People here want 13, W. G. No. 8-13, (Birmingham wire gauge,) whereas your samples, according to B. W. G., measure only 16. People here do not wish wire which is thicker than No. 8 or thinner than No. 13," but that between those numbers it was desirable, and a considerable business could be done in it. Plaintiffs inclosed in a letter samples of No. 8 and No. 13 wire. They also added that, subject to defendant's approval, they had contracted for 50 tons according to his sample, but only of sizes 8 to 13, at the gross sale price of $2.50 per picul. Plaintiffs consented that defendant should draw upon them for 75 per cent. advances of the probable net proceeds, freight and insurance paid there, (San Francisco.) They further stated that, "in the event the first shipment turns out satisfactory to our customers, we will easily be able to sell 20 tons per month." Defendant denied that he owed plaintiffs anything upon the account, and by way of counterclaim sets out that he was induced by the representations of the plaintiffs to purchase and ship to them large quantities of wire cable; that he was misled by them; that they failed to notify him promptly that the cable could not be sold; and in apt terms stated facts which, if true, constituted a defense to the action. It seems that the wire rope was sent to Japan, not to be used in its then condition for mechanical purposes, but to be disassembled, and the wires contained therein to be worked into nails for tea chests, frames for umbrellas, etc. For these purposes the sizes of the wires were required to be from No. 8 to No. 13, inclusive. The two wires sent by letter to the defendant, before mentioned, were samples as to size, and not as to quality, being Nos. 8 and 13, respectively.

In rebuttal of the case made by defendant in support of his counterclaim, plaintiffs read in evidence the depositions of Ernest Becker, Theodore Bunge, Henry Lucas, Johann F. Crosser, and Fritz Grunwald, taken upon interrogatories in Japan. These witnesses all testified to a greater or less extent in regard to the condition or appearance of the wire rope forwarded by the defendant, its relative condition with the sample forwarded by defendant to the plaintiffs, the market value of goods like the sample and the market value of the goods actually shipped. Cross interrogatories were waived by defendant's counsel, and no objections seem to have been made until the reading of the depositions at the trial, when counsel for defendant moved to strike out from each deposition, severally, certain portions thereof, viz. those portions relating to the quality of the wire rope shipped, and its comparative merits as relating to the samples; also that relating to the market price for this class of goods in Japan, upon the ground that it did not appear that the witness knew the market prices, or that he was sufficiently expert to give an intelligent opinion upon any of these matters. The objections to the several depositions were similar in language, and all based upon the same grounds. The witnesses were all either commission merchants in Japan or clerks in the employ of such merchants.

The question of value, or market value, is mainly one of fact, but is usually defined as a matter of opinion gathered from facts, and as was said by Story, J., in Alfonso v. U. S., 2 Story, 421: "We must necessarily resort to opinions of merchants and others conversant in trade for market prices or values of the goods." Wharton, in his work on Evidence, (section 447,) lays down the rule as follows: "Two essentials, therefore, exist to a proper estimate of value: First, a knowledge of the intrinsic properties of the thing; second, a knowledge of the state of the markets. As to such intrinsic properties as are occult and out of the range of common observers, experts are required to testify; as to properties which are cognizable by an observer of ordinary business sagacity, being familiar with the thing, such an observer is permitted to testify." So far as the condition of the wire rope was concerned, it was a question to be determined, not from its occult qualities, but from its appearance, and from the effect produced upon it by handling; that its outer wires were broken up into short pieces; that "the goods sent were rotten, and a little broken, instead of being as the sample;" that much of it was "broken, rusty, and rotten," or, as another witness said, "in trying to undo the coils the whole thing broke to pieces, into small pieces from half an inch to two inches long." These were facts to be gleaned from observation, and were stated as such, facts open to every observer, and not requiring expert knowledge, and whether they were experts on the subject or were not is of little importance. The question of the value of the rope in the market was one upon which merchants dealing in the article in question were competent to speak. As before stated, the witnesses were all commission merchants in Japan, or were in the employ of such merchants; and it may be added that it appeared directly or incidentally that all of them who testified as to the value of the commodity were or had been engaged in the sale of the article, or were in the employ of those thus engaged. They all showed themselves to possess more or less knowledge of the efforts made by plaintiffs to dispose of the goods, and had themselves either sold, attempted to sell, or were familiar with the efforts made to sell the goods. Under such circumstances, while the depositions are not as full and satisfactory as could be wished in showing knowledge and experience on the part of some of the witnesses, I do not regard the errors assigned in the rulings upon the depositions as sufficiently established to warrant a reversal.

If, however, we are wrong in the foregoing conclusion, and should hold that the depositions were, so far as objected to, improperly admitted, it is not perceived that the court below would have been justified in reducing the amount of plaintiffs' recovery. The balance of account in favor of plaintiffs was not only proven, but at the trial, in answer to a question by the court, "defendant's counsel announced that there was no contest on the account at all, but as an offset defendant relied on plaintiffs' assurance of disposing of the rope as sent, and that defendant had suffered loss far greater than the amount plaintiffs claimed against defendant by reason of plaintiffs' failure to do what was agreed in the matter, and that defendant asked no affirmative relief, but charged that he was damaged in the sum of $5,000 in round numbers." The case as made by the defendant failed to establish a counterclaim, and hence the evidence objected to, which tended to show why consigned goods brought no higher price, and were not sooner disposed of, was unnecessary.

There is a further contention that plaintiffs released defendant from the balance due them. On the 3d day of June, 1889, the plaintiffs, in a letter to defendant, used the following language: "Naturally you know very well that we will never consent to proceed against you legally. Our hope to reduce our loss in this transaction, if possible, to a minimum limits itself, therefore, that after the settlement of your different transactions the loss will be small," etc. Conceding, without deciding, that the quoted clause of plaintiffs' letter amounted to a release, then it should have been specially pleaded. Moss v. Shear, 30 Cal. 468; Piercy v. Sabin, 10 Cal. 22; Coles v. Soulsby, 21 Cal. 47. There was no consideration for the promise, and therefore it did not amount to a covenant not to sue. Canal Co. v. Roach, 78 Cal. 552, 21 Pac. Rep. 304. It is apparent, however, that neither of the parties regarded the letter as amounting to a release. In the following December we find defendant writing to plaintiffs: "I refuse to participate in the loss caused by your fault and recommendations, with more than that already suffered, which amounts to nearly 30 per cent.," to which plaintiffs reply: "We hope soon to find the opportunity to dispose of the goods, and after a thorough inspection we shall consult with our Yokohama house as to what steps we shall take to compel you to the liquidation of this debt."

The account in Japan was kept, as appears, for convenience sake, in Mexican dollars. Plaintiffs aver that on the 7th day of August, 1890, there was due them $4,999.60 Mexican dollars, of the value of $4,149.67 gold coin; that on or about August 26, 1890, they submitted their account to defendant, and demanded payment, and pray judgment for such sum, with interest. It was stipulated that Mexican dollars were at the date of the commencement of the suit worth 83 cents. At the date of the demand (August 23, 1890) they were worth 93½ cents, and at the date of trial 74 to 75 cents. The court gave judgment for the value at the date of suit brought. This was more favorable to defendant than it would have been to have computed the value of the foreign silver at the date of the demand of payment, but not as advantageous to him as a computation at the date of trial. A debt contracted in a foreign country, in the absence of a contrary understanding, is payable there, and in the legal currency of that country. The parties having, by common consent, expressed their account in Mexican dollars, and the debt having been contracted in Japan, it stands on the same footing as though Mexican dollars were the currency of that country. It follows that, the debt not having been paid in Japan, and plaintiffs being compelled to sue here, they were entitled to judgment for such sum in our currency or money as was equivalent to their claim in Japan. Benners v. Clemens, 58 Pa. St. 24; Cash v. Kennion, 11 Ves. 315. In the language of the chancellor in the case last cited: "Where a man agrees to pay £100 in London upon the 1st of January, he ought to have that sum there upon that day. If he fails in that contract, wherever the creditor sues him the law of that country ought to give him just as much as he would have had if the contract had been performed." Apply the principle thus enunciated to this case, and we may say that, had defendant met his contract when it was due,—that is to say, when demand was made upon him,—plaintiffs would have had $4,999.67 Mexican dollars of the value of 93½ cents each, or their equivalent in our currency; a sum in excess of that which the court awarded them. If a man contracts to deliver wheat on a given day, and fails to do so, the measure of damages is the market price of the article on that day; and in principle it is difficult to see why the rule should not hold good when he agrees to deliver Mexican dollars, or other foreign money, which, in the absence of some positive law of our own, is but a commodity. There are authorities which hold that the rate of exchange at the date of the trial is the criterion by which to determine the amount of the judgment, but in most instances the only question evidently relates to the mere expense of effecting the exchange, or, in other words, the cost of transmitting the funds, for that is what it amounts to,—cases in which, so far as appears, the question of depreciation or appreciation of the currency in which the debt was payable cut no figure. In Benners v. Clemens, supra, cited by appellant, the recovery was had upon the basis of the value of legal tenders at the date of the presentation of the account. To discuss the question satisfactorily would require more space than can reasonably be accorded to it, and I content myself with saying that my conclusion, drawn from a perusal of the conflicting authorities, prompts the declaration that if any error was committed by the court below it was in favor of the defendant, and hence that he is not in a position to complain. The evidence supports the findings, and the latter cover the issues in the case, and the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

PEARSON v. DROBAZ FISHING CO. et al.
(No. 14,985.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

VACATING JUDGMENT—INADVERTENCE OF COUNSEL.

On an application to set aside a judgment it appeared that the cause was the seventh on the calendar for the day on which it was set for trial. Defendant's counsel was not present on that day, as he had business in another court, but he had some one to answer "Ready" when the case was called, supposing that it would not be reached for trial on that day. It was reached, however, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Defendant's counsel was informed of the judgment on the same day, and at once requested plaintiff's counsel to consent that it should be set aside, which was refused, whereupon he immediately made an affidavit of the facts, and procured an order to show cause. Held, that the judgment should have been set aside for excusable inadvertence of counsel.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Edward Pearson against the Drobaz Fishing Company and others. There was an order refusing to set aside, on the ground of excusable inadvertence of counsel, a judgment theretofore entered in favor of plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. Ruef, E. Parker, and Haines & Ward, for appellants. Henry H. Davis, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff commenced this action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to recover the sum of $382.25 alleged to be due for work, labor, and services rendered and performed by him for defendants at their special instance and request. The complaint was filed July 15, 1891, and on the 25th of the same month the defendants answered thereto, denying that the defendants, or any of them, were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum named, or in any other sum, for work, labor, and services, or otherwise, or that the said sum, or any portion thereof, was due and payable from defendants, or either of them, to the plaintiff. Shortly after the answer was filed the case was placed on the trial calendar of department 6 of the court, and on October 6, 1891, it stood for trial as No. 7 on that calendar. When the calendar was called on the morning of the last-named day the defendants' attorney, thinking the case would not be reached for trial until the next day, and having business in another court, was not present, but he had some one answer for him, to the call of the case, "Ready." The six cases preceding this one were at once continued or otherwise disposed of, and thereupon, in the absence of the defendants and their attorney, the plaintiff was called and examined as a witness in his own behalf, and the case was then submitted, and judgment given in his favor for the amount demanded in the complaint. The attorney for defendants was informed of the trial and judgment about 11 o'clock of the same day, and at about the same hour called upon the attorney for the plaintiff, and requested him to stipulate that the judgment should be set aside, which request was refused, and thereupon he at once made an affidavit setting out facts to show that the judgment was taken against defendants through their mistake, inadvertence, and surprise. On this affidavit an order was made by the court on the afternoon of the day the judgment was rendered, requiring the plaintiff to show cause on the 9th day of the same month why the judgment should not be set aside, and the defendants allowed to present evidence in support of the issues raised by their answer. At the time appointed the motion to set aside the judgment came on regularly for hearing before the court, and was submitted upon affidavits filed by the respective parties and the judgment roll in the case. The plaintiff, in his affidavit, stated that some of his witnesses were seafaring men, and had left the city of San Francisco, and that their whereabouts was unknown, and that to the best of his belief he would not be able to find them again. Thereafter, on December 1, 1891, the court denied the motion, and the defendants excepted to the ruling. From the judgment entered and the order denying their motion the defendants appeal.

It is contended in support of the appeal that upon the facts shown the court below should have set aside the judgment, and that its refusal to do so was not a proper exercise of its discretion, and we think it must be so held. There was undoubtedly negligence upon the part of the attorney for the defendants, but it was not inexcusable negligence, under the circumstances here appearing. It is apparent that the defendants were not seeking to delay the trial. The application to set aside the judgment was made almost immediately after its rendition, and in all probability before it was actually entered. The plaintiff had notice of the fact that the application would be made. This being so, his affidavit, made two days thereafter, that his witnesses had gone, and their whereabouts were unknown, ought not to have been deemed a sufficient answer to the motion. Courts are established for the purpose of administering justice in controversies between parties, and this result will be generally best attained by a trial upon the merits, and neither of the parties should be deprived of such a trial except when guilty of inexcusable negligence, and we do not think such a degree of negligence appears here. "Applications of this character," said this court in Watson v. Railroad Co., 41 Cal. 20, in passing upon an appeal from an order opening a default, "are addressed to the discretion—the legal discretion—of the court in which the default has occurred, and should be disposed of by it as substantial justice may seem to require. Each case must be determined by its own peculiar facts, for perhaps no two cases will be found to present the same circumstances for consideration. As a general rule, however, in cases where, as here, the application is made so immediately after default entered as that no considerable delay to the plaintiff is to be occasioned by permitting a defense on the merits, the court ought to incline to relieve. The exercise of the mere discretion of the court ought to tend, in a reasonable degree, at least, to bring about a judgment on the very merits of the case; and when the circumstances are such as to lead the court to hesitate upon the motion to open the default, it is better, as a general rule, that the doubt should be resolved in favor of the application. In connection with its allowance, terms and conditions ought generally to be imposed upon the party in default, which, of course, should be more or less severe, as the particular circumstances would seem to warrant." The application of the rule thus stated to the facts of this case must result in the reversal of the order. Judgment and order reversed.

SMITH v. SMITH et al. (No. 15,158.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)
HOMESTEAD OF WIDOW—LIMITATION ON VALUE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1465, which provides that, in case no homestead has been selected by a married man in his lifetime, the court must select, set apart, and cause to be recorded, a homestead for the use of the surviving wife, the court may set apart one exceeding $5,000 in value.

2. Where the value of an estate is $85,000 in excess of debts and expenses of administration, it is not an abuse of discretion to set apart as a homestead to the surviving wife, out of the community property, premises worth $10,000, which were occupied by deceased and his family in his lifetime, and which are indivisible.

Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Proceeding for the allotment of homestead to Catherine S. Smith, widow of E. O. Smith, deceased. From an order setting apart premises of the value of $10,000 as such homestead, J. D. Smith and others appeal. Affirmed.

S. A. Barker, for appellants. Arthur Rodgers and C. D. Wright, for respondent. S. F. Leib, amicus curiae.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by certain heirs at law of E. O. Smith, deceased, from a probate order setting aside certain premises as a homestead to the respondent, who is the widow of the deceased. The facts necessary to be stated are these: The said premises consist of an ordinary city lot in the city of San Jose. It has a dwelling house on it which covers nearly the entire lot, and in this house the deceased and the respondent resided for several years next before the death of the former. The said premises were community property, and there was never any declaration of homestead upon the same made by either of the spouses. The deceased purchased the lot for $4,500, paying $2,000 in cash and giving his note for $2,500; the deed remaining in escrow, to be delivered upon payment of the note. The note was not paid nor the deed delivered during the lifetime of the deceased, but afterwards the respondent procured a third person to take an assignment of the note, and thereupon the deed was delivered and recorded, said third person now holding the note. There are no minor heirs of the deceased. The premises are now of the value of $10,000, and the balance of the estate, above all debts and expenses of administration, is worth $75,000, with a rental of $5,100 per annum. The lot could not be divided without destroying its character and use as a home, and is, as the court finds, "indivisible." There is no other land of the estate suitable for a homestead. The contest is entirely between the respondent and certain heirs at law of the deceased, the rights of creditors not being in any way involved.

Appellants contend that upon the foregoing facts the court had no power to set aside said premises to the widow as a homestead, because their value exceeds $5,000, and contend that the court should have directed that the said premises be sold, and that out of the proceeds respondent be given $5,000, and no more, in "lieu of a homestead." The position of appellants is not tenable. Section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in a case like the one at bar the court "must select, designate, and set apart, and cause to be recorded, a homestead for the use" of the surviving wife. This "homestead" which is to be selected, recorded, etc., is not $5,000, nor any other sum of money. It is a place of residence; it is land,—real property. When a homestead has been selected by the parties, under the provisions of the Civil Code, circumstances may arise under which they will not be able to continue to hold it. Notably is this so when the rights of a creditor are involved, and the Code provides the machinery by which, in such a case, the creditor may have the homestead sold, and the proceeds in excess of $5,000 applied to his debt. But this provision has nothing to do with the creation of a homestead, even when it is established by the parties under the Civil Code. In case of a probate homestead under the Code of Civil Procedure, the court, in the first instance, creates the homestead, and the question there is, not what shall be done with an existing homestead, but how shall an original homestead be created by the court, and out of what property shall it be carved? And there are no existing provisions of the Code which restrain the court from selecting premises as a homestead because they exceed in value $5,000. There were such provisions in sections 1480-1484, Code Civil Proc., but those sections were repealed in 1874. If the contention of appellants be sound, then in the case at bar the court could not possibly have set aside a homestead to respondent, because there was no other land of the estate out of which a homestead could have been carved, and the premises which the court did set aside were indivisible. The appeal here is from the order setting aside the homestead, and under what provision of the Code could the court have ordered $5,000 paid to respondent, either out of the general assets of the estate, or out of the proceeds of the sale of any particular piece of property, before any homestead had been created?

If appellants' view be right, then collateral kin might drive a widow and minor children out of their home because it happened to be worth a little more than $5,000. But we think that in Estate of Walkerly, 81 Cal. 579, 22 Pac. Rep. 888, the point made by appellants was clearly decided against them. In that case the court set aside a homestead worth $18,000, and appellants there made the contention insisted on by appellants here, viz. "that the court could not set apart a probate homestead greater in value than five thousand dollars." The court, however, affirmed the order, holding that "the provisions of the Code authorizing a homestead to be set aside to the family of a decedent, where none has been selected before his death, contains no limitation as to the value of such homestead." The court further held that such an order will not be disturbed by this court on account of the value of the homestead, unless there had been an abuse of discretion; and, considering the condition and value of the estate in the case at bar, we see no abuse of discretion in the order appealed from. The fact that in that case the homestead was selected from the separate property of the deceased does not in any way distinguish it from the case at bar. The same principle and reasoning equally apply to both cases. See, also, Estate of Schmidt, 94 Cal. 334, 29 Pac. Rep. 714. We see nothing in the point that the provisions of the Code as above construed are unconstitutional. Order affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; DE HAVEN, J.; FITZGERALD, J.; HARRISON, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I concur. If the question were a new one, I would dissent.

LEVI et al. v. DIMMICK et al. (No. 15,007.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 7, 1893.)

WARRANTY—ACTION FOR BREACH—EVIDENCE.

Where the contract for the sale of a quantity of dates, of two kinds, makes no distinction as to the respective values of the two kinds, evidence is incompetent, in an action for the breach of warranty of the merchantable condition of one of the kinds, as furnished, to show that such kind was not worth as much as the other kind.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by H. Levi & Co. against Dimmick and others to recover damages for the breach of an express warranty of the merchantable character of certain dates sold by defendants to plaintiffs. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rhodes & Barstow, for appellants. Wal. J. Tuska, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover damages for the breach of an express warranty of the merchantable character of certain dates sold by defendants to plaintiffs, and paid for by plaintiffs at the contract price. Judgment went for plaintiffs, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. We have considered carefully the oral and written arguments of counsel, and are satisfied that no reversible error was committed by the trial court. There is only one point which we think necessary to be specially noticed, and that is, whether or not the court erred in excluding testimony offered by appellants to show a difference in value between two kinds of dates which are mentioned in a contract between the parties. On November 29, 1890, the parties entered into a written contract as follows: "Sold this day to Messrs. H. Levi & Co., San Francisco, 4,000 boxes dates, more or less, consisting of Hallowee ^{AAA}_B and Sairs, at six (6) cents per pound, delivered at the wharf at San Francisco in merchantable condition. Terms, cash on delivery. The above lot being such as are received and on the way, consigned to order of G. H. Ballou & Co. 2,500 boxes, more or less, for immediate delivery, and balance, 1,500 boxes, more or less, for delivery on arrival at San Francisco. It being understood that 1,500 are now afloat. If, by unavoidable accident, balance of 1,500 do not arrive, sale of 1,500 boxes is void. Weights to be estimated at actual gross weight, less uniform tare of 10 lbs. each box." This document was signed by appellants and respondents. It will be observed that in this contract no distinction is made between Hallowee dates and Sair dates, either as to the price or as to the quantity of either kind sold; and, if it be true that there is a marked difference in the value of the two kinds of dates, then the case illustrates the carelessness with which contracts are frequently made, and how difficult questions are thrust upon courts by the looseness with which business is often done. It appears that 2,500 boxes of dates were delivered at the time the said contract was made, and paid for by respondents at the said price of six cents per pound, and that they were Hallowee dates. These 2,500 boxes were in merchantable condition, and with reference to them no trouble occurred. But afterwards, on December 11, 1890, the 1,500 boxes mentioned in said contract having arrived, appellants delivered them to respondents, and respondents paid appellants for them at the said contract price of six cents per pound. These 1,500 boxes were, as a matter of fact, Sair dates, and they proved to be not merchantable. The court gave judgment for the difference between the contract price of these last 1,500—six cents per pound—and their actual value as unmerchantable goods. But the appellants, having averred in their answer that Sair dates were worth less than Hallowees, asked of one or two of their witnesses the questions: "Was there any real difference at that time in the value, in this market, between Hallowees and Sair dates?" and "What is the difference between Hallowees and Sairs?" and the court sustained objections to these questions, and we think that the objections were properly sustained. These questions amounted to nothing more or less than an attempt to show that goods sold and delivered under an express contract, at a stated price, were not worth as much as the price at which they were expressly sold, which, of course, a seller is estopped from doing, except under peculiar circumstances, not here existing. As before observed, the contract, on its face, makes no difference between Hallowee and Sair dates, either as to the amount of either or the price of either. But, as to the aggregate amount of dates, it is clear that the contract was severable as to the first lot, of 2,500 boxes, and the second lot, of 1,500 boxes. The first lot was delivered and paid for at the price named, and that ended the contract as to that lot. As to the second lot, of 1,500 boxes, the sale and delivery were contingent. They were subject to the uncertainties of a sea voyage, and it was provided that if they did not arrive the "sale of 1,500 boxes is void." If they had not arrived the transaction would have closed with the sale of the 2,500 boxes, and the payment for them by respondents at the contract price; but, as they did arrive, payment had to be made for them by respondents at the contract price of six cents per pound, and such payment was made. If the 1,500 boxes had been lost at sea, could appellants have recovered anything of respondents upon the theory that the 2,500 boxes of Hallowees already delivered and paid for were worth more than the contract price? We think, therefore, that the contract price of the 1,500 boxes was six cents per pound, and that it was not admissible for appellants to show that these dates, in a merchantable condition, were worth less. The case which counsel for appellants put, of the sale of a lot of cattle at $15 per head, —some of them worth $500 apiece, and others worth only $5,—would need conditions not suggested by them before it would be an apt illustration of their contention in the case at bar. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ROEBLING SONS CO. v. BEAR VALLEY IRRIGATION CO. et al. (No. 19,025.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 7, 1893.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—EVIDENCE.

Where in an action to enforce a lien for material furnished for the construction of a telephone line there is no evidence that such material was used in the construction of the particular line against which the lien was sought to be enforced, a judgment for plaintiff will be set aside on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by the Roebling Sons Company against the Bear Valley Irrigation Company and others to enforce a mechanic's lien. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant irrigation company appeals. Reversed.

Geo. E. Harpham, for appellants. Henry Goodcell, Jr., and Zue G. Peck, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the defendant the Bear Valley Irrigation Company from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

It is averred in the complaint that appellants' grantor employed one Stebbins to construct a certain telephone line, and that respondent sold and delivered to said Stebbins certain materials which were intended to be used in, and were used in, the construction of said line. The court found these averments of the complaint to be true. It is doubtful if the evidence supports the finding that plaintiff sold the materials to Stebbins; the evidence being strongly to the point that they were sold to a company called the "Elec. Construction Co." But, waiving that point, it is clear that there was no sufficient evidence to support the finding that the materials were sold "to be used in the construction of said telephone line."

The only evidence upon the subject is to be found in the testimony of the witness Sime, a salesman in the employ of respondent, and who testified: "I can't tell where the goods were to be used; I don't know." He also testified that the goods were of the kind that are used "for the construction of a telegraph line," and, upon further question, said that they would answer for either a telegraph or telephone line. But he nowhere testified that they were sold for the purpose of being used in the construction of the particular telephone line against which the lien is sought to be enforced. In order to enforce the lien of a material man against a building or structure, "the materials must not only have been used in the construction of the building, but they must have been, by the express terms of the contract, furnished for the particular building on which the lien is claimed." Bottomly v. Rector, 2 Cal. 92; Houghton v. Blake, 5 Cal. 240; Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307; Cohn v. Wright, 89 Cal. 86, 26 Pac. Rep. 643.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded.

SAM YUEN v. McMANN et al. (No. 14,480.) (Supreme Court of California. Sept. 9, 1893.)

SHERIFF'S BOND—ACTION ON—PLEADING—UNLAWFUL DETAINER—STAY BOND—SHERIFF'S FEES—EVIDENCE.

1. A complaint alleged that defendant M., as principal, and the other defendants as sureties, executed the official bond of defendant M. as sheriff, by which defendants became bound for the faithful performance by M. of his duties as sheriff, and then proceeded to state the act of M. as sheriff for which damages were sought. Held, that the complaint stated a cause of action against the sureties.

2. In an action on a sheriff's bond for detention, after the giving of an appeal and stay bond, of property levied on under execution, a letter of the sheriff offering to return part only of the property was properly excluded.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. § 946, declaring the effect of perfecting an appeal and giving an undertaking to stay execution of the judgment to be not only "to stay all further proceedings in the court below on the judgment or order appealed from," but to also "release from levy property levied upon under execution issued upon such judgment," it is the duty of the sheriff to release all property levied on immediately on notice of the perfection of the appeal and the filing of the stay bond, without regard to the sufficiency of the sureties.

4. In order to justify a sheriff in retaining for his fees, after notice of the filing of the stay bond, property levied on, he should, on demand for the property, state the amount of his fees, and offer to return the property on payment thereof.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. C. Van Fleet, Judge.

Action by Sam Yuen against McMann and others on the bond of McMann as sheriff. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. B. Mitchell, for appellants. James F. Smith and A. N. Drown, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action against McMann, as sheriff, and his codefendants, as sureties upon his official bond, to recover possession of certain personal property taken by him as such sheriff under a writ of possession issued upon a judgment obtained by one Lee Chuck against Quan Wo Chong in an action of unlawful detainer, and by which writ the said defendant was commanded to place the plaintiff in that action in possession of the premises described therein, and to make out of the personal property of plaintiff's assignors the amount of damages recovered by the judgment upon which the writ was issued. The plaintiff brought this action as the assignee of Quan Wo Chong & Co., and recovered judgment for the return of the property, or its value, $5,000, and for the further sum of $1,000 damages for its detention, and for interest and costs of suit. The defendants appeal.

1. The motion to dismiss the action as to the sureties was properly denied. They were not improperly joined with their codefendant, McMann, as defendants in the action, as claimed by them, and, if they were, the objection was waived by the failure to demur to the complaint upon this ground. The complaint was also sufficient in its statement of facts to show a cause of action against the said defendants as sureties upon the official bond of their codefendant, McMann. The complaint alleges that defendant McMann as principal and the other defendants as sureties made and delivered the official bond of the defendant McMann, as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, by which the defendants became jointly and severally bound for the faithful performance by the said McMann of his official duties as such sheriff, and then proceeds to state the alleged wrongful act of McMann in his official capacity for which damages are sought in this action. This is sufficient to show a liability upon the part of the defendants, as sureties upon such official bond, for by the terms of such bond they became liable to respond in damages in a sum not exceeding the amount specified therein for any wrongful act or default of their principal in his official capacity. Pol. Code, §§ 960, 961; Van Pelt v. Littler, 14 Cal. 194. The case of Ghiradelli v. Bourland, 32 Cal. 585, cited by defendants, is not opposed to our conclusion upon this point. The complaint in that case did not directly aver that the defendants sued therein as sureties signed or joined in the execution of any official bond, nor did it show the terms of such bond, and it was not distinctly alleged that the defendant, sued therein as sheriff, ever executed any official bond as sheriff. The distinction between that case and the present is, we think, quite obvious.

2. The letter of defendant McMann, dated December 31, 1888, was properly excluded, as it did not contain an offer to restore to plaintiffs all the personal property sued for in the action, and the same may be said of the subsequent letter of January 4, 1889, also excluded. In addition to this, it seems that the plaintiff did, upon January 5, 1889, accept from defendant McMann the property offered to be returned in this last letter and at the time named therein, so that, in any view, its exclusion could not possibly have injured the defendants.

3. The evidence on the part of plaintiff tended to show, among other matters, that on December 22, 1888, his assignors appealed from the judgment against them in the action for unlawful detainer before referred to, and, in addition to the usual bond on appeal, filed an undertaking in an amount fixed by the court in which the judgment was rendered sufficient to stay the execution thereof in all its parts, and the defendant McMann was on that day served with notice of such appeal, and of the filing of the undertaking to stay the execution of the judgment. The defendant McMann had already made a levy upon certain personal property of the defendants in that action, and was engaged in placing the plaintiff therein in possession of the premises recovered at the time he received this notice. The evidence further tended to show that at the time of giving to defendant McMann notice of the filing of the bond on appeal, and of the undertaking to stay the execution of the judgment appealed from, the assignors of plaintiff demanded that he should release from levy the personal property taken upon the execution, and he refused to do so, giving as a reason that they were not entitled to such release until the sureties upon the undertaking staying execution of the judgment had justified. At this time, however, no exception had been taken to such sureties by the plaintiff in that action. In this state of the evidence the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: "It was not the duty of the defendant McMann to deliver the personal property so levied upon, even in the event that his fees had been paid him, upon the mere filing of the stay bond on appeal to the supreme court. It was his duty to hold the property until the sufficiency of the sureties on that appeal bond had been approved by the court, or all questions as to their sufficiency had been waived by stipulation, or in some other proper manner, between the parties to the suit." The court refused to give this instruction, but, on the contrary, instructed the jury as follows: "I instruct you that the sufficiency or insufficiency of the sureties on the bond on appeal from the judgment rendered * * * in no way affected the question of the perfection of the appeal so far as these defendants are concerned, and that upon the filing and service of the notice of appeal from said judgment, and the filing of the bond on appeal and stay bond on appeal from said judgment, the appeal thereupon became perfected, notwithstanding any question as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the sureties, and it was the duty of the defendant William McMann to release all property from levy under the writ of possession issued upon said judgment, immediately upon notice to him of the perfection of said appeal." The defendants now claim that the court erred in refusing to give the instruction requested by them, and in giving the foregoing instruction; and it is argued in support of this proposition that when a levy has been made under an execution the only effect of filing an undertaking to stay the execution of the judgment is to stay the sale of the property, but that the officer executing the writ may retain possession of such property until the sureties on the undertaking have justified, or their justification has been waived, or the time within which to except to their sufficiency has expired. But the language of section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure cannot be construed so as to sustain this position of defendants. By that section the declared effect of perfecting an appeal and giving an undertaking to stay the execution of the judgment appealed from is not only "to stay all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from," but to also "release from levy property levied upon under execution issued upon such judgment." In view of this explicit language of the statute it must be held that the court below correctly instructed the jury upon this point. It was no concern of the defendant whether or not the sureties upon such undertaking, or others in their place, would be able to justify if exception should be taken to their sufficiency, and we understand that this was so substantially held by this court in the case of Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong, 81 Cal. 222, 22 Pac. Rep. 594. In that case the court said: "Section 946 provides that, whenever an appeal is perfected, as provided in the preceding sections, proceedings shall be stayed. This must be so without reference to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the sureties. It is only necessary, under these sections, that a bond be given at the proper time, and in due form. If the sureties are insufficient pecuniarily, the opposite party has his remedy under section 948. He may, as provided in that section, except to the sureties at any time within thirty days after the filing of the undertaking, and, unless they or other sureties justify as therein provided, within thirty days after the appellant has been served with notice of such exceptions, execution of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from is no longer stayed." It is true that in that case the question before the court was whether or not the filing of such an undertaking was, before justification of the sureties thereon, sufficient to prevent the execution of that part of the judgment directing that the plaintiff therein be put in possession of certain premises awarded to him by the judgment. But there is no difference in principle between that case and this, the question in both being whether the undertaking to stay execution shall have attached to it the effect declared by the statute before the sureties thereon have justified; and if, prior to such justification, it is sufficient to prevent a plaintiff from proceeding to levy upon property for the purpose of securing satisfaction of his judgment, or from proceeding to obtain possession of property awarded to him by such judgment, no reason is perceived why it should not be equally effective to require a release of property actually levied upon under execution issued upon such judgment. Its operation in the one case would work no greater hardship upon a judgment creditor than in the other.

4. We do not think the court erred in any of its rulings in the admission or exclusion of evidence, or in modifying the first instruction requested by defendants so as to read: "The defendant McMann, at the time of the levy of the writ of possession in Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong, was the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. He levied upon a portion of the personal property contained in the premises described in the amended complaint, and caused it to be conveyed to a warehouse. He was entitled to hold such property so levied upon as security for his fees and necessary disbursements in levying upon said property, excepting keepers' fees, in removing it to a warehouse, in storing it there, and insuring it, and taking proper care of it. He could not be required to surrender said property until his fees and expenses, as aforesaid, were paid, if the same were demanded by him." The defendants object to that part of the instruction as given which denied to the sheriff the right to hold the property until the payment of keepers' fees, and the last sentence, which, in effect, told the jury that the sheriff could not justify his retention of the property, because of the nonpayment of his fees and disbursements, unless he had demanded the payment of such fees and disbursements. The law was correctly declared in the instruction as given, and was particularly applicable to the facts of the case as presented by the evidence. Whatever expense was incurred for keepers' fees accrued while the defendant McMann was unlawfully retaining it in his possession, if the property in respect to which such expense was incurred was ever levied upon; and it is clear that, until notified of the amount of the fees for which the sheriff claimed the right to retain the property, no tender thereof could have been made. It was the duty of the sheriff to inform the plaintiff of the amount of his fees, and, when demand for the property was made, to offer to return the same upon payment of such fees. Judgment and order affirmed.

ORD et al. v. ORD et al. (No. 14,369.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1893.)

DEED—CONDITIONAL DELIVERY—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF GRANTOR.

1. For the purpose of defeating a deed, statements of the grantor, made some time after its execution, that he delivered it only conditionally, are not admissible, as a grantor cannot thus disparage his deed by declarations in his own interest.

2. Such declarations are also inadmissible as hearsay.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCann, Judge.

Ejectment by George W. M. Ord and others against William M. Ord and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

S. W. Holladay and E. B. Holladay, for appellants. Z. N. Goldsby, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, J. This is an action of ejectment. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiffs appeal therefrom, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial. It appears that in April, 1873, William Marcellus Ord, the common grantor of plaintiffs, and the defendant Anna E. Ord, conveyed by deed of gift to plaintiffs, who are the minor children of his brother, John S. Ord, certain property in Santa Cruz county, commonly known as the "Ord Rancho," and which contained about 160 acres, including the property in controversy. By the same deed he granted and confirmed to his sister Mrs. Holladay five acres of the above tract, but they are not involved in this action. This deed was delivered to Mrs. Holladay by her husband, S. W. Holladay, Esq., to whom it had been previously mailed by the grantor from Boston, Mass., on the 21st day of April, 1873, but it was not recorded until September 2, 1878. On April 6, 1877, William Marcellus Ord, theretofore a bachelor, intermarried with the defendant Anna E. Ord. On June 10, 1878, Mrs. Holladay informed Mrs. Ord of the deed executed by her husband to the minor children of his brother John. On June 17, 1878, William Marcellus Ord executed to his wife, the said Anna E. Ord, in consideration of love and affection and one dollar, a deed of the demanded premises, and on the same day it was duly recorded, at her request. At the time of the commencement of this action, March 16, 1880, Anna E. Ord was in possession of the property under the deed from her husband, who, it appears, died April 26, 1882, nearly seven years before this cause came on for trial. Upon these facts, it became a material question on the trial as to whether the grantor, by the delivery of the deed to Mrs. Holladay, intended that upon such delivery it should have the effect of passing the title absolutely to the plaintiffs, or whether it was merely a conditional delivery, with the right reserved in the grantor to control or recall it. Upon the trial, Anna E. Ord was called as a witness for defendants, and upon this point testified "that she was present at the Pacific Ocean House at the time testified to by Mrs. Holladay, when the latter told her that William M. Ord did not own the land; that she did not ask Mrs. Holladay any questions upon receiving such information from her, because she thought it did not concern her; that on the same evening, or the next day, she told her husband, William M. Ord, that his sister had said that he did not own the land. Witness was asked by her counsel what William M. Ord said to her upon receiving such information, to which question plaintiffs objected, as being incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and hearsay. The objection was overruled, and plaintiffs duly excepted, and witness answered, under plaintiffs' said objection, that, upon hearing it, said William M. Ord was angry, and explained that he had made the deed to the children when he was going away to Boston, and delivered it to his sister provisionally, and left it in his trunk at Holladay's house, and that on his return he had demanded it of her, (Mrs. Holladay,) but she would not give it back to him." This witness further testified that the deceased, upon a subsequent occasion, substantially repeated this statement. The object of this testimony was to show that the deed of April 18, 1873, did not operate as a conveyance of the property to plaintiffs, for the reason that it was never delivered to Mrs. Holladay, or to any one else, with any such intention. This testimony was clearly incompetent, for this or any other purpose—First, because it was hearsay; and, secondly, because a grantor will not be permitted to disparage his deed by declarations made or acts done by him, in his own interest, subsequent to its execution; and such was held to be the rule in Bury v. Young, 33 Pac. Rep. 339, (recently decided by this court,) in which it was said that "a grantor cannot be allowed to undermine his deed either by words or acts. His declarations and acts made and done, in his own interest, months after the deed was delivered, are not admissible as indicating his intentions in delivering the deed." But subsequent declarations and acts by the grantor for the purpose of sustaining his deed, as was the case in Dean v. Parker, 88 Cal. 283, 26 Pac. Rep. 91, are admissible to show his intention in delivering it. From these views it follows that the court erred in admitting this testimony against plaintiffs' objection, for which the judgment and order must be reversed; and, as the testimony on another trial may not be the same, it is unnecessary to consider the other questions discussed by counsel. Let the judgment and order be reversed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment, and in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice FITZGERALD. The language of the opinion in Dean v. Parker, 88 Cal. 283, 26 Pac. Rep. 91, is broad enough to justify the admission of the evidence held to be inadmissible in this case. But in Dean v. Parker the declarations considered were those of the grantor, sustaining his deed, and the attention of the court was not directly called to the admissibility of subsequent declarations of a grantor, denying the fact of the previous delivery of a deed, and the general and somewhat inaccurate language of that opinion, to the effect that, upon a question relating to the delivery of a deed, any declaration made by a grantor at the time of the alleged delivery, or subsequent thereto, would be relevant to the inquiry, must be considered with reference to the particular facts then before the court.

SMITH v. OCCIDENTAL & ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP CO. (No. 15,084.)

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY—PERSONAL INJURIES—RELEASE—WHEN BINDING—DANGEROUS PREMISES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action against a steamship company for personal injuries sustained by falling through the hatchway of defendant's vessel into the hold, it appeared that defendant negligently omitted to light the passageway; that plaintiff and other employees passed down a stairway to the hatchway; and that one man preceded plaintiff. The latter testified that he could not see the hatchway; that he tried to stand there, but the men pressed him from behind, and he fell in; and that there was room for the men to stand if it had been lighted. His conduct while on the vessel, and the extent of his knowledge of the danger by reason of his previous experience, did not clearly appear. Held, that the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was for the jury.

2. Where the facts constituting the defense of contributory negligence are so disconnected from the facts constituting defendant's negligence that it cannot be determined as a matter of law that the one was the cause or sequence of the other, their relation or dependence should be submitted to the jury.

3. Evidence that plaintiff had previously worked on the vessel, and had opportunity to learn the position of the hatchway, and that it was open on such occasions, was not conclusive that he had such knowledge.

4. The court properly refused to charge that the verdict must be for defendant if plaintiff knew, or could by ordinary care have learned, that it was defendant's custom to sometimes have the hatchway open and sometimes closed, when he would have occasion to descend the same in the course of his employment.

5. Defendant pleaded a release by plaintiff, but it did not appear that anything was ever said to him concerning a release by any one on behalf of defendant, and he testified he could not and did not read it when he signed it. An employee of defendant read it to plaintiff's wife, who could not read it, and she testified that from what he read, and from his explanation of it, she was led to believe it was simply a receipt, and that on her request plaintiff signed it. Such employee was a witness, but did not testify about reading the paper to plaintiff's wife. Held, that the court properly charged that plaintiff was not bound by the release unless he had knowledge of its contents or purport, or had the means of such knowledge.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Trout, Judge.

Action by Smith against the Occidental & Oriental Steamship Company for personal injuries caused by defendant's negligence while he was in its employ. From a judgment entered on the verdict of a jury in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Foshay Walker and Fred B. Lake, for appellant. J. D. Sullivan and Herbert Choyinski, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff, while employed as a stevedore upon the defendant's steamship Oceanic, on the 17th of November, 1889, fell through an open hatchway, breaking his leg, and sustaining other serious injuries, and brought this action to recover damages therefor, alleging that they were caused by the negligence of the defendant. The jury rendered a verdict in his favor for $3,000, and from the judgment thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

On the morning of that day the plaintiff, with several others, was directed by the foreman of the stevedoring work of the defendant to go down to the hold of the vessel for the purpose of stowing away a cargo of coal that was to be loaded from another vessel alongside. The hatchway on the main deck was closed, and the men were compelled to go forward and down to the steerage deck, and then along this deck about 25 feet to a stairway leading to the orlop deck, and, after going down these steps, go along the orlop deck to the hatchway, where there was a ladder leading to the hold. The foot of the steps to the orlop deck was about 10 feet from the coamings of the hatchway, and there were two or three stanchions between these steps and the hatchway. When the hatchway of the main deck was open, the light from above made it light on this deck, so that the opening and the ladder leading to the hold could be clearly seen, but on this morning that hatchway was closed, so that it was quite dark on the orlop deck. It was also customary, when the men were stowing coal in the hold, to have a lighted lamp hung near the hatchway, and it was the duty of the foreman of the gang to light this lamp upon reaching the place; but on this morning others went ahead of the foreman, and the lamp was not lighted until after the accident. The men went down the stairway to the orlop deck in single file, and, as each reached the foot of the steps, he passed along to make room for the others to descend. One man had gone into the hold, and another had commenced to light the lamp, but before it was lighted the plaintiff fell into the hold, a distance of about 20 feet, sustaining the injuries aforesaid. The testimony concerning the way in which the accident occurred was given by the plaintiff on cross-examination as follows: "Question. How did you come to fall down that hatchway, Mr. Smith? Answer. Because I was getting down on the orlop deck, and there were four or five of us; I don't know how many; and, of course, we had to keep getting that way, as they had to come down the ladder. The ladder was away, and the standee, (something of a bit of a ladder that they keep the freight from falling into the hold,) we had to get down on that, and, of course, I had to get further away from this man, and, of course, as I came here, they all were all here coming behind me, and down I go 20 feet into the hold. Q. Was there not room enough between the stairway leading to the orlop deck and where this hatchway was for the men to stand? A. They could if they could have seen it. I was trying to stand there, and I fell down. I could not see where it was. It was that dark you could not see your finger, and could not see nothing. If there had been a light I could have had room to stand." At the close of the testimony the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury to find a verdict in its favor, and in support of this request urges that it appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as to prevent his recovery.

1. When the facts are undisputed and clearly settled, contributory negligence is to be determined by the court as a matter of law, just as any other question of law depending upon a given state of facts, or as the judgment which is to be rendered upon a special verdict; and if at the close of the testimony in a case the facts shown by the evidence and the inferences therefrom which reasonable men would agree upon are clearly defined, it is the duty of the court, upon proper application therefor, if it shall be of the opinion that these facts establish contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, or do not, as a matter of law, constitute negligence on the part of the defendant, to grant a nonsuit, or direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, but "when the evidence is conflicting, or when reasonable men might differ as to the inferences which ought to be drawn from the undisputed evidence, the question of negligence or contributory negligence is not one of law, but of fact." Davies v. Steamship Co., 89

Cal. 286, 26 Pac. Rep. 827. Especially is this rule applicable when the negligence of the plaintiff depends upon conflicting evidence, or the credibility of witnesses, or a comparison of his conduct with that which may be assumed to be the conduct of an ordinary man, or results from a disregard of his knowledge of the surroundings, and that knowledge depends upon his opportunity to acquire it from experience. "Where the essential fact in a case is whether contributory negligence did or did not exist, and this depends upon the credibility of witnesses or inference from facts and circumstances about which honest and impartial men might differ, such a case should be submitted to the jury." Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 424. The proximity of one fact to another in a case, and their relation or sequence to each other, are essentially within the province of a jury to determine; and whenever the injury complained of is the result of a series of facts that are interlinked with or dependent upon each other, the certainty that the final act is the result of a prior one diminishes in proportion to the remoteness of the first act from the result, and the jury must determine whether the several acts constitute such a successive series, or are linked together so as to form one continuous whole, or whether they are so independent that the result cannot be said to be the natural consequence of the first. In Massachusetts and in New York, and in several other states, it is held that the plaintiff must show as a part of his right of action against the defendant that he himself exercised ordinary care, and that his own negligence did not cause or contribute to the injury sustained, and the reported opinions of courts in those states upon this proposition are apt to be misleading unless attention is given to the distinction between the rule there observed and that which is established in this state. In this state, in accordance with the weight of authority, (Shear. & R. Neg. §§ 107, 108,) as well as with the principles upon which the rule rests, it is established that it is sufficient for a plaintiff to show, in the first instance, that the injury resulted from the negligence of the defendant. Nehrbas v. Railroad Co., 62 Cal. 320; MacDougall v. Railroad Co., 63 Cal. 431; Magee v. Railroad Co., 78 Cal. 430, 21 Pac. Rep. 114. Whenever the burden of proof of any issue rests upon a party, the failure to make such proof necessitates a decision against him; and in those states in which it is held necessary for the plaintiff to show that he was himself without negligence and in the exercise of ordinary care, a nonsuit would be granted more frequently than where a different rule prevails. There may be such contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff as will defeat his right to recover, and it may happen that in presenting his own case he will show such facts as will establish that his own negligence so contributed to his injury as to prevent a recovery, and in such case the court will be authorized to grant a nonsuit. But where the contributory negligence of the plaintiff is an affirmative defense to be established by the defendant, it will not often happen that the facts presented by the plaintiff in the development of his case will be such as to justify the court in withdrawing the case from the jury. The contributory negligence of the plaintiff that will defeat his right to recover must be shown to be the proximate cause of the injury; and if the facts constituting this defense are so disconnected with the facts constituting the negligence of the defendant that they do not appear until after the presentation of the defendant's case, it will rarely occur that it can be determined as a matter of law that the one was the cause or sequence of the other, and, if not, their relation or dependence should be submitted to a jury. In the present case the conduct of the plaintiff while on the vessel was not distinctly before the jury, and the extent of his knowledge of the danger by reason of his previous experience was not clearly shown, and it was properly left to the jury to determine, not only the facts established by the evidence, but also the inferences to be drawn from those facts, and whether he had been negligent or not.

2. At the request of the defendant the court instructed the jury that if they should find from the evidence that the plaintiff was familiar with the location and position of the hatchway, or knew, or was informed, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have learned, that the hatchway through which he fell was open, a sufficient time before the accident to have avoided the same by the exercise of ordinary care, or if, after descending the ladder to the orlop deck, he did not exercise ordinary care in approaching the hatchway, they should render a verdict in favor of the defendant. The verdict in favor of the plaintiff establishes that the jury believed that neither of these propositions was sustained by the evidence, and, as the evidence on each of the propositions was conflicting, the determination of the jury upon its weight as well as its value is conclusive. The plaintiff himself testified that he was not familiar with the size or location of the hatchway; that, although he had been up and down this hatchway before, it had always been by a continuous trip from the hatchway on the main deck; that he had never before been down in the way he went at this time; that when the hatchway on the main deck was open it threw light upon the hatchway through which he fell, but on this morning the hatchways above the orlop deck were closed, and it was so dark that nothing could be seen there; that when a hatchway like this is open there are usually lights near it, or it is protected with rods or chains as a guard, but that upon this morning there were no guards to this hatch-way, and no light upon this deck. There was testimony in behalf of the defendant to the effect that when the men were directed to go on board the vessel they were told by the foreman that the hatchway was open, and to wait until the lights on that deck should be lighted before going down, but the plaintiff testified that he did not hear these instructions, and in this he was corroborated by others who were with him, and who testified that no such instructions were given. The testimony that the plaintiff had previously worked upon the steamer, and had had an opportunity to learn the position of the hatchway, and that it was open on such occasions, was not conclusive of such knowledge, but was to be considered by the jury in connection with the other evidence in the case. Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 424, 27 Pac. Rep. 306. Whether, under the circumstances, after he had descended to the orlop deck, and found it was so dark that he could not see, he was in the exercise of ordinary care in going from the foot of the ladder to the hatchway, considering that others were coming down from the steerage deck, and pressing him behind, and that those in front were advancing, one having gone to the hold in safety, was also to be considered by the jury in determining the question of his negligence, but was not itself conclusive thereof.

3. One of the defenses pleaded by the defendant was a release executed to it by the plaintiff, in consideration of its caring for him at the hospital until he should have sufficiently recovered to resume labor. Plaintiff, in the affidavit which he filed in reply to this averment, and also in the answer filed by him, admitted the signing of this release, but alleged that by reason of the pain and suffering consequent upon the injuries he had received he was incapacitated from attending to business, and ignorant of the contents of said instrument, and signed the same without knowing or understanding what he was doing, and that it was not his free and voluntary act. The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that, if they should find that the plaintiff did freely and voluntarily sign and deliver the release to the defendant, and that the defendant had complied with the conditions therein expressed, their verdict should be for the defendant. The court modified the instruction requested by adding thereto that they should also find that the plaintiff had knowledge of the contents of said paper, or its purport, or had the means of such knowledge, and gave it thus modified. To the refusal to give it as requested, and to the giving it as modified, the defendant excepted. We are of the opinion, however, that under the testimony given at the trial, the court was justified in making the modification. The general rule is that, when a person with the capacity of reading and understanding an instrument signs it, he is, in the absence of fraud and imposition, bound by its contents, and is estopped from saying that its provisions are contrary to his intentions or understanding; but it is also a general rule that the assent of a party to a contract is necessary in order that it be binding upon him, and that, if the circumstances of a transaction are such that he is not estopped from setting up his want of assent, he can be relieved from the effect of his signature if it can be made to appear that he did not in reality assent to it. Foster v. Mackinnon, L. R. 4 C. P. 704; Whitney v. Snyder, 2 Lans. 477; Selden v. Myers, 20 How. 506; Trambly v. Ricard, 130 Mass. 259; Freedley v. French, 154 Mass. 339, 28 N. E. Rep. 272. In the present instance the plaintiff's knowledge of the instrument which he signed was made one of the issues before the jury without any objection at the trial, and it was therefore proper for the court to submit that issue to the jury. It does not appear that anything was ever said to the plaintiff concerning a release of his claim by any one on behalf of the defendant, and the plaintiff testified that he could not read the instrument, and that he did not read it when he signed it. It had been prepared by one of the employes of the defendant for the purpose of procuring a release, and was given to the plaintiff's wife to procure its signature by her husband. She could not read it, nor could the person who gave it to her; but she testified that at her request it was read to her by Green, the defendant's timekeeper, and that from what he read, and his explanation of it to her, she was led to believe that it was simply a receipt, and upon her request her husband signed the paper without reading it. Although Green was a witness in the case, he did not testify about his reading the paper to Mrs. Smith, and, in the absence of any contradictory testimony, it must be assumed that the understanding which Mrs. Smith received from the paper was that which was given to her by his reading. The representations by Green to the plaintiff's wife must be considered as a representation by the defendant to the plaintiff, and the jury were authorized to find that the plaintiff did not understand the contents or purport of the instrument.

4. The request of the defendant that the court instruct the jury that their verdict must be in favor of the defendant, if they should find that the plaintiff knew, or could by ordinary care have learned, that it was the custom of the defendant sometimes to have the hatchway open and sometimes closed, when the plaintiff would have occasion to descend the same in the course of his employment, was properly refused. These facts, if they existed, were only proper to be considered by the jury in determining whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, but were not of themselves determinative of that issue.

5. The request of the defendant that special issues be submitted to the jury was addressed to the discretion of the court, and the refusal of the court to grant the request was not the subject of an exception. American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 360. The judgment and order are affirmed.

FRESHOUR, Road Overseer, v. HIHN.
(No. 14,941.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

HIGHWAYS—BOUNDARIES—OBSTRUCTION.

1. A pleading described a highway as 40 feet wide, commencing at a certain point named, and following the course and distance of a given line "to the line of average high tide to the bay of M." Held sufficient, the line described being presumed to be the center line, and not a side line, of the road, without direct averment to that effect.

2. Under Act March 31, 1876, § 52, declaring that roads used as public roads for the five years preceding the passage of the act are highways, the public user is the only thing to be considered, without regard to the owner's intention in permitting it.

3. Pol. Code, §§ 2731, 2732, 2734, provide that, if any highway "duly laid out and erected" is encroached on, the overseer may require the encroachment to be removed, by notice to the owner, specifying "the breadth of the highway," and the place and extent of the encroachment, and, if this is disregarded, he must sue to abate the nuisance, and, if successful, may recover a penalty of $10 a day therefor. Held, that said penalty could not be recovered for encroachment on a highway by user, never regularly laid out and recorded.

4. An ordinance of a board of supervisors directing their clerk to record a road as a highway must specify the width of the highway, and not merely its direction by the course and distance of a given line.

5. When the case was set for trial, plaintiff waived a jury, and defendant stated that, while he did not demand a jury, he did not expressly waive it. On the day set for trial a jury was in attendance, and the parties then announced that they had agreed to try the case without a jury. Plaintiff did not pay or become liable for any jury fees. Held, that he could not recover the jurors' attendance fees as costs.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCann, Judge.

Action by J. T. Freshour, road overseer of the Soquel road district, against F. A. Hihn, to abate a nuisance and recover a penalty therefor. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed in part.

Charles B. Younger and Edward R. Taylor, for appellant. W. T. Jeter, Julius Lee, and Carl E. Lindsay, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff is the road overseer of Soquel road district, in Santa Cruz county, and this action was commenced by him to have an obstruction placed by defendant in a public highway in that district abated as a nuisance, and also to recover from defendant the sum of $10 for every day the obstruction remained after he had received notice to remove it. The judgment of the superior court was in favor of plaintiff, and was to the effect that the obstruction complained of be abated as a nuisance, and that plaintiff recover from defendant, in addition to the costs of the action, the sum of $870, the penalty demanded in the complaint, because of defendant's failure to remove the obstruction. The defendant appeals.

1. The objection is made that the complaint is fatally defective in its description of the highway defendant is charged to have obstructed. The complaint alleges that the highway referred to is 40 feet wide, and that it commences at a certain point named, thence following the course and distance of a given line "to the line of average high tide to the bay of Monterey;" but it is not directly averred whether the land thus described is the center or one of the side lines of such road. We think this general description sufficient. When in describing the location of a road the width is given, and but one of its lines particularly described, as in the complaint here, the line so described by its course and distance will be deemed to refer to the center line of the road, in the absence of anything in other parts of the description tending to indicate a contrary intention.

2. The court below found "that the road mentioned and described in the complaint has been traveled and used as such by the public generally, as a route of travel for the ordinary uses and purposes of a public road or highway, for a period of more than twenty years continuously immediately preceding the 1st of May, 1890." This finding was within the issues made by the pleadings, and is a sufficient finding that the road in question was a public highway, under the provisions of section 52 of the act approved March 31, 1876, entitled "An act to establish and maintain public and private roads in the county of Santa Cruz," and which declares that "roads used as public roads, for a period of five years unobstructed, next preceding the passage of this act, are roads or highways within the meaning of this act." Under this statute, which defendant concedes is applicable to this case, the use of the road by the public for the period named, without any reference to the question whether the defendant, in permitting such use, intended thereby to dedicate the land used as a public highway, is the controlling fact upon which the right of the public to continue such use is made to rest. Bolger v. Foss, 65 Cal. 250, 3 Pac. Rep. 871; McRose v. Bottyer, 81 Cal. 125, 22 Pac. Rep. 393. Upon the question of fact thus found by the court below there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, and, under the rule which has been often declared here, the finding will not be disturbed by this court.

3. The most important question in the case relates to the right of the plaintiff to recover the penalty of $10 for each day the obstruction continued after defendant was notified to remove it. This right, if it exists at all, is given by sections 2731, 2732, and 2734 of the Political Code. Section 2731 provides: "If any highway duly laid out or erected is encroached upon by fences, buildings or otherwise, the road overseer of the district may orally, or in writing, require the encroachment to be removed from the highway." Section 2732 provides for the giving of notice to the person causing or owning the encroachment, which notice must specify "the breadth of the highway, the place and extent of the encroachment, and requiring him to remove the same within ten days." And by section 2734 it is provided that "if the encroachment is denied and the owner, occupant, or person controlling the matter or thing charged with being an encroachment refuses either to remove or permit the removal thereof, the road overseer must commence in the proper court an action to abate the same as a nuisance; and if he recovers judgment he may, in addition to having the same abated, recover ten dollars for every day such nuisance remained after notice, and also his costs in said action." The encroachment referred to in this last section is one upon such a highway as is described in the preceding section 2731, viz. a highway "duly laid out or erected." The words "duly laid out or erected," as there used, have reference to the formal and official action which the law enjoins upon those charged with the duty of establishing public highways; and a highway "duly laid out or erected," within the meaning of section 2731 of the Political Code, is one which has been established by the proper officers in the manner prescribed by law. By subdivision 2 of section 2643 of the Political Code it is made the duty of the boards of supervisors of the several counties to "cause to be recorded as highways such roads as have become such by use or abandonment to the public" within their respective counties; and, in our opinion, until so recorded, such a highway cannot be said to have been "duly laid out or erected," so as to authorize a recovery of the statutory penalty given by section 2734 of the Political Code. The only remedy which the public has for an obstruction in a highway which exists only by user is an action to remove the obstruction as a nuisance. Substantially the same conclusion was reached by the court of appeals of the state of New York in construing certain sections of the Revised Statutes of that state relating to penalties for the encroachment upon highways, and containing language very similar to that which is used in the above-mentioned sections of the Political Code. See Doughty v. Brill, *42 N. Y. 612; Talmage v. Hunting, 29 N. Y. 447. And it is not difficult to understand why the legislature deemed it proper to make this distinction in regard to the remedies allowed to the public for an encroachment between the case of an encroachment upon a highway established with deliberation and care by officers appointed for that purpose, and one upon a road not formally accepted and recorded, and existing only by reason of dedication or abandonment to the public. In the latter case the exact location of the highway, as well as the fact of its existence, is often a matter of doubt and honest dispute between the citizens and the public, and, until its location and existence have been definitely ascertained and determined in some appropriate mode, it would be unjust to subject the citizen to the extreme penalty given by section 2734 of the Political Code, and which is intended only for the willful encroachment upon a highway, the location and existence of which are matters of public record, and of which all persons must take notice. That it was not the intention to impose this penalty for the obstruction of a highway which is only such by user or abandonment to the public, but has not been recorded as a highway, is also apparent from section 2732 of the Political Code, which requires a notice "specifying the breadth of the highway" to be given to the person charged with the obstruction, before bringing an action to recover such penalty. The giving of the prescribed notice is essential to the right to maintain the action; but, unless the breadth of the highway has been established by some order or ordinance of the board of supervisors, it would not be possible for a road overseer to give the required notice "specifying the breadth of the highway." In the case of a highway by user or dedication, its width is limited by the extent of the actual user or dedication; and in recording such a road the board of supervisors cannot enlarge the actual boundaries of the road so used or dedicated. The board is simply authorized to make a record of the location of the road as it actually exists, for the purpose of perpetuating the evidence of the public right. As said by Bronson, J., in People v. Judges of Cortland Co., 24 Wend. 491: "Both the extent and the fact of the dedication depend on the user, and the public must take secundum formam doni." It follows from what has been said that the complaint here does not state facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the penalty recovered by the judgment in this action.

4. The court erred in admitting in evidence the ordinance of the board of supervisors directing the clerk of the board to record as a public highway "that certain road in Soquel road district * * * leading from the village of Soquel to the beach near the wharf of the steamship company." Assuming that this ordinance was meant to refer to the road in controversy here, it is void, because it does not state the width of the road, and describes it only by the course and distance of a given line. In addition to this, the complaint did not allege the encroachment to be upon a highway duly laid out or established by law.

5. In the memorandum of costs filed by plaintiff there was an item or charge of $49.70 for jury fees, and the defendant made a motion to have the same stricken out and disallowed. The motion was made before judgment, and was denied, and the order may therefore be reviewed on appeal from the judgment. Empire Gold Min. Co. v. Bonanza Gold Min. Co., 67 Cal. 406, 7 Pac. Rep. 810. It appears that when the case was set for trial the plaintiff waived a trial by jury, and the defendant stated that, while he did not demand a jury, he would not expressly waive the same. Upon the day fixed for the trial a jury was in attendance, and the bill of exceptions states that "the parties then announced that they had agreed to try the case without a jury; thereupon the court discharged the panel of jurors, and the case was tried by the court without a jury;" and that the plaintiff did not pay any jury fees, nor incur any liability therefor. Upon these facts the court erred in denying the motion of defendant. The plaintiff neither paid nor incurred any expense because of the attendance of the jury, and we are not aware of any law which entitles him to recover from defendant the amount of the attendance fees of such jurors.

Judgment and order reversed, with directions to the superior court to enter a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant, to the effect that the encroachment described in the complaint be abated as a nuisance, and that plaintiff have and recover from defendant, F. A. Hihn, his costs in the action, amounting to the sum of $167.

MARSHALL v. KEEFE. (No. 15,124.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)
CONTRACT OF SALE — MERCHANTABLE QUALITY OF GOODS.

The fact that part of a lot of potatoes contracted for as "merchantable" have "sprouted a little" does not necessarily show that they are unmerchantable, but, there being evidence that the lot in question were salable for table use or shipment, the question whether the purchaser was justified in refusing to receive them is for the jury.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by P. S. Marshall against D. Keefe. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. F. Preston, for appellant. Wm. H. Chapman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought by the seller of a lot of potatoes to recover damages from the purchaser, who refused to receive them when tendered. A jury trial was had, plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The contract called for Early Rose merchantable potatoes. It is claimed that there was no evidence at all tending to show that the goods tendered were merchantable. In this, we think, after carefully examining the record, the appellant is in error. There is much testimony to that effect. Appellant seems to conclude, because plaintiff's witnesses testified that some of the potatoes had sprouted a little, that it would necessarily follow that they were not merchantable. But this proposition cannot be sustained. That might depend upon how badly they had sprouted, and perhaps upon the time of the year in which they were to be delivered. Some witnesses testified that the potatoes tendered were salable for table use, or, as the witnesses preferred to say, for shipment. It became a question for the jury, and was submitted to them under instructions which are not complained of here. The judgment and order are affirmed.

MOORE v. MOORE et al. (No. 14,337.)

EJECTMENT—POSSESSION AND OUSTER BY DEFENDANT—EVIDENCE—PRACTICE ON APPEAL—TENANTS IN COMMON.

1. In an action in the nature of ejectment, a specification of error that "the evidence showed that defendant M. was not in possession of said premises, or of any part thereof, at the time of the commencement of this action," is insufficient.

2. In an action in the nature of ejectment, where the evidence tends to prove that defendants were in possession of the premises when the action was commenced, an answer denying plaintiff's title and right of possession is sufficient evidence of ouster.

3. A tenant in common cannot, as against his cotenant, give a license to a third person to enter on the land held in common.

4. An exception reading, "To said oral instructions, and each and every part thereof, and to the giving thereof by the court, the defendant then and there duly excepted," is too general.

5. In ejectment by a widow against her husband's administrator for premises which had been set apart by order of court as a homestead to plaintiff and her minor children, absolutely, it appeared that, from the time of defendant's appointment as administrator till the homestead was set apart, defendant collected the rents of the premises, and paid taxes; that two months thereafter plaintiff demanded possession of him, which, she testified, he refused to give; that in his verified statement to the tax collector he included this homestead property; and that he leased part thereof to another. Held, that the evidence justified a verdict that defendant was in possession when the action was commenced.

6. Where a defendant in ejectment is in possession of any part of the premises as tenant of another, it is proper to join the latter as party defendant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; James F. Breen, Judge.

Action by Helen M. Moore against Thomas W. Moore and Leonard T. Almstead. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Spalsbury & Burke, Joseph N. Skirm, and Warren Olney, for appellants. Charles B. Younger, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action in the nature of ejectment to recover possession of an undivided half of a parcel of land situate in the county of Santa Cruz, and containing about 35 acres, which plaintiff claims as a probate homestead. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff is the owner, and entitled to the possession, of the demanded premises; that defendants are in possession, and wrongfully withhold the possession from the plaintiff; that the rents and profits of the land have been and are of the value of $480 per year; and that the plaintiff has sustained damages in the sum of $2,300 by reason of the detention and withholding of the possession. Prayer that plaintiff may recover the land, with rents, profits, and damages. The separate answers of the defendants each "denies that plaintiff is, or ever was, the owner, or entitled to the possession, of an undivided one-half of the real estate described in said complaint, or any part thereof," and specifically denies every other allegation of the complaint, except that it is admitted that the value of the rents and profits have been one dollar per year. The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at $847, upon which judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff is the widow of William H. Moore, deceased, who left surviving him four minor children by a former marriage, and a son by his marriage with plaintiff was born after his death, and named William H. Moore. The defendant Thomas W. Moore is a brother of the deceased, and administered upon his estate. On the petition of the plaintiff, filed after the birth of her son, William H. Moore, the demanded premises were set apart from the separate estate of her deceased husband by the probate court, as a homestead for the use of the widow and three of said minor children, namely, Charles Moore and Stella Moore, children of the former marriage, and William H. Moore, the son of plaintiff. The order setting apart the homestead was made April 26, 1881, and apportions the homestead as follows: "The undivided one-half part thereof to said widow, Helen H. Moore, and the undivided one-sixth thereof to each of the said minor children of the deceased, to wit, Charles Moore, Stella Moore, and William H. Moore." The effect of this order was determined in the case, Estate of Moore, 96 Cal. 522, 31 Pac. Rep. 584, in which it was held that conceding the order to have been erroneous, in that it did not limit the duration of the homestead as required by section 1468 of the Code of Civil Procedure, yet, as there had been no appeal from it within the time limited by law, it was not void, and passed absolute title to the widow and the children named, so that the homestead was not subject to distribution on the settlement of the estate. The defendant Thomas W. Moore was a party to that appeal. It appears that Charles Moore was 14 years of age at the time the petition for homestead was filed, (August 2, 1877,) and consequently became of age some time in 1884. The homestead has upon it a large and a small dwelling house, a barn and other outhouses, and an orchard, besides a field of about 20 acres.

1. It is contended for appellants that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict that defendants were in possession of the demanded premises at the time of the commencement of the action, and also insufficient to justify a verdict for any damage whatever. The only specifications of deficiency of evidence as to the possession of the defendants are the following: "The evidence showed that the defendant Thomas W. Moore was not in possession of said premises, or of any part thereof, at the time of the commencement of this action," and a similar specification as to the defendant Almstead. This is not a specification of any particular in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, nor is it substantially equivalent to such specification. In the absence of the specification required by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the respondent was not required to bring into the statement all the evidence applicable to the issue as to the possession of defendants, nor can it be presumed that the statement contains all such evidence unless it purports to contain all the evidence in the case, which this statement does not. Yet, while I think respondent's point that the specification is insufficient is well taken, it appears that the evidence contained in the statement is amply sufficient to justify the verdict that defendant Almstead was in possession at the time the action was commenced. The defendants, in their testimony, admitted that defendant Moore, as administrator, verbally leased to defendant Almstead the land of the estate adjoining the homestead from October 1, 1884, to October 1, 1885, and again from October 1, 1885, to October 1, 1886. It was proved and admitted by Almstead that during those two years he cultivated the 20-acre field on the homestead, and that his employes occupied the small dwelling and other outhouses; but he and his codefendant, Moore, denied that the latter leased to him any part of the homestead, although two witnesses (Hoff and Bennett) testified that during the years 1885 and 1886, while they were working for him upon the homestead, he told them, severally, at different times, that he had rented the homestead, except the big dwelling house, from defendant Moore. As to the possession of the defendant Moore at commencement of the action, the evidence is not so clear, yet, I think, tended to prove it. It is not controverted that, from the time of his appointment as administrator (March 4, 1872) until the order setting apart the homestead, (April 26, 1881,) he had at least constructive possession of all the decedent's real estate, including the homestead, and it appears that he collected the rents and paid the taxes during that period. He contested the application for the homestead; the plaintiff not being in possession at the time the application was made, nor at any time since. A part of the order setting apart the homestead is as follows: "It is hereby further ordered and adjudged that the administrator of said estate of William H. Moore, deceased, deliver the possession of the said homestead above described to Helen M. Moore, the petitioner herein." It is admitted that about two months after the order the plaintiff made both written and oral demand of the administrator for possession of the homestead, and she testified that upon such demand he expressly and emphatically refused. She said: "I asked said Thomas W. Moore if he would deliver me possession of the homestead. He said he would be damned if he would do it." He denied this, saying he only refused to deliver the personal property. In his verified statement to the county assessor of property in his possession in the years 1884 and 1886, subject to taxation, he included the land constituting the homestead. I think the testimony, and circumstantial evidence also, tended to prove that he leased to the defendant Almstead so much of the homestead as the latter cultivated and occupied. It was not necessary to constructive possession that the administrator should have personally resided upon or cultivated the homestead. Barstow v. Newman, 34 Cal. 90. And constructive possession of a defendant in ejectment is sufficient to entitle a plaintiff to recover in that form of action. Crane v. Ghirardelli, 45 Cal. 235. And if the defendant Almstead was in possession of any part of the homestead, as a tenant of the administrator, the latter was properly joined as a party defendant. Code Civil Proc. § 379; Gaslight Co. v. Dameron, 67 Cal. 663, 8 Pac. Rep. 595. As to the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict for damages, the specification is sufficient, but in that particular the evidence appears to be sufficient. Two witnesses testified that the rental value of the premises was from $25 to $30 per month, and one that it was $35 per month, and the evidence tended to prove that the possession was withheld more than two years.

2. At request of plaintiff's counsel, the court gave ten written instructions to the jury, to each one of which counsel for defendants objected, without stating any ground for the objection, and excepted to the ruling of the court in overruling their objections, the objection and exception to each instruction being as follows: "To the giving of which said instruction to the jury said defendants objected, which objection was overruled by the court, and said instruction was given by the court to the jury, to which ruling of the court the defendants then and there duly excepted." The statement on motion for new trial specifies, as an error in law, the giving of each of the ten instructions, without stating in what the error consists. There is nothing in the record indicating that the ground of objection to any one of the instructions was that it was not applicable to the evidence, nor that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the verdict in respect to the possession of the defendants, yet, upon this ground alone, it is contended for appellants that the ninth of said instructions is erroneous, which is as follows: "Each of the defendants, in his several answer in this action, denies that the plaintiff is or ever was the owner, or entitled to the possession, of an undivided one-half of the real estate described in the complaint, or of any part thereof. Such denial was an ouster of plaintiff, and did away with occasion for a demand of possession." Assuming that the evidence tended to prove the defendants were in possession of the demanded premises at the time the action was commenced, (which I think should be presumed, in the absence of any specification of insufficiency of the evidence to prove it, even though such evidence were not to be found in the record,) the answers of the defendants, denying the plaintiff's title and right of possession, afford sufficient evidence of an ouster. Ketchum v. Barber, (Cal.) 12 Pac. Rep. 251, (not officially reported;) Marshall v. Shafter, 32 Cal. 177; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 220.

The following is the tenth instruction given at the request of the plaintiff: "If the land described in the complaint is the same land described in the order setting apart the homestead to Helen M. Moore and the minor children of W. H. Moore, deceased, then the right to the possession of the homestead was in said plaintiff and the said children, and none of the children named in said order could give any right to any person to occupy any part of said homestead, as against said plaintiff." This instruction was objected to in the same form as was the ninth, no ground of objection being stated. The ground of objection here stated for the first time is founded upon evidence tending to prove that the defendant Almstead occupied and cultivated the homestead by express license from Charles Moore, who, it is claimed, was a tenant in common with plaintiff in the homestead, to the extent of one-sixth thereof, by virtue of the order setting it apart. It is contended that, inasmuch as Charles Moore was then 21 years of age, his bare license or permission to Almstead to enter, occupy, and cultivate the homestead, as he did, conferred upon the latter a right to do so, as against the plaintiff; that such license is a complete defense to this action, so far as Almstead is concerned; and, consequently, that the tenth instruction is erroneous, in that it instructs the jury that "none of the children named in said order [setting apart the homestead] could give any right to any person to occupy any part of said homestead, as against said plaintiff." Conceding that Charles Moore was a tenant in common, as claimed, it is well-settled that the instruction is correct. "No action of a portion of several tenants in common can impair the right of their cotenants." Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 21 Cal. 553, (per Field, C. J.) Freem. Coten. § 172, and cases there cited. Other objections are made to some of the 10 instructions, given at the request of plaintiff's counsel, for which, however, I find no valid ground in the record.

3. Besides the ten written instructions given at request of the plaintiff, the court gave about an equal number of oral instructions, occupying about five pages of the printed transcript. To these defendants excepted in the following language, and not otherwise: "To which said oral instructions, and each and every part thereof, and to the giving thereof by the court, the defendants then and there duly excepted." This was too general, (Sill v. Reese, 47 Cal. 296-348; Rider v. Edgar, 54 Cal. 127; Cockrill v. Hall, 76 Cal. 192, 18 Pac. Rep. 318,) and for this reason the oral instructions will not be reviewed on appeal. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

I concur: BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

DUNLOP et al. v. KENNEDY et al.¹
(No. 15,112.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—THE CONTRACT—PAYMENTS—RIGHTS OF SUBCONTRACTORS.

1. Failure of the contract for erecting a building to comply substantially with Code Civil Proc. §§ 1183, 1184, relating to mechanics' liens, does not render the contract void. Lumber Co. v. Wooldredge, 27 Pac. Rep. 431, 90 Cal. 578, followed.

2. A contract for erecting a building, which provides that 25 per cent. of the sum to be paid shall remain unpaid until 35 days after completion of the building, and the remainder be paid in partial payments equal to 75 per cent. of the value of the work and material done and furnished at the time of such payments, sufficiently complies with Code Civil Proc. § 1184, providing that the contract price shall, by the terms of the contract, be made payable in installments at specified times after commencement of the work, and on the completion of the work, provided that at least 25 per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable at least 35 days after final completion of the contract.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1184, requiring the contract for erecting a building to specify times when payments are to be made, and requiring 25 per cent. of the price to be retained until 35 days after completion, partial payments, however they are specified as to time, may be safely made, provided no notice of their subcontracts is given by material men, in the absence of which they must rely on the responsibility of the contractor, and the 25 per cent. required to be retained; and in such case they are not injured by any uncertainty as to the times of payment specified, nor by payments in advance of the specified time.

4. All that material men can require, in such case, is that at the time they serve written notice upon the owner, or, if no notice is served, at the time their lien is filed, there shall be in his hands the amount required by the contract and said section.

5. It does not prejudice persons furnishing a contractor material for erecting a building that the owner of the land purchased material from a firm of which he was a member, and furnished it to the contractor as a partial payment of the contract price, which partial payment he had a right to make.

6. The owner of a building who, out of the contract price, has paid laborers who were entitled to file liens, and would have filed them but for such payment, and who has also retained out of the contract price the 25 per cent. required by Code Civil Proc. § 1184, to be retained until 35 days after completion of the contract, is entitled to credit for such payment; and material men are not entitled to have the amount of such payment considered as part of the fund available for their claims, on the ground that there could be no privity between the owner and such laborers until they filed their liens, so as to entitle him to pay them.

7. The mechanic's lien statute does not require that the contract for erecting a building shall be signed by the owner, and it is sufficient if it be signed by the reputed owner.

8. A contract for erecting a building, and also for improvements on an adjoining lot running "westerly," is not avoided by the fact that the recorded memorandum of the contract erroneously uses the word "easterly," nor is the sufficiency of the memorandum destroyed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Charles Dunlop and others against Alice Kennedy and John F. Kennedy to enforce liens for material. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants, Kennedy, appeal. Reversed.

Atty. Gen. Hart and Nowlin & Fassett, for appellants. Parker & Eells, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Consolidated actions to enforce liens of material men. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendants, Alice Kennedy and John F. Kennedy, the owners, appeal from the judgment, and an order refusing a new trial. On September 26, 1889, Alice Kennedy, wife of said John F. Kennedy, entered into a contract in writing with Gray & Stover, of which firm the defendant Stover is the surviving partner, by which they were to erect for her a three-story building, (flats,) and to furnish all materials and labor therefor, together with certain cement sidewalks and other walks on the same lot, and "also sidewalk in front of lot adjoining, running forty-two feet westerly, and all walk ways and yard in connection with said lot." The contract did not apportion the price of the work upon each lot, but the contractors were to be paid $6,600 "at the times and in the manner following, to wit: Twenty-five per cent. of the contract sum to remain unpaid until thirty-five days from and after completion of said building, and its acceptance by the within-named architect. The remaining amount to be paid in partial payments in amount equal to seventy-five per cent. of the value of the work done and materials furnished at the time of such payments." The contract was not filed in the recorder's office, but a memorandum of it was filed before the commencement of the work. Gray & Stover prosecuted the work until January 19, 1890, when Gray died, and Stover continued the work until February 18, 1890, when he abandoned the work before completion; and the owners, after due notice to the surviving contractor, continued the work, and completed it March 17, 1890. At the time of the contract there was a stable upon the lot, for which the contractors were to pay $150, and remove it. On December 21, Kennedy paid the contractors $3,000 in cash; and on January 14, 1890, the contractors received for $4,000, which included the said payment of $3,000, and $1,000 for lumber furnished under the following circumstances. John F. Kennedy was a member of the Kennedy-Shaw Lumber Company, and he agreed with the contractors to furnish the lumber, and it was furnished to the contractors to the above amount, and used in the building, the lumber company charging it to Kennedy, and that amount was included in the receipt as paid upon the contract. At the time Stover abandoned the work, there was due from the contractors to laborers $285, which amount was at once paid by the owners to the laborers. There was also due from the contractors to material men at the date of abandonment, including the amount due the plaintiffs in the consolidated cases, $2,656.74. The actual cost of completing the work in the manner the contract required was $1,255.89. After completion, the owners estimated the balance of the contract price remaining in their hands at $890.86, and offered to the respondents Towle & Broadwell, and to respondent Dunlop, and the other material men, their several pro rata shares of said sum. All except Towle & Broadwell and Dunlop accepted the offer, and received the payment in satisfaction of their several claims. Dunlop and Towle & Broadwell refused to accept the offer. Those accepting the settlement were five in number, and their claims aggregated $998.74. Whether the offer was made to respondents before their liens were filed, does not appear. The others did not file liens. The court found due to respondent Dunlop $585, and to Towle & Broadwell $1,073, besides costs and attorneys' fees to each, and that they were entitled to liens for those amounts. Other findings necessary to be noticed are that John F. Kennedy was and is the owner in fee of the premises, and that Mrs. Kennedy is the reputed owner; that no memorandum of the contract was ever filed, except that set out in the findings; that the defendants did not comply with the terms of the contract as to payments, but that on December 21, 1889, there was paid $3,000 in cash, and on January 14, 1890, a receipt was given for that sum, and $1,000 for the lumber hereinbefore mentioned, and that no cash payments were made, except said sum of $3,000; and, as a conclusion of law, that the materials furnished by plaintiffs were furnished at the personal instance of defendants. But whether this conclusion is based upon the supposed insufficiency of the contract and memorandum, as to the time of making partial payments, or upon the ground that overpayments were made, is difficult to ascertain. Both grounds are urged in respondents' brief, and require consideration.

If it were conceded that the contract and memorandum did not substantially comply with sections 1183 and 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that fact would not, as respondents' counsel contend, make the contract void. Lumber Co. v. Wooldredge, 90 Cal. 578, 27 Pac. Rep. 431. It was said, however, in that case: "But the same consequence follows for a material nonconformity of the contract with the statute, under section 1184, so far as to permit material men and laborers to recover without regard to the amount due upon the contract." Said section provides that "the contract price shall, by the terms of the contract, be made payable in installments at specified times after the commencement of the work or on the completion of the work, provided that at least twenty-five per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable at least thirty-five days after final completion of the contract." I think the contract in question substantially complied with the requirements of this section. The owner cannot with safety agree to pay a definite amount on a particular day, as he cannot know in advance whether the contractor will have earned the payment; and, if the payment is to be made upon reaching certain stages of the work, it only furnishes the means of ascertaining the day of payment when it actually arrives. The whole object of the provision is to protect material men, and any specification which accomplishes this purpose is sufficient. The partial payments, no matter how they are specified as to time, may safely be made, provided no notice of their subcontracts has been given by material men. These payments may therefore be anticipated and secured as a fund for the payment of their claims, by giving written notice as provided by statute. In the absence of such notice they must rely upon the personal responsibility of the contractor, and the 25 per centum of the whole contract price required to be retained for 35 days after the completion of the work; and in such case they are in no wise affected by any uncertainty as to the time when partial payments are to be made, nor by payments thereof in advance of the time specified. If, however, a material man gives written notice of his claim for materials furnished to the contractor before the time fixed for a partial payment, he thereby acquires an interest in that and subsequent payments, to the extent of his claim, and may hold the owner for the amount thereof, notwithstanding the fact that that payment was made before the notice was served. In this case, however, no notice was served, and it is therefore immaterial whether the contract was indefinite as to the time of payments. It requires the owner to have in his hands at all times at least 25 per centum of the value of the work done and materials furnished, so that at any time notice might be served the owner was liable for that proportion of the work actually done, as well as all the contractor should earn thereafter. The record does not show the value of the labor and materials done and furnished at the date of the payment of $3,000, but the court found that at the date of Gray's death the work was not more than three-fourths completed. At that date the owners had paid $287.50, more than 75 per cent. of the work done. But Stover, the surviving partner, continued the work until February 17th, when he abandoned it. The testimony of the architect shows, without contradiction, that it cost to complete the work $1,255.89, showing that the contractors had earned, at the time of abandonment, $5,344.11. Seventy-five per cent. of that sum is $4,008, showing in the hands of the owners $8 more than the 25 per cent. required by the contract to be retained from partial payments. All that material men can require is that at the time they serve written notice upon the owner, or, if no notice is served, at the time their lien is filed, there shall be in the hands of the owner the amount required by the contract and the law; and if that amount is in his hands there can be no liability resting upon him, or his property beyond it. The statute must have a reasonable construction as well for the protection of the owner as of the material man. It would be no hardship upon material men if their right to a lien were by statute made to depend upon prompt notice to the owner of their agreement with the contractor to furnish materials; and if they would avail themselves of the right now given them by the statute, to serve written notice upon the owner, a very large amount of vexatious and expensive litigation would be wholly avoided. In this case the owners were not liable to laborers and material men for more than the balance of the contract price after deducting all proper credits, and the cost of completing the work in the manner required by the contract. In ascertaining this balance the court rightly excluded the item of $150, the price of the stable sold to the contractors. It appears to have preceded the commencement of the work, and therefore within the express letter of the statute, though it does not appear that respondents were or could have been injured by the payment.

I am unable to ascertain from the findings whether the court considered the $1,000 paid by the lumber transaction as a payment. Respondents' counsel insist that it is not a payment, as against them. It is true Mr. Kennedy, in his testimony, spoke of it as an "offset." The name given to a transaction, especially by a nonprofessional witness, does not change its character. The contract required the contractor to furnish all materials, and neither the contract nor the law restricts him as to the person from whom he shall purchase them. The lumber was delivered to and used by the contractor in the erection of the building. No question is made as to the price paid for the lumber, nor that any injury or injustice did or could accrue therefrom to respondents. The Kennedy-Shaw Lumber Company had no interest in the erection of this building. They had the right, for their own protection, to require that the owner should become personally liable. Suppose that one of these respondents should have pursued that course, and had been paid by Kennedy with the consent of the contractor. Could the other have objected? The statute is not aimed at transactions such as this. The "prior or subsequent indebtedness, offset, or counterclaim in favor of the reputed owner and against the contractor," mentioned in the statute, applies to dealings of a different character, and was intended to prevent transactions between the owner and contractor by which the contractor's ability to pay for material might be diminished or destroyed. Material men are not privies to the contract, and can have no possible interest in it, further than above indicated.

I also think that appellants should be allowed the amount paid to the laborers and to the other material men. The bill of exceptions contains the following: "It was admitted by Mr. Eells, who represented the plaintiffs on the trial, that the various claims on account of which the defendants, Kennedy, paid a pro rata to the various mechanics and material men for materials and work performed previous to the abandonment of said contract were correct, and the parties were entitled to file a lien, except for the artificial stonework, and for the fences and curbs set on and in front of the adjoining lot, and would have done so if the payments had not been made, but it was not admitted that they, or any of them, would have filed good liens." Respondents contend that until liens are filed there is no privity between the owner and subcontractors; that no money was due them from the owners, and none could be paid until after liens were filed, complying with all the essential requirements of the statute. As a general proposition, that is true, and fully supports the position hereinbefore taken touching the payments made by the owners to the contractors. But the admission above quoted is very broad. It concedes that the claims of these laborers and material men were correct; that they were entitled to file liens therefor, except as to work on the adjoining lot, and would have filed them, but for the payment. The qualification that it is not admitted that they would have filed "good liens" does not change the situation. Being entitled to file liens for the amount of their several claims, and it appearing that they would have filed them, we cannot assume, at the expense of the owner, that they would have so defectively prepared them as to render them invalid. The presumption is the other way. Actions to enforce liens under the mechanic's lien law, though statutory, are in their essential features equitable. If liens had been filed the laborers would have been entitled to the first lien, and payment in full, while the material men would have shared in the remainder of the fund pro rata with respondents, and the fund would have been diminished by additional costs and attorneys' fees if the settlement had not been made. Respondents were therefore benefited, instead of injured, by the settlement made, though not so largely benefited as they would be if they compel the owner to pay a like sum to them in addition to what they are equitably entitled to. The same offer was made to respondents, but, whether before or after their liens were filed, does not appear. As to the work done upon the adjoining lot, it was all included in the one contract for a lump sum, and it cannot be divided so as to apportion it between the two lots. The work upon the adjoining lot was all of a character for which a lien is given by the statute, (Code Civil Proc., § 1191,) and when materials have been furnished under a single contract for buildings or improvements on two or more contiguous lots owned by the same person a lien may be filed against all, (Lyon v. Logan, 68 Tex. 521, 5 S. W. Rep. 72.) The fund sought to be reached by respondents in part accrued from work and materials bestowed upon the adjoining lot, and, if they can file a valid lien upon one lot under such contract, (a point not argued or decided,) I fail to see why all laborers and material men may not file valid liens upon the lot upon which the building was erected, and upon which alone respondents filed their liens. Besides, a conclusive answer to the exception contained in the admission of respondents is that the record does not show that any of the claims settled and paid by appellants were for work done upon the "adjoining lot." I think these payments should have been allowed to defendants in reduction of the fund.

It is also urged by respondents that the contract does not conform to the requirements of the statute, because it was signed only by Mrs. Kennedy, while the court found that her husband, John F. Kennedy, was the owner in fee. The statute does not require that the contract be signed by the owner. It is sufficient if signed by the reputed owner, and it was found that Mrs. Kennedy was the reputed owner. Besides, the owner, not having given notice as required by the statute that he would not be responsible for the improvements upon his property, is as conclusively bound, so far as laborers or subcontractors are concerned, as though he had made the contract.

The contract described the adjoining lot as running 42 feet "westerly," while in the memorandum "easterly" was inserted instead. The error did not destroy the sufficiency of the memorandum. It was described as "the lot adjoining" the lot first described; and, as a misdescription does not avoid a contract of this character, (Yancy v. Morton, 94 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. Rep. 1111,) the error was capable of correction by proper averment and proof.

The payments by the owners to the laborers and material men (other than the respondents) were alleged in the answer, but there was no finding as to the fact of payment. The findings, as made, however, do not support the judgment, inasmuch as the facts found show a balance in the hands of the owners much less than the amount of the liens adjudged to the respondents, the judgment being based upon an erroneous conclusion of law that the materials supplied by plaintiffs were furnished at the special instance and request of the owners. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

PEOPLE ex rel. EADIE v. NOYO LUMBER CO. (No. 15, 110.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1893.)

STATE SCHOOL LIEU LANDS—APPLICATION TO PURCHASE—CURATIVE ACT—CANCELLATION OF PATENT—LIMITATION.

1. Defects in an application to purchase state school lieu lands, made September 23, 1868, were cured by the curative act of March 24, 1870, (St. 1870, p. 352;) and Act March 27, 1872, limiting the effect of said curative act in the matter of school lands to the amount of 320 acres for any one purchaser did not apply, the application having been made before the passage of the curative act.

2. The act of 1872 was superseded by Pol. Code, § 3573, which is substantially the same as Act March 24, 1870.

3. Act Cong. March 1, 1877, (19 Stat. 267,) known as the "Booth Act," "relating to indemnity school selections in the state of California," and confirming to the state the titles to these lands selected by the state, was equivalent to a grant of the lands to the state as of the date of listing, and the title thus ratified was within the effect of the curative act of March 24, 1870, and was thereby validated, as though the lands belonged to the state at the time of the passage of the act.

4. Under Code Civil Proc. § 338, subd. 4, which provides that an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake must be begun in three years after the cause accrues, and that the cause is not deemed accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake, a relator suing in the name of the state to cancel a patent of lands for fraud of the purchaser is not an aggrieved party, within the meaning of the section, so that his ignorance of the fraud can exempt the action from its provisions.

5. In such action by the state to cancel the patent for fraud of the applicant to purchase, the averment in relator's complaint that the "false statement" of the applicant was not known to the officers of the state is not sufficient to exempt the action from the provision of the above section.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county.

Action by the people, on the relation of William Eadie, to cancel a patent to land. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, John T. Carey, and B. F. Bergen, for appellant. J. A. Cooper and Chas. E. Wilson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action to cancel a patent issued by the state of California, in 1876, to A. W. Macpherson for certain lands in Mendocino county. It is alleged in the complaint that the lands in question are agricultural lands, which were listed to the state February 15, 1870, in lieu of a section 36,—that section then supposed to be within the exterior limits of a reservation, but subsequently ascertained to be excluded therefrom; that said selection was confirmed to the state by the provisions of the act of congress approved March 1, 1877, entitled "An act relating to indemnity school selections in the state of California;" that Macpherson made application September 23, 1868, to the state surveyor general to purchase the lands in lieu of said school section, and that on March 20, 1870, his application was approved by the surveyor general, and that thereupon he paid to the county treasurer of Mendocino county 20 per cent. of the purchase money, with the first year's interest on the balance, and received from the register of the said land office a certificate of purchase thereof; that on the 21st of September, 1876, upon paying the balance of the purchase money and surrender of said certificate, letters patent were issued to him by the state; that on the 29th of March, 1888, the defendant succeeded to whatever right and interest in the land Macpherson had by virtue of said application, certificate of purchase, and letters patent, but did not enter into possession of the lands until September, 1890. The complaint further alleges that the application of Macpherson was null and void for the reason that in his affidavit therefor he failed to describe the lands by legal subdivisions, and was also false and fraudulent, for the reason that he stated therein that there were no improvements on said land other than his own, whereas, in fact, the said land was at that time in the actual occupation and possession of one Joseph Hardy, who remained in such occupation and possession until his death in 1874, and whose son succeeded to his interest, and continued in the possession of the land until within two years prior to the commencement of this action, August 6, 1891. The complaint further alleges that on the 11th day of July, 1891, the relator possessed the requisite qualifications therefor, and on that day made application to the state surveyor general to purchase the said lands as a portion of the state school lieu lands, but that officer refused to file said application, for the reason that the said patent to Macpherson was outstanding and uncanceled. Plaintiff therefore asks that the letters patent issued to Macpherson be canceled, and that the relator be adjudged to have the right to file his application to purchase said lands. To this complaint the defendant demurred, and, his demurrer having been sustained, judgment was entered in his favor, and the plaintiff has appealed.

Whatever defects there may have been in the application of Macpherson, they were cured by the act of March 24, 1870, (St. 1870, p. 352.) Copp v. Harrington, 47 Cal. 236; Rooker v. Johnston, 49 Cal. 3. The provision in the act of March 27, 1872, limiting the effect of that act in the matter of school lands to the amount of 320 acres for any one purchaser, has no application to the present case. As Macpherson's application to purchase was made September 23, 1868, prior to the passage of the curative act of 1870, after his application had once been validated, it was not in the power of the legislature to place other limitations to the title thus conferred upon him. Moreover, the act of 1872 was superseded by section 3573 of the Political Code, which is substantially the same as the act of March 24, 1870. Hence the averment in the complaint that prior to March 24, 1870, he had purchased from the state more than 320 acres of school lands is immaterial. By the act of congress approved March 1, 1877, (19 Stat. p. 267,) commonly known as the "Booth Act," the title to these lands was confirmed to the state. "This statute was a full and complete ratification by congress according to its terms, of the list of indemnity school selections which had been before that time certified to the state of California by the United States as indemnity school selections, no matter how defective or insufficient such school certificates might originally have been, if the lands included in the lists were not of the character of any of those mentioned in section 4, and if they had not been taken up in good faith by a homestead or pre-emption settler prior to the date of the certificate." Durand v. Martin, 120 U. S. 372, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 587; affirming Martin v. Durand, 63 Cal. 39. This ratification by the United States of the listing of the lands was equivalent to a grant of those lands to the state as of the date of the listing, February 5, 1870, and the title thus ratified was within the effect of the curative act of March 24, 1870, and was thereby validated as though the lands had belonged to the state at the time of the passage of the act. The expression to the contrary in the opinion of Mr. Justice Thornton in Land Co. v. Moir, 83 Cal. 105, 22 Pac. Rep. 55, and 23 Pac. Rep. 359, did not receive the approval of the court, and cannot be regarded as authority.

Section 338, subd. 4, Code Civil Proc., declares that an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake must be commenced within three years after the cause of action accrues, and further provides that the cause of action in such case is not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake. In People v. Blankenship, 52 Cal. 619, this provision was held to apply to an action by the state to cancel a patent for land alleged to have been procured by fraud. The plaintiff herein seeks to take the present case out of this limitation by averring "that the fraudulent and false statement made by Macpherson was not known by the relator until within the past two years, nor was it discovered by the land officers or the attorney general of this state, until on or about the 11th day of July, 1891." The relator is not, however, the "aggrieved party," within the meaning of section 338, and the averment that the "false statement" was not known to the officers is not sufficient to exempt the action from the provisions of the section. The statement itself must have been known to the officers at the time it was received by them from Macpherson; and, as any defects in that statement, whether fraudulent or false, were cured by the act of 1870, it is immaterial whether or not they were subsequently ascertained by the land officers of the state. The judgment is affirmed.

RUED v. COOPER et al. (No. 14,247.)

VACATING JUDGMENT—LIMITATION—ASSIGNMENT IN INSOLVENCY—WHAT PASSES.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 473, limiting the setting aside of any judgment or proceeding to six months after the same was taken, has no application to an order granting the discharge of an assignee in insolvency on final settlement of his account; and where an assignee finds property belonging to the insolvent's estate after his discharge the court may set aside the discharge, though more than six months have expired.

2. Const. art. 4, § 26, declares that "all contracts for the sale of shares of the capital stock of any corporation or association on margins, or to be delivered at a future day, shall be void, and any money paid on such contract may be recovered by the party paying it by a suit in any court of competent jurisdiction." Held, that a right of action accruing under the section to an insolvent passes to the assignee, though it was not included in the schedule of assets.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by J. C. Rued, assignee of C. A. Macomber, insolvent, against F. T. Cooper and Warner Stauff. From a judgment for defendants on demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Henley, Swift & Rigby, for appellant. Newlands, Allen & Herrin, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered upon defendants' demurrer to the complaint. The principal questions arise upon the following facts appearing in the complaint: On August 19, 1887, C. A. Macomber was, on his own petition, adjudged an insolvent debtor, and on September 6, 1887, the plaintiff herein, J. C. Rued, was appointed assignee, and qualified as such. On May 8, 1888, the assignee filed in court his final account, which was settled and allowed; and on June 13, 1888, an order was made by the superior court ordering the final discharge of the assignee. After the discharge the assignee discovered that he had a good cause of action against the defendants for a large amount of money upon a liability existing in favor of the insolvent at the time he filed his petition. This liability was not included in the insolvent's schedule nor in the assignee's account, for the reason that it was unknown to him until after his discharge. That on January 18, 1889, after discovering said alleged cause of action against the defendants, he procured an ex parte order to be entered, setting aside his said discharge and the order settling his final account, and thereafter commenced this action. The causes of action stated in the complaint were to recover moneys paid by the insolvent to the defendants for the purchase and sale of stocks on a margin. Respondents contend that the order setting aside the order of final discharge of the assignee is absolutely void, because made more than six months after the order of final discharge was entered; that the only authority given the court to set aside any judgment or order is found in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which expressly limits its exercise to a period "not exceeding six months after such judgment, order or proceeding was taken;" while appellant contends that this section has no application; that it applies only to judgments, orders, or proceedings taken "against" the party applying for relief therefrom; that the order of discharge vacated upon his application was one in his favor, procured upon his application, relieving him from responsibility to creditors of the insolvent, and was not final; that even if it were a final order, the court having once had jurisdiction, its jurisdiction may be restored by consent.

In People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 403, 404, 16 Pac. Rep. 197, it was said: "Under the former system of practice in this state the decisions were numerous, and quite uniform, to the effect that upon the expiration of the term of court all power to alter, change, modify, or annul judgments entered during the term, or prior thereto, was lost, unless saved by some motion or action of the court during the term, except as otherwise provided by statute. Under our present system of jurisprudence, terms of court are abolished; and, as the rule cannot apply literally, it is provided by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure that the relief which formerly could be had during the term may be sought within a reasonable time, which is defined to be six months." In that case it was further said: "In Hastings v. Cunningham, 35 Cal. 550, it was held that the rule indicated had no application, except as to final judgments, and did not apply while the proceedings remained in fieri." The meaning of the old rule was that the court lost jurisdiction at the expiration of the term at which final judgment was rendered. Until jurisdiction was lost the court had full power over its proceedings and the cause. In determining whether the court had lost jurisdiction to take further proceedings after the discharge of the assignee, and the lapse of the time limited by section 473, Code Civil Proc., the character of the case, the nature of the jurisdiction in insolvency cases, and of the order of discharge, must be considered. By the adjudication of insolvency, all the property of the insolvent (not exempt from execution) is, by operation of law, placed in the hands of the court, and under its control, and subject to its disposition. The insolvent act requires no conveyance from the insolvent. Upon the appointment and qualification of the assignee "the clerk of the court shall, by an instrument under his hand and seal of the court, assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the debtor, with all his deeds, books and papers relating thereto, and such assignment shall relate back to the commencement of the proceedings in insolvency, and by operation of law shall vest the title to all such property and estate, both real and personal, in the assignee." Insolvent Act of 1880, § 17. By the adjudication, therefore, the property of the insolvent debtor passed from him, and came under the control of the court, and the sheriff was required to take possession of it. It is a proceeding in rem, or, at the least, quasi in rem. The proceeding by creditors to establish their claims, though they name the insolvent as the debtor, is in reality a proceeding to establish their several claims against the property, to which they can alone look for payment. The assignee is but the hand of the court, and, though elected by the creditors, derives his powers from, and discharges his duties under the direction of, the court, and is, for the purposes of the proceeding, an officer of the court. The insolvent practically disappears as a party to the proceeding, and only the execution of the trust remains. The title to his property has passed from him, and by operation of law is vested in the assignee, who is an officer of the law, and a trustee for the creditors. Nor is the title of the assignee restricted to property or demands embraced in the schedule filed by the insolvent. The status of all the property owned by the debtor, of whatever character, is conclusively fixed by the statute, upon his insolvency being adjudged by the court. Section 18 of the insolvency act provides: "The assignee shall have the right to recover all the estate, debts and effects of said insolvent." The language of the bankrupt act of congress of 1841 was scarcely more comprehensive than that above quoted, yet it was held that "all but the excepted property of the bankrupt passed to the assignee, although not included in the schedule." Holbrook v. Coney, 25 Ill. 543. In a recent work on Jurisdiction, it is said: "There are two divisions that should be made of proceedings in rem pertaining to 'things indebted.' The first pertains to a class of actions where the entire res comes under the control of the court, as the basis of jurisdiction. The second are actions personal in their nature, but in which the law permits the property to be seized in the progress of the action as a basis of jurisdiction. The latter class has been defined to be a 'proceeding quasi in rem.'" Brown, Jur. § 64. In the same section the author places in the first class, among others, probate proceedings, proceedings in bankruptcy, and assignments for the benefit of creditors. In bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings, it is clear that the indebtedness of the bankrupt and insolvent is upon the adjudication transferred from the person to the res. The jurisdiction, being based upon the res, was not lost by the settlement of what was called the "final account," nor by the so-called discharge of the assignee. The insolvent, when he received his final discharge, was no longer a necessary or proper party to the subsequent proceedings. That adjudication, so far as it is personal, is final; but the other jurisdiction must remain until the property, the subject of the trust, is finally disposed of. The title has passed out of the insolvent, and is vested in the assignee, and still remains under the control and subject to the disposition of the court. The accident that the assignee believes that he has disposed of all the property of the insolvent, and has settled his account, does not divest his title, nor so end the proceedings that they may not be revived, should other property be discovered. He is not authorized or empowered by the statute to reassign or convey to the insolvent such subsequently discovered property, and his duty to creditors will not permit him to conceal the property thus discovered, or refuse to recover it, and distribute the proceeds among them. If the court can be said to have lost jurisdiction at all, it could only be as to the assignee; but as to him, if the jurisdiction had lapsed by virtue of the order and the efflux of time, it may be restored by his consent, the court not having lost its jurisdiction of the subject-matter. In Brown v. Crow's Heirs, Hardin, 451, the court said: "It must be admitted, as a general principle, that consent cannot give jurisdiction; but this principle only applies to original jurisdiction, or, in other words, to those cases where the court never had, by law, jurisdiction in the case. But where the court once had jurisdiction, although the power may have been executed, so that without the consent of parties the court could not change their former judgment or decree, the jurisdiction may be, and in many cases has been, restored by consent. In such cases the maxim, 'consent takes away error,' applies. Bogle v. Fitzhugh, 2 Wash. (Va.) 213, recognizes this distinction." The only parties before the court after the discharge of the insolvent were the assignee and the creditors, who are represented by the assignee as their trustee. Nor do we think that the discharge was a final judgment or order, as affecting the jurisdiction of the court. Section 33 of the insolvent act authorizes the court, upon the grounds there stated, to "immediately discharge such assignee from his trust, and shall have power to appoint another in his place," while section 34 provides that upon filing his final account, and application for its settlement, "the court thereupon shall settle the account and order a dividend of any portion of the estate remaining undistributed, and shall discharge the assignee, subject to compliance with the order of the court, from all liability as assignee to any creditor of the insolvent." It will be observed in the one case that the assignee is discharged from his trust, while in the other he is simply discharged from liability as assignee to any creditor of the insolvent; thus, by the very form of the discharge, leaving him with all his powers as trustee in case other property than that disposed of by his previous accounts should be discovered. Whether or not it was necessary to set aside the former order of discharge and settlement of account, in order to bring the present action, it is not necessary to decide, though this action of the court, even if not strictly necessary, was nevertheless proper, as it was a direct recognition of the continuing authority of the assignee. We think section 473, Code Civil Proc., has no application to such an order as that entered, discharging the assignee from liability to creditors, for it is manifest that if the assignee in fact knew of other property which should have been appropriated to the payment of the creditors, and had omitted to apply it, the discharge in question could not have relieved him from responsibility; and, that being true, the discharge can only apply to matters appearing in his account, to which they have had an opportunity of excepting.

It is further contended by respondents that there is no allegation in the complaint that an assignment of the insolvent's property was made to plaintiff, and that the omission of that averment is fatal. The complaint averred "that on the 26th day of September, 1887, an order was duly made by and in the said superior court, duly appointing the said plaintiff assignee of the said insolvent debtor, C. A. Macomber; that on the 27th day of September, 1887, the said plaintiff, as said assignee, filed his bond as required by law, and on the same day duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such assignee; that on May 8, 1888, the said assignee filed in said court his final account, and the same was settled and allowed." We think these allegations sufficient under a general demurrer. The special demurrer of defendants does not go to this point. The statute makes it the duty of the clerk of the court to convey to the assignee all the estate of the debtor as soon as the assignee has given bond and qualified. The clerk is an officer of the court, acting under its direction, and the presumption is that every officer discharges every duty specifically enjoined upon him. Code Civil Proc. § 1963, subd. 15. If the assignment were required by the statute to be made by the insolvent, a much more serious question would arise; but here the assignment is based upon the previous proceedings of the court, and becomes a step in the cause, and essentially a part of the regular and orderly proceedings therein, and therefore is presumed to have been taken. If there was in fact no assignment, it may be pleaded as matter of defense. We think the complaint, upon this point, is sufficient, at least in the absence of a special demurrer.

Respondents further contend that "Macomber alone, not his assignee, can maintain any action to recover the claims counted upon." The constitution, art. 4, § 26, provides: "All contracts for the sale of shares of the capital stock of any corporation or association on margin, or to be delivered at a future day, shall be void, and any money paid on such contracts may be recovered by the party paying it by suit in any court of competent jurisdiction." This provision, it is said, creates a new right, and provides a remedy, and that such remedy is exclusive, and limited to Macomber personally. We think this contention cannot be sustained. The remedy given is a recovery of money paid on a void contract. There is no distinction between money paid under a contract declared void by the constitution, and that paid under any other void contract. In all such cases the party who has paid the money remains the equitable owner of it, though he could not, in many cases, maintain an action for its recovery. But here the constitution, which declares the contract void, expressly authorizes its recovery. It was, prior to Macomber's insolvency, a part of his estate; and in case of his death the right of action would have survived, unless the right of action is limited to him personally, for a right of action which survives is, under the general rule, assignable. This question was considered in the case of Meech v. Stoner, 19 N. Y. 26. There, by the statute, all wagers, bets, or stakes upon any gaming are declared to be unlawful, and all contracts for or on account of any money or property or thing in action so wagered are void; and it is provided that the person who shall, by playing at any time, or betting on the sides or hands of those who play, lose at any time or sitting the sum of twenty-five dollars or upwards, and shall pay or deliver the same, or any part thereof, may, within three calendar months after such payment or delivery, sue for and recover the money or value of the thing so lost, paid, or delivered, from the winner thereof. It was claimed on the part of the defendant that the loser at play has, by the statute, a merely personal privilege to sue and recover back his losses, but has no interest in the money or thing sued for, which is capable of assignment, so as to give the right of action to any one else. In that case it was held that, if the statute had not given an action to recover money lost at play, a suit for such purpose could not be maintained; that this exemption, however, would not result from any title in the defendant to the money or thing won and received by him, but because the courts withheld their remedial process from each of the offending parties, thus leaving the parties where the law finds them, and the defendant prevails, not upon his own merits or title, but because the plaintiff is deemed unworthy to be heard in the case. But the court further said: "That difficulty being removed by the legislature, I see no reason why the right to demand and recover money staked and lost in gaming is not as much a part of a man's estate as any other right in action which he can possess; and, if this be so, why is not such a demand, like any other, capable of being transferred by act of the party or of the law. But the statute, it is said, gives the action to the 'person,' and not to his assigns or representatives. Upon the precise terms of the statute, this is so, yet it is difficult to suggest any reason why the right to be asserted in such an action would not devolve upon the administrator, and thus become a fund for the payment of debts, or for distribution amongst the next of kin, or why an assignee in bankruptcy or insolvency would not succeed to the claim, and be able to enforce it for the benefit of creditors. Assignability of things in action is now the rule; nonassignability, the exception; and this exception is confined to wrongs done to the person, the reputation, or the feelings of the injured party, and to contracts of a purely personal nature, like promises of marriage." The court, in this case, sustained the views above quoted by further argument and the citation of a number of cases, both English and American, and in these views we concur. We think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, and that the judgment should be reversed, with leave to the defendants to answer.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that the defendants have leave to answer.

FAIRBANKS v. LAMPKIN et al. (No. 15,130.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

SUPREME COURT—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4, granting the supreme court appellate jurisdiction in cases at law only where the demand, exclusive of interest, amounts to $300, that court cannot review an order, made after final judgment, taxing a cost bill which is less than that amount.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

Action by one Fairbanks against Lampkin and others. From an order taxing costs after final judgment, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

J. A. Cooper and J. M. Mannon, for appellant. T. L. Carothers and J. H. Seawell, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal from an order made after final judgment taxing a cost bill, the whole amount of the bill being only $171.20. We do not think that this court has jurisdiction of the appeal, for the reason that the amount involved is less than $300. We strongly intimated this conclusion in Sellick v. De Carlow, 95 Cal. 644, 30 Pac. Rep. 795; and further consideration satisfies us that the intimations given in the opinion in that case should be taken as a correct statement of the law on the subject. Section 4, art. 6, of the state constitution, provides that "the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases * * * at law * * * in which the demand, exclusive of interest * * * amounts to three hundred dollars;" and no doubt the rule has been too firmly settled to be now disturbed that, on an appeal from a final judgment in an action to recover money, jurisdiction depends upon the "demand" made by plaintiff, —upon the ad damnum clause of the complaint. But that rule should not be extended further than previous decisions necessarily carry it. An order made after final judgment is a separate, independent proceeding; and where it involves money only, and the amount involved is less than $300, this court has no jurisdiction, under the constitution, of an appeal from such order. Such an appeal has been sustained in one or two instances where the point was not brought to the attention of the court, but in no case has the point been raised and determined in favor of the jurisdiction. In Lumber Co. v. Neal, 94 Cal. 192, 29 Pac. Rep. 622, the only question involved was whether a certain order should be considered as a part of the final judgment, or as an order made after final judgment, but there was no question raised or decided which called for a consideration of the amount of money involved in the order; and the point under discussion was not raised in any of the other cases decided by this court, to which our attention has been called. On the other hand, in Langan v. Langan, 83 Cal. 618, 23 Pac. Rep. 1084, which was an independent appeal from an order allowing an attorney's fee in a divorce suit, this court, sitting in bank, held, without any dissent, that "the appeal from the order allowing $150 counsel fee must be dismissed, because the amount in dispute is too small to give this court jurisdiction." And in Oullahan v. Morrissey, 73 Cal. 297, 14 Pac. Rep. 864, the court, sitting also in bank, delivered the following opinion: "The Court. The plaintiff, having consented to the entry of the judgment against himself, cannot appeal from it, or, if he can, can only be heard as to that portion to which he did not consent. That, in this case, is, at the most, the demand for costs, which, being less than three hundred dollars, does not give this court jurisdiction." If the two cases last above cited are not conclusive against the jurisdiction in the case at bar, they certainly point clearly in that direction; and, considering all the former decisions together, it can be confidently said, at least, that the question has not been definitely determined the other way.

And, assuming the question to be an open one, we are satisfied that we have no jurisdiction of this appeal. The clear meaning of the constitution is that the litigation of independent issues involving money only, in an amount less than $300, must end in the superior court. The appeal is dismissed.

MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — ACTION FOR DEFICIENCY — MERGER IN JUDGMENT — PLEADING.

1. In an action to foreclose a mortgage, in which service is made by publication only, the court has no jurisdiction to enter a personal judgment for a deficiency.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 726, prohibiting more than one action to recover a debt or enforce a mortgage, does not prevent a new action on a note which was secured by a mortgage to recover a deficiency left on foreclosure of the mortgage, as the amount realized on foreclosure may be treated as a payment on the note, and the action as brought to recover the balance.

3. A complaint to recover a deficiency after foreclosure of a mortgage securing a note, which shows the foreclosure and the fact that a deficiency resulted, states a good cause of action, whether it is based on the note, or on an indebtedness resulting from the foreclosure and deficiency.

H. L. Poplin, for appellant. Orr & Hall, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. It is alleged in the amended complaint in this case that on the 13th day of August, 1887, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff his promissory note, and a mortgage on certain real property to secure payment of the same; that on the 15th of December, 1890, the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant in the superior court of Ventura county to foreclose the said mortgage, and that a summons in the action was issued, and served on the defendant by publication only, he being then a nonresident of this state, and absent therefrom; that defendant did not appear in the action, and, after the time allowed by law for him to appear and answer or demur, his default was duly entered by order of the court; that the court then heard proof of plaintiff's demand set out in his complaint, and examined him on oath respecting any payments that had been made on account of such demand, and thereupon made and entered in the action its decree of foreclosure in the usual form; that under this decree, on March 27, 1891, an order of sale was duly issued to the sheriff of the county, and in pursuance thereof the sheriff advertised for sale, and on April 27, 1891, sold the said real property for the sum of $1,000, and applied the same to the payment of the said indebtedness, interest, attorneys' fees, costs, and expenses, as directed by said decree; that after so applying the said sum there remained due and unpaid to the plaintiff, on said indebtedness for principal and interest on the said note, and as determined by said decree, the sum of $1,746.99; that the sheriff's return being made, showing such balance or deficiency, judgment was duly docketed therefor in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant on April 28, 1891; and that no part of said sum had been paid. Wherefore, the plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant for the sum of $1,746.99, with interest thereon, etc. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and his demurrer was sustained. Judgment was thereupon entered that the plaintiff take nothing, from which judgment he appeals.

There can be no doubt that the court, by the constructive service of the summons by publication in the foreclosure case, acquired jurisdiction to ascertain the amount secured by the mortgage, and to make and enter a valid decree of foreclosure, directing a sale of the mortgaged property, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the amount so secured, including costs and expenses. It did not, however, thereby acquire jurisdiction to enter or docket a personal judgment against the defendant for any deficiency left unpaid by the proceeds of the sale. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714; Belcher v. Chambers, 53 Cal. 639; Anderson v. Goff, 72 Cal. 65, 13 Pac. Rep. 73. But, notwithstanding no valid judgment could be entered for the deficiency, still, when properly ascertained, the deficiency constituted a subsisting indebtedness then due from the defendant to the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought this action to recover that indebtedness, and in his complaint set out all the facts on which he based his right of recovery; and the defendant's contention is that no sufficient cause of action was stated, because (1) the personal judgment set out was void; and (2) the note was merged in the foreclosure judgment, and under section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure no new or other action could be maintained thereon. It is true that the personal judgment docketed against the defendant was void, and also that under the section of the Code cited there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right, secured by mortgage upon real or personal property. It does not follow, however, that after the mortgage security is exhausted, leaving a deficiency which is no longer secured, no new action on the note can ever be maintained. On the contrary, it has been held that an action may be maintained against an indorser of a note, payment of which has been secured by a mortgage given by the maker, to recover any deficiency resulting after a sale of the mortgaged premises under a judgment of foreclosure against the mortgagor. Vandewater v. McRae, 27 Cal. 596; Allin v. Williams, 97 Cal. 403, 32 Pac. Rep. 441. It seems to us, therefore, that in a case like this the amount realized from the proceeds of the sale may properly be treated as a payment on the note, and that an action thereon may be maintained to recover the balance left unpaid. But, however this may be, it is clear and not disputed that the defendant was justly indebted to the plaintiff, in some form, for the amount of the deficiency; and, being so indebted, the familiar maxim of the law, that where there is a right there is a remedy, "ubi jus ibi remedium," is applicable to the case.

Under our system of pleading, the complaint should contain a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, in ordinary and concise language, and the court may grant the plaintiff any relief consistent with the case made. Sections 426, 580, Code Civil Proc. Here the complaint complies with the rule prescribed, and whether it be said to be based on the note, or on an indebtedness resulting from the facts stated, is, in our opinion, immaterial. In either view, it states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the demurrer was therefore improperly sustained. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

BOWIE v. GRAND LODGE OF LEGION OF THE WEST. (No. 15,149.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT SOCIETIES — PAYMENT OF CERTIFICATES — CHANGE IN LAWS — EFFECT ON MEMBER.

1. Where a certificate in a mutual benefit society provides for its payment "in an amount to be computed according to the laws" of the society, and these latter provide that their provisions in regard to the payment of such certificates may be changed at any time, a member is bound by a change made in such laws after his procurement of the certificate, and before the time for its payment.

2. A change of the laws of a mutual benefit association in regard to the payment of benefit certificates is not an amendment of its certificate of incorporation or articles of association, within the meaning of Civil Code, § 362, providing the method for making such amendments.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by one Bowie against the Grand Lodge of the Legion of the West. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. Wm. Reade, for appellant. Rogers & Chilstrom, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant is a corporation existing under the laws of this state, and belongs to the class known as mutual benefit associations. Under its constitution and laws it agrees to pay a stipulated sum of money to a designated nominee upon the death of the beneficiary member, and also issues to members known as "special benefit members" a certificate entitling them to receive an endowment, payable in installments during the life of such members. The defendant is without capital stock, and, like all associations of a similar character, depends upon the collection from its members of certain fixed assessments, in order to provide a fund for the payment of the certificates issued by it. Upon February 15, 1888, the defendant issued to the plaintiff a special benefit certificate of the sixth class, with 10 coupons attached thereto, each providing for the payment of a sum not exceeding $600, the first one maturing in June, 1891, and the tenth in the month of February, 1921; and by the terms of this certificate, the defendant agreed with plaintiff, in effect, that, should he live to the period of time set forth in each of the 10 coupons attached thereto, he would be entitled "to participate in the special benefit fund of the order, in an amount to be computed according to the laws of the order, not exceeding the amount named in the coupons, respectively." At the time of the issuance of this certificate the constitution and laws of the defendant contemplated that the defendant would make and collect a sufficient number of assessments to enable it to pay each maturing coupon in full, unless one assessment on each special benefit member would amount to $600, in which event there should be but one assessment. The constitution, however, contained a provision that "the constitution * * * relating to the beneficiary fund and the laws governing the same" might be amended by a three-fourths vote of all the members present at a regular meeting of the Grand Lodge.

This action is brought by the plaintiff to recover the sum of \$600, alleged to be due upon a coupon maturing in June, 1891, and attached to the special benefit certificate held by him. The coupon is in these words: "This first coupon issued by authority of the Grand Lodge, Legion of the West, shall not exceed \$600, and shall not mature before the month of June in the year 1891." The defendant in its answer alleged that the law of defendant in relation to its beneficiary funds was amended in March, 1891, so as to provide that, if the amount of an assessment called and received in the second calendar month next preceding the maturity of a coupon "shall be insufficient to pay the full face value of each and every certificate or coupon payable in the same calendar month, * * * then the sum to be paid on any coupon or certificate payable in said calendar month, and which shall be in full satisfaction thereunder, shall be a proportionate amount of such one assessment, and all that can be claimed by any person." The answer further alleged that $37\frac{1}{2}$ coupons of the sixth class matured in the month of June, 1891, and that, according to the provisions of the laws of defendant, the proportion due on each, to be paid from the assessments received by defendant, would be \$108, and that defendant had no other funds applicable to the payment of such coupons. The defendant offered to show, upon the trial of the case, that this alleged change in its laws had been made, but the evidence was, upon the objection of the plaintiff, excluded. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for the sum of \$600, with interest thereon from the date of the commencement of the action.

The defendant appeals, and assigns as error the ruling of the court in not permitting it to show that its laws in relation to its beneficiary funds were changed, as alleged in the answer; and we are of the opinion that the court erred in excluding this offered evidence. The alleged change made in the laws of the defendant did not impair the obligation of plaintiff's contract or affect any vested right of his. The plaintiff, when he became a member of the defendant corporation, became also bound by its constitution and laws, and such constitution and laws became a part of his contract of membership, as much so as if they had been written therein in express terms, and his rights under the certificate issued to him were subject thereto and limited thereby. The certificate issued to plaintiff contained the express provision that "he shall be entitled to participate in the special benefit fund of the order, in an amount to be computed according to the laws of the order, not exceeding the amount named in said coupons, respectively." This certificate, when read and construed, as it must be, in connection with the constitution and laws of the defendant existing at the time of its issuance, and which provided that a change might be made in the laws of defendant governing such funds, means that the plaintiff is to participate in the special benefit fund of defendant in an amount to be computed according to the laws of defendant in force when the several coupons shall mature. "Parties may contract in reference to laws of future enactment,—may agree to be bound and affected by them as they would be bound if such laws were existing. They may consent that such laws may enter into and form parts of their contracts, modifying or varying them. It is their voluntary agreement which relieves the application of such laws to their contracts and transactions from all imputation of injustice." Superior Commandery v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436. This was also, in effect, so decided by this court in the case of Stohr v. Society, 82 Cal. 557, 22 Pac. Rep. 1125. In that case it appeared that Stohr had become a member of the defendant therein, and at the time he became such member the by-laws of that society provided that a member disabled by sickness should receive $10 per week. Subsequently the society limited the amount of benefits to be paid, and it was contended for the plaintiff therein that such amendment of the by-laws impaired the obligation of his contract; but the court thought otherwise, saying: "Undoubtedly, when the plaintiff complied with what was required of him as a member, the by-laws constituted a contract; and, unless the contract itself otherwise provide, it cannot be changed without the consent of all the members. But here the contract itself does provide otherwise. Under the averments of the second defense there is an express provision that the by-laws may be changed. * * * This provision must be held to enter into and form a part of the contract, and, in legal effect, it is as potent as the express provision of the second defense. * * * In the present case the plaintiff can have no right to have the contract remain unchanged, because, as we have seen, the contract itself provides that it may be changed. * * * If the plaintiff has any right which is so fixed that it is not subject to change, we think it can only be to the fruits which ripened before the change was made; in other words, to such sums as became due before the new by-law was adopted." The change alleged in defendant's answer to have been made in its constitution and by-laws was not an amendment of its certificate of incorporation or articles of association, within the meaning of section 362 of the Civil Code. Judgment reversed.

GISSON v. SCHWABACHER et al. (No. 15,059.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1893.)
INJURY TO EMPLOYE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff was employed as a sack sewer in defendant's flour mill, and to do such other work as the foreman might direct. In complying with the latter's directions to assist him in taking apart some rollers on one side of the room in which he worked, he was caught in some belts and rollers, which he could not see on account of the darkness of the room, and which were not protected by any guards or railing. The only lantern in the room, the foreman had at the place of the accident. The evidence on plaintiff's part tended to show that he had never been in that part of the room, and did not know of the location of machinery in that place. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff would not be disturbed on the ground that he had assumed such risk, or was guilty of contributory negligence.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by one Glsson against one Schwabacher and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Estee, Wilson & McCutchen, for appellants. A. Ruef, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the dangerous condition of a flouring mill conducted by defendants, and in which plaintiff was employed as a laborer at the time he received the injuries complained of. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court for the sum of $2,500, and the defendants appeal.

The plaintiff was employed as a sack sewer, and when not so employed, and when the necessity arose, it was also his duty to do such other work about the mill as the foreman might direct. On June 29, 1888, he was directed by the foreman to assist him in taking apart some rollers upon a raised platform on one side of the room in which he was engaged in sewing sacks, the foreman taking with him to the place where the work was to be done a lantern used by plaintiff when engaged in his ordinary work, and which was the only light in the room. Upon this platform, or, rather, passing over and above it, were rollers, belts, and pulleys, such as usually form part of the machinery of a flouring mill, but they could not be distinguished there, on account of the darkness of the room. The room was unlighted except with the one lantern which the foreman took with him, as already stated, and this was not sufficient to light that part of the platform occupied by the plaintiff at the time, and the belts, pulleys, and rollers were not protected in any manner by guards or railing. While engaged with the foreman upon this platform, the plaintiff, in some way, stumbled and fell, and became entangled in the belting and pulleys referred to, and sustained the injuries on account of which this action is brought. The appellants do not dispute the fact that the place where plaintiff was injured was extremely dangerous to a person working there, and that they knew of its dangerous character; but their main contention is that plaintiff knew, or ought to have known, of the risk and danger surrounding the place, and that he voluntarily assumed such risk when he went upon the platform, and, further, that he was guilty of contributory negligence in working there without a light. It is undisputed in the evidence that there was but one light in the room, and this the foreman had with him at the time and place of the accident. The evidence upon the part of plaintiff also tended to show that he was never upon this platform before the accident, and that he had no knowledge of the location of the machinery, belts, and pulleys in that part of the mill where he was engaged, and that his general duties were not such as to require him to have such knowledge. We cannot, in view of the evidence, disturb the implied findings of the jury, to the effect that the injury received by plaintiff was not caused by any of the ordinary risks of his employment, and that he was not himself guilty of contributory negligence in going to work upon the platform under the circumstances above stated. Certainly, unless the plaintiff knew, or ought to have known, of the danger to which he was exposed in working upon the platform where he was injured, he cannot be said to have recklessly exposed himself to such danger, or to have voluntarily assumed these risks. Sanborn v. Trading Co., 70 Cal. 261, 11 Pac. Rep. 710. The court did not err in refusing to give the instructions requested by defendants. In so far as they correctly stated the law, they were embodied in the instructions given. The case was submitted to the jury upon instructions quite as favorable to defendants as they were entitled to, under the law, and of which, therefore, they have no right to complain. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WONG AH LEONG. (No. 20,949.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF DEFENDANT—IMPEACHMENT.

1. On a prosecution for an assault with intent to commit murder with a knife, defendant testified as to his presence at the scene of the assault, and his arrest as the perpetrator thereof, but made no mention of anything happening after his arrest. Held that, under Pen. Code, § 1323, providing that a defendant who offers himself as a witness can be cross-examined only as to "matters about which he was examined in chief," defendant could not be cross-examined regarding a pistol which fell from his person just after his arrest.

2. Defendant, on a prosecution for assault with intent to commit murder, who testifies in his own behalf, cannot have his character impeached by evidence that he had a pistol on his person at the time of his arrest.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.
